He comprehends as it really is:

'This is anguish',
'this is the arising of anguish',
'this is the stopping of anguish',
'this is the course leading to the stopping of anguish'.

He comprehends as it really is:

'These are the cankers',
'this is the arising of the cankers',
'this is the stopping of the cankers',
'this is the course leading to the stopping of the cankers'.

Knowing thus,
seeing thus,
his mind is freed from the canker of sense-pleasures and his mind is freed from the canker of becoming
and his mind is freed from the canker of ignorance.

In freedom the knowledge comes to be:

'I am freed';
and he comprehends:

'Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.'

If a disciple attains such lofty eminence under this Teacher, an intelligent person could certainly live that Brahma-faring and,
living it,
could gain success in the right path, in dhamma,

in what is skilled.

"But, good Ānanda,
could that monk who is a perfected one,
the cankers destroyed,
who has lived the life,
done what was to be done,
laid down the burden,
attained his own goal,
the fetters of becoming utterly destroyed,
freed by perfect profound knowledge - [523] could he enjoy pleasures of the senses?"

"Whatever monk, Sandaka, is a perfected one<sup>52</sup> . ,
the cankers destroyed,
who has lived the life,
done what was to be done,
laid down the burden,
attained his own goal,
the fetters of becoming utterly destroyed,
freed by perfect profound knowledge - he cannot become one to transgress<sup>53</sup> five points:<sup>54</sup> a monk whose cankers are destroyed

cannot become one intentionally to deprive a living creature of life

a monk whose cankers are destroyed
cannot become one
to take what has not been given,
as it were by theft

a monk whose cankers are destroyed
cannot become one

to indulge in sexual intercourse

a monk whose cankers are destroyed
cannot become one
to speak a deliberate lie

a monk whose cankers are destroyed
cannot become one
to enjoy pleasures of the senses in [202] regard to what was stored<sup>55</sup> as he did formerly
when in the household state.

Sandaka, whatever is a perfected one
the cankers destroyed,
who has lived the life,
done what was to be done,
laid down the burden,
attained his own goal,
the fetters of becoming utterly destroyed,
freed by perfect profound knowledge - he cannot become one to transgress these five points."

"But, good Ānanda,
if a monk is one perfected
the cankers destroyed,
who has lived the life,
done what was to be done,
laid down the burden,
attained his own goal,
the fetters of becoming utterly destroyed,
freed by perfect profound knowledge - then, whether he is walking or standing still or asleep

or awake
is the knowledge-and-vision constantly and perpetually present that his cankers are destroyed?"

"Well then, Sandaka, I will make you a simile, for by a simile some intelligent persons here understand the meaning of what has been said.

Sandaka, it is like a man whose hands and feet have been cut off; whether he is walking
or standing still or asleep
or awake,
constantly and perpetually are his hands and feet as though cut off;
and moreover while he is reflecting on it,
he knows:

'My hands and feet have been cut off.'

Even so, Sandaka, whatever monk is a perfected one,
the cankers destroyed,
who has lived the life,
done what was to be done,
laid down the burden,
attained his own goal,
the fetters of becoming utterly destroyed,
freed by perfect profound knowledge, for him
whether he is walking
or standing still

or asleep
or awake,
the cankers are as though destroyed;
and moreover
while he is reflecting on it,
he knows:

'My cankers are destroyed.'

"How many great leaders,<sup>56</sup> good Ānanda, are there in this dhamma and discipline?"

"Not merely a hundred,
nor two,
three,
four or five hundred,
but far more are those who are great leaders
in this dhamma and discipline."

"Wonderful, good Ānanda, marvellous, good Ānanda;
there can be no extolling of their own dhamma nor disparaging of the dhamma of others; but both the teaching of dhamma in its (whole) extent<sup>57</sup> and so [524] many great leaders can be seen.

On the other hand,
these Naked Ascetics are children of a childless mother, they both extol themselves and disparage others,
and they show only three great leaders, namely Nanda Vaccha, Kisa Saṅkicca and Makkhali Gosāla"<sup>58</sup>

Then the wanderer Sandaka addressed his own company, saying:

"Let the good sirs fare forth; the living of the Brahma-faring is [203] under the recluse Gotama, although it is not easy for us now to give up gains, honours,
fame."

It was in this way that the wanderer Sandaka sent his own company into the Lord's Brahma-faring.

Discourse to Sandaka:
The Sixth<sup>59</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Pilakkha, probably ficus infectoria. See Vin. iv. 35. MA. iii. 220 says there was a tree of this kind at the entrance to the Cave.

<sup>2</sup> As at Vin. iv. 164. See B.D. iii. 82 f. for references and notes on the various kinds of talk.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. M. i. 326, 481.

<sup>4</sup> As at M. ii. 1-2; D. i. 2; Ud. 11, 31.

<sup>5</sup> Ascribed to Ajita Kesakainbalin at D. i. 55; cf. also M. i. 287, 402, S. iii. 206. See translation and notes by A.L. Basham in his History and Doctrines of the Ājīvikas, London, 1951, p. 15.

<sup>6</sup> Four men each take a leg of the bier, and so the bier as well.

<sup>7</sup> padāni

<sup>8</sup> atthikavāda, affirmatists, "there-is-ists." Here MA. iii. 227 takes the theory to refer to there being fruit of giving.

<sup>9</sup> ettha. MA. iii. 228: in this recluses' dhamma.

<sup>10</sup> Cf. A. iii. 391, iv. 281; Ud. 65.

<sup>11</sup> Cf. A. iii. 347, v. 139.

<sup>12</sup> As at M. i. 404; see above, p. 73. Also at S. iii. 208.

<sup>13</sup> As at M. i. 407; see above, p. 76. Also at S. iii. 210.

<sup>14</sup> At D. i. 56 ascribed to Pakudha Kaccāyana. See also S. iii. 211.

<sup>15</sup> As at D. i. 14.

<sup>16</sup> paṭhmikāya. MA. iii. 229 says that this is just earth or the aggregation of earth; and so for the other "elements."

<sup>17</sup> M. here reads satt'ime as against sattame, "as the seventh" of D. i. 56.

<sup>18</sup> Cf. Iti. p. 22 = Jā. iv. 71 = Miln. 402.

<sup>19</sup> At A. iv. 196 these are among the eight qualities fitting one to go on a message.

<sup>20</sup> For a discussion of these terms down to "great kalpas," see A.L. Basham, op. cit., p. 240 ff. The following view is ascribed to Makkhali Gosāla at D. i. 63-54.

<sup>21</sup> kammuno. MA. iii. 230: all shown to be useless.

<sup>22</sup> MA. iii. 230 = DA. 162: the five controlling faculties, or sense-organs, indriya.

<sup>23</sup> Of body, speech and thought, MA. iii. 230.

<sup>24</sup> Of body and speech, MA. iii. 230.

<sup>25</sup> Of thought, MA. iii. 230.

<sup>26</sup> MA. iii. 230: "in each kalpa there are 64 sub-divisions, antarakappa. But because he does not know the other two, he (Makkhali Gosfila) speaks thus,"

<sup>27</sup> chaḷ-abhijātiyo. Cf. the corresponding theory of Pūrana Kassapa at A. iii. 383. See also D. iii. 250. Referred to at M. i. 407 as chass-evābhijāti, as at M. ii. 222. The black class includes, according to MA. iii. 121, DA. 162, SA. ii. 343 butchers, hunters, fishermen, robbers, etc.; the blue includes monks and some wanderers; the red, Jains and wearers of one cloth only; the yellow, householders and disciples of unclothed ascetics; the white includes Nanda, Vaccha, Saṅkicca (MA. iii. 121), or it includes Naked Ascetics, men and women (DA. 162 = SA. ii. 343); the radiant class includes Naked Ascetics (MA. iii. 121), or Nanda Vaccha, Kisa Saṅkicca, Makkhali Gosāla (DA. 162 = SA. ii. 343).

<sup>28</sup> MA. iii. 230-231: babyhood, playtime, stage of investigation, standing erect, learning time, recluseship, victory (jina, explained by jānanakāla, time of knowing) and prostrate time, pannabhūmi (translated at K.S. iii. 171, n. 2 as "attainment," reading pattabhūmi, a suggested v.l. at SA. ii. 343).

<sup>29</sup> Unclothed ascetics - the white; Nanda Vaccha, Saṅkicca (MA. iii. 121), or Naked Ascetics, men and women (DA. 162 = SA. ii. 343); the radiant, Naked Ascetics (MA. iii. 121), or Nanda Vaccha, Kisa Saṅkicca, Makkhali Gosāla (DA. 162 = SA. ii. 343).

<sup>30</sup> nāgāvasa, explained by nāgamaṇḍala at MA. iii. 231, circles or groups of nāgas.

<sup>31</sup> The Comys say camels, cows, donkeys, goats, cattle, deer, buffaloes.

<sup>32</sup> The Comys say rice, barley, wheat, beans, millet and two other kinds of grain.

<sup>33</sup> Sugar-cane, bamboo, reeds, etc.

<sup>34</sup> The Comys here say that seven stands for "many."

<sup>35</sup> Meaning "endless."

<sup>36</sup> pavuṭā, see PED., s.v. MA. iii. 232, gaṇṭikā. Le Canon Pali bouddhique, vol. I, fasc. i, p. 48 does not translate. The meaning is really unknown.

<sup>37</sup> Five dreams of Gotama given at A. iii. 240, Jā. i. 69.

<sup>38</sup> I.e. of unclothed or other ascetics.

<sup>39</sup> This is what a wise man might say.

<sup>40</sup> This is what the fool might say; but he goes on (in samsara) after he has passed the time at which this was said, MA. iii. 233.

<sup>41</sup> samsāra does not decline for the wise man or grow for the fool, MA. iii. 233.

<sup>42</sup> It goes on unwinding itself for the length of the thread, MA. iii. 233.

<sup>43</sup> As at M. i. 92-93, ii. 31; A. i. 220.

<sup>44</sup> Being omniscient, why did he ask? MA. iii. 233.

<sup>45</sup> M. ii. 211.

<sup>46</sup> A. i. 189, 195, ii. 91.

<sup>47</sup> piṭaka; cf. M. ii. 169.

<sup>48</sup> Cf. M. i. 68; D. 1. 16.

49 Cf. D. i. 27.

50 On amarāvikkhepa see D. i. 24 ff.

51 On these answers in a particular context see D. i, 27.

52 As at A. iv. 369-370.

53 ajjhācaritum, to practise (wrongly), to commit.

54 Cf. D. iii. 133, 235.

55 sannidkikāraṇaṃ. Cf. Pāc. 38 (Vin. iv. 86-87), and see B.D. ii. 339, n. 1; and also G.S. iv. 245, n. 8.

56 niyyātāro.

57 āyatane can also mean "practice."

58 Mentioned at M. i. 238.

59 Here ends Trenckner, Majjhima-Nikaya, vol. I.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
3. Paribbājaka Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Wanderers

77. Greater Discourse to Sakuludāyin

Mahā Sakuludāyi Sutta

---

[203]

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Rājagaha
in the Bamboo Grove
at the squirrels' feeding place.<sup>1</sup>

Now at that time a number of very celebrated wanderers, such as Anugāra,<sup>2</sup> Varadhara
and the wanderer Sakuludāyin, and other celebrated wanderers, were staying in the wanderers' park at the peacocks' feeding place.

Then the Lord, having dressed in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe,
entered Rājagaha for almsfood.

Then it occurred to the Lord:

"It is too early to walk for almsfood in Rājagaha.

Suppose I were to approach the wanderers' park,
the peacocks' feeding place
and the wanderer Sakuludāyin?"

Then the Lord approached the peacocks' feeding place in the wanderers' park.

Now at that time the wanderer Sakuludāyin was sitting down with the great company of wanderers shouting out with a loud noise,
a great noise,
talking various kinds of inferior talk
that is to say:
talk on kings,
thieves,
great ministers,
armies,
fears,
battles,
food,
drink,
clothes,
beds,
garlands,
scents,
relations,
vehicles,
villages,
market towns,
towns,
the country,
women,

heroes,
streets,
wells,
those departed before,
talk of diversity,
speculation about the world,
speculation about the sea,
talk about becoming or not becoming thus or thus.<sup>3</sup>

The wanderer Sakuludāyin saw the Lord coming in the distance;
seeing him,
he called his own company to order, saying: "Good sirs, let there be little noise;
do not, good sirs, make a noise;
this is the recluse Gotama who is coming.

The recluse Gotama wishes for little noise, is trained to little noise,
praises little noise.

So he may consider approaching
if he knows that this is a company of little noise."

Then these wanderers fell silent.

Then the Lord approached the wanderer Sakuludāyin.

The wanderer Sakuludāyin spoke thus to the Lord:

"Let the revered Gotama come, there is a welcome for the revered Gotama;
it is long since the revered Gotama made this opportunity!! that is to say for coming here.

Let the revered Gotama sit down, this seat is ready."

Then the Lord sat down on the seat that was ready.

And the wanderer Sakuludāyin,
having taken a low seat,
sat down at a respectful distance.

The Lord spoke thus to the wanderer Sakuludāyin
as he was sitting down at a respectful distance:

"What is the talk
for which you are now gathered together here, Udāyin?

[204] And what was your talk that was interrupted?"

"Let be that talk, revered sir, for which we are now gathered together here.

It will not be difficult for the Lord to hear this talk later.

Some time ago,<sup>4</sup> revered sir, when divers members of other sects, recluses and brahmans,
were gathered together and were sitting down in the debating hall,<sup>5</sup> this chance conversation arose:

'Indeed it is profitable for the people of Aṅga-Magadha, indeed it is well gotten by the people of Aṅga-Magadha that these leaders in religious life, heads of companies,
heads of groups,
teachers of groups,
well known,
famous founders of sects,
held in high repute by the manyfolk,<sup>6</sup> have come to Rājagaha for the rains-residence.

This Pūraṇa Kassapa is the head of a company,
head of a group,
the teacher of a group,
he is well known,
the famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk;
he has come to Rājagaha for the rains-residence.

This Makkhali Gosāla too is the head of a company,
head of a group,
the teacher of a group,
he is well known,
the famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk;
he has come to Rājagaha for the rains-residence.

This Ajita of the hair-blanket too is the head of a company,
head of a group,
the teacher of a group,
he is well known,
the famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk;
he has come to Rājagaha for the rains-residence.

This Pakudha Kaccāyana too is the head of a company,
head of a group,
the teacher of a group,
he is well known,
the famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk;
he has come to Rājagaha for the rains-residence.

This Sañjaya Belaṭṭhi's son too is the head of a company,
head of a group,
the teacher of a group,
he is well known,

the famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk;
he has come to Rājagaha for the rains-residence.

This Nātaputta the Jain too is the head of a company,
head of a group,
the teacher of a group,
he is well known,
the famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk;
he has come to Rājagaha for the rains-residence.

This recluse Gotama too is the head of a company,
head of a group,
the teacher of a group,
he is well known,
the famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk;
he has come to Rājagaha for the rains-residence.

Now of these lords,
heads of companies,
heads of groups,
teachers of groups,
well known,
famous founders of sects,
held in high repute by the manyfolk,
which is revered,
respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples?

And how do disciples,
revering and respecting,
live in dependence?

Some of those who were there spoke thus:

'This Pūraṇa Kassapa
is the head of a company,
head of a group,
teacher of a group,
well known,
a famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk.

But he is not revered,
respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples,
nor do disciples,
revering and respecting him,
live in dependence on Pūraṇa Kassapa.

Once upon a time Pūraṇa Kassapa was teaching dhamma
to an innumerable assembly.

But a certain disciple of his let it be heard:

"Do not, good sirs, ask Pūraṇa Kassapa about this matter;
he does not know about it,
we know about it.

Ask us about this matter,
we can explain it to the good sirs."

Once upon a time Pūraṇa Kassapa, with outstretched arms [205] and wailing, did not get the chance (to say<sup>7</sup>):

"Let the good sirs be quiet;
do not,

good sirs,
make a noise.

These are not asking the good sirs,
they are asking us,
we will explain to them.

"Then many of Pūraṇa Kassapa's disciples,
having refuted him,
on seceding,<sup>8</sup> said:

"You do not understand<sup>9</sup> this dhamma and discipline,
I understand this dhamma and discipline.

How can you understand this dhamma and discipline?

You are faring along wrongly,
I am faring along rightly.

There is sense in what I say,
no sense in what you say.

You said at the end
what should have been said at the beginning,
and said at the beginning
what should have been said at the end.

Your method is reversed,<sup>10</sup> you are refuted,<sup>11</sup> you are caught out,<sup>12</sup> go away and think out your words,<sup>13</sup>
or unravel them if you can."

So Pūraṇa Kassapa is not revered, respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples,

nor do disciples,
revering and respecting,
live in dependence on Pūraṇa Kassapa.

On the contrary, Pūraṇa Kassapa is reviled with abuse for his behaviour.<sup>14</sup>

§

Some spoke thus:

'This Makkhali Gosāla too
is the head of a company,
head of a group,
teacher of a group,
well known,
a famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk.

But he is not revered,
respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples,
nor do disciples,
revering and respecting him,
live in dependence on Makkhali Gosāla.

Once upon a time Makkhali Gosāla was teaching dhamma
to an innumerable assembly.

But a certain disciple of his let it be heard:

"Do not, good sirs, ask Makkhali Gosāla about this matter;
he does not know about it,
we know about it.

Ask us about this matter,
we can explain it to the good sirs."

Once upon a time Makkhali Gosāla,
with outstretched arms and wailing,
did not get the chance (to say):

"Let the good sirs be quiet;
do not,
good sirs,
make a noise.

These are not asking the good sirs,
they are asking us,
we will explain to them."

Then many of Makkhali Gosāla's disciples,
having refuted him,
on seceding, said:

"You do not understand this dhamma and discipline,
I understand this dhamma and discipline.

How can you understand this dhamma and discipline?

You are faring along wrongly,
I am faring along rightly.

There is sense in what I say,
no sense in what you say.

You said at the end
what should have been said at the beginning,

and said at the beginning
what should have been said at the end.

Your method is reversed,
you are refuted,
you are caught out,
go away and think out your words,
or unravel them if you can."

So Makkhali Gosāla is not revered, respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples,
nor do disciples,
revering and respecting,
live in dependence on Makkhali Gosāla.

On the contrary, Makkhali Gosāla is reviled with abuse for his behaviour.'

§

Some spoke thus:

This Ajita of the hair blanket too
is the head of a company,
head of a group,
teacher of a group,
well known,
a famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk.

But he is not revered,
respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples,
nor do disciples,
revering and respecting him,
live in dependence on Ajita of the hair blanket.

Once upon a time Ajita of the hair blanket was teaching dhamma
to an innumerable assembly.

But a certain disciple of his let it be heard:

"Do not, good sirs, ask Ajita of the hair blanket about this matter;
he does not know about it,
we know about it.

Ask us about this matter,
we can explain it to the good sirs."

Once upon a time Ajita of the hair blanket,
with outstretched arms and wailing,
did not get the chance (to say):

"Let the good sirs be quiet;
do not,
good sirs,
make a noise.

These are not asking the good sirs,
they are asking us,
we will explain to them."

Then many of Ajita of the hair blanket disciples,
having refuted him,
on seceding, said:

"You do not understand this dhamma and discipline,
I understand this dhamma and discipline.

How can you understand this dhamma and discipline?

You are faring along wrongly,
I am faring along rightly.

There is sense in what I say,
no sense in what you say.

You said at the end
what should have been said at the beginning,
and said at the beginning
what should have been said at the end.

Your method is reversed,
you are refuted,
you are caught out,
go away and think out your words,
or unravel them if you can."

So Ajita of the hair blanket is not revered, respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples,
nor do disciples,
revering and respecting,
live in dependence on Ajita of the hair blanket.

On the contrary, Ajita of the hair blanket is reviled with abuse for his behaviour.'

Some spoke thus:

This Pakudha Kaccāyana too
is the head of a company,
head of a group,
teacher of a group,
well known,
a famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk.

But he is not revered,
respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples,
nor do disciples,
revering and respecting him,
live in dependence on Pakudha Kaccāyana.

Once upon a time Pakudha Kaccāyana was teaching dhamma
to an innumerable assembly.

But a certain disciple of his let it be heard:

"Do not, good sirs, ask Pakudha Kaccāyana about this matter;
he does not know about it,
we know about it.

Ask us about this matter,
we can explain it to the good sirs."

Once upon a time Pakudha Kaccāyana,
with outstretched arms and wailing,
did not get the chance (to say):

"Let the good sirs be quiet;
do not,
good sirs,
make a noise.

These are not asking the good sirs,
they are asking us,
we will explain to them."

Then many of Pakudha Kaccāyana's disciples,
having refuted him,
on seceding, said:

"You do not understand this dhamma and discipline,
I understand this dhamma and discipline.

How can you understand this dhamma and discipline?

You are faring along wrongly,
I am faring along rightly.

There is sense in what I say,
no sense in what you say.

You said at the end
what should have been said at the beginning,
and said at the beginning
what should have been said at the end.

Your method is reversed,
you are refuted,
you are caught out,
go away and think out your words,
or unravel them if you can."

So Pakudha Kaccāyana is not revered, respected,

esteemed,
honoured by disciples,
nor do disciples,
revering and respecting,
live in dependence on Pakudha Kaccāyana.

On the contrary, Pakudha Kaccāyana is reviled with abuse
for his behaviour.'

§

Some spoke thus:

This Sañjaya Belaṭṭhi's son too
is the head of a company,
head of a group,
teacher of a group,
well known,
a famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk.

But he is not revered,
respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples,
nor do disciples,
revering and respecting him,
live in dependence on Sañjaya Belaṭṭhi's son.

Once upon a time Sañjaya Belaṭṭhi's son was teaching dhamma
to an innumerable assembly.

But a certain disciple of his let it be heard:

"Do not, good sirs, ask Sañjaya Belaṭṭhi's son about this matter;
he does not know about it,
we know about it.

Ask us about this matter,
we can explain it to the good sirs."

Once upon a time Sañjaya Belaṭṭhi's son,
with outstretched arms and wailing,
did not get the chance (to say):

"Let the good sirs be quiet;
do not,
good sirs,
make a noise.

These are not asking the good sirs,
they are asking us,
we will explain to them."

Then many of Sañjaya Belaṭṭhi's son's disciples,
having refuted him,
on seceding, said:

"You do not understand this dhamma and discipline,
I understand this dhamma and discipline.

How can you understand this dhamma and discipline?

You are faring along wrongly,
I am faring along rightly.

There is sense in what I say,
no sense in what you say.

You said at the end
what should have been said at the beginning,

and said at the beginning
what should have been said at the end.

Your method is reversed,
you are refuted,
you are caught out,
go away and think out your words,
or unravel them if you can."

So Sañjaya Belaṭṭhi's son is not revered, respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples,
nor do disciples,
revering and respecting,
live in dependence on Sañjaya Belaṭṭhi's son.

On the contrary, Sañjaya Belaṭṭhi's son is reviled with abuse for his behaviour.'

§

Some spoke thus:

This Nātaputta the Jain too
is the head of a company,
head of a group,
teacher of a group,
well known,
a famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk.

But he is not revered,
respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples,
nor do disciples,
revering and respecting him,
live in dependence on Nātaputta the Jain.

Once upon a time Nātaputta the Jain was teaching dhamma
to an innumerable assembly.

But a certain disciple of his let it be heard:

"Do not, good sirs, ask Nātaputta the Jain about this matter;
he does not know about it,
we know about it.

Ask us about this matter,
we can explain it to the good sirs."

Once upon a time Nātaputta the Jain,
with outstretched arms and wailing,
did not get the chance (to say):

"Let the good sirs be quiet;
do not,
good sirs,
make a noise.

These are not asking the good sirs,
they are asking us,
we will explain to them."

Then many of Nātaputta the Jain's disciples,
having refuted him,
on seceding, said:

"You do not understand this dhamma and discipline,
I understand this dhamma and discipline.

How can you understand this dhamma and discipline?

You are faring along wrongly,
I am faring along rightly.

There is sense in what I say,
no sense in what you say.

You said at the end
what should have been said at the beginning,
and said at the beginning
what should have been said at the end.

Your method is reversed,
you are refuted,
you are caught out,
go away and think out your words,
or unravel them if you can."

So Nātaputta the Jain is not revered, respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples,
nor do disciples,
revering and respecting,
live in dependence on Nātaputta the Jain.

On the contrary, Nātaputta the Jain is reviled with abuse for his behaviour.'

Some spoke thus:

'This recluse Gotama is the head of a company,
head of a group,
the teacher of a group,
he is well known,
the famous founder of a sect,
held in high repute by the manyfolk.

He is revered,
respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples;
and disciples,
revering and respecting the recluse Gotama,
live in dependence on him.

Once upon a time the recluse Gotama was teaching dhamma
to an innumerable assembly.

Then a certain disciple of the recluse Gotama coughed.

A fellow Brahma-farer touched him with his knee
and said:

"Let the venerable one be quiet;
let the venerable one make no noise.

The Teacher, our Lord, is teaching dhamma."

[206] At the time when the recluse Gotama was teaching dhamma
to an innumerable assembly, there was the sound

neither of expectation
nor of coughing
among his disciples.<sup>15</sup>

Any group of people
who were waiting
were ready for him,
thinking:

"We will hear that dhamma that the Lord will teach us."

It is as though a man at a crossing on a high road might press out a little pure honey,<sup>16</sup> and any group of people who were waiting might be ready for him.

Even so at the time when the recluse Gotama was teaching dhamma
to an innumerable assembly,
there was the sound
neither of expectation
nor of coughing
among his disciples.

Any group of people
who were waiting
were ready for him,
thinking:

"We will hear that dhamma
that the Lord will teach us."

And those disciples of the recluse Gotama who, quarrelling with fellow Brahma-farers and disavowing the training, return to the secular life, even these are speakers in praise of the Teacher, they are speakers in praise of dhamma and speakers in praise of the Order.

They censure only themselves, they do not censure others, but say:

"It is we ourselves that are unfortunate, it is we that are of little merit, in that we,
although we have gone forth thus
in this dhamma and discipline that are well taught, are unable
for as long as life lasts
to fare the Brahma-faring wholly complete,
wholly purified."

These, becoming monastery attendants or lay-disciples,
live undertaking the five rules of training.

Thus it is that the recluse Gotama is revered,
respected,
esteemed,
honoured by disciples,
and that disciples,
revering and respecting the recluse Gotama,
live in dependence on him."

"But how many things do you behold in me, Udāyin, for which my disciples revere,
respect,
esteem and honour me,
and revering and respecting,
live in dependence (on me)?"

"I, revered sir, behold five things for which disciples revere,
respect,
and honour the Lord,
and, revering and respecting,
live in dependence.

What are the five?

Revered sir, the Lord eats little and speaks in praise of eating little.

That the Lord eats little and speaks in praise of eating little,
this is the first thing that I, revered sir, behold in the Lord
for which disciples revere,
respect,
and honour the Lord,
and, revering and respecting,
live in dependence.

And again, revered sir,
the Lord is contented
with any kind of robe-material
and speaks in praise of content
with any kind of robe-material.

This is the second thing that I, revered sir,
behold in the Lord
for which disciples revere,
respect,
and honour the Lord,
and, revering and respecting,
live in dependence.

[207] And again, revered sir,
the Lord is contented
with any kind of almsfood
and speaks in praise of content
with any kind of almsfood.

This is the third thing that I, revered sir,
behold in the Lord
for which disciples revere,
respect,
and honour the Lord,
and, revering and respecting,
live in dependence.

And again, revered sir,
the Lord is contented
with any kind of lodgings
and speaks in praise of content
with any kind of lodgings.

This is the fourth thing that I, revered sir,
behold in the Lord
for which disciples revere,
respect,
and honour the Lord,

and, revering and respecting,
live in dependence.

And again, revered sir,
the Lord is aloof<sup>17</sup> and speaks in praise of aloofness.

That the Lord is aloof and speaks in praise of aloofness, this is the fifth
that I, revered sir,
behold in the Lord
for which disciples revere,
respect,
and honour the Lord,
and, revering and respecting,
live in dependence.

These, revered sir,
are the five things I behold in the Lord
for which disciples revere,
respect,
and honour the Lord,
and, revering and respecting,
live in dependence."

§

"The recluse Gotama eats little
and speaks in praise of eating little" -
if it were for this, Udāyin, that disciples would revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me and,

revering and respecting,
would live in dependence,
there are disciples of mine, Udāyin,
who live on a saucer of food
and on half a saucer of food and on a fruit of the vilva tree
and on half a fruit of the vilva tree.

But I, Udāyin,
sometimes eat to the full of this bowl, and I eat more than that.<sup>18</sup>

'The recluse Gotama eats little
and speaks in praise of eating little' -
if it were for this, Udāyin,
that disciples would revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence,
it would not be, Udāyin,
those of my disciples
who live on a saucer of food
and on half a saucer of food
and on a fruit of the vilva tree
and on half a fruit of the vilva tree
who would revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me
for this behaviour<sup>19</sup> (of mine) and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence.

§

'The recluse Gotama is content
with any kind of robe-material
and speaks in praise of content
with any kind of robe-material' - if it were for this, Udayin, that disciples would revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence,
there are disciples of mine, Udāyin,
who are wearers of rag-rob taken from a dust-heap,
and who wear robes that are worn thin;
collecting shreds of [208] cloth from a cemetery, a rubbish heap
or shop
and having made up an outer cloak, they wear it.

I, Udāyin,
sometimes wear householders' robe-material, strengthening it if it is worn thin with thread from the white gourd.

'The recluse Gotama is content
with any kind of robe-material
and speaks in praise of content
with any kind of robe-material' -
if it were for this, Udāyin,
that disciples would revere,

respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence,
it would not be, Udāyin,
those of my disciples
who are wearers of rag-robles taken from a dust-heap,
and who wear robes that are worn thin;
or those who,
collecting shreds of cloth from a cemetery,
a rubbish heap
or shop
and who, having made up an outer cloak, wear it,
who would revere,
respect,
esteem,
honour me for this behaviour (of mine) and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence..

§

'The recluse Gotama is content
with any kind of almsfood
and speaks in praise of content
with any kind of almsfood' -
if it were for this, Udāyin,
that disciples would revere,
respect,
esteem

and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence,
there are disciples of mine, Udāyin, who eat only what is received into the begging bowl,<sup>20</sup> who walk on an uninterrupted alms-round, pleased with scraps of food;<sup>21</sup> these, having gone in amid the houses, even if offered a seat
do not consent (to accept it).

But I, Udāyin,
sometimes eat
where I am invited:
rice,
rice-gruel,
rice from which the black grains have been removed,<sup>22</sup> a variety of curries,
a variety of condiments.

'The recluse Gotama is content
with any kind of almsfood
and speaks in praise of content
with any kind of almsfood' -
if it were for this, Udāyin,
that disciples would revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence,
it would not be, Udāyin,
those of my disciples
who eat only what is received into the begging-bowl,
who walk on an uninterrupted alms-round,
pleased with scrap of food, and who, having gone in amid the houses,

even if offered a seat
do not consent (to accept it),
who would revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me for this behaviour (of mine) and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence.

§

'The recluse Gotama is content
with any kind of lodging
and speaks in praise of content
with any kind of lodging' -
if it were for this, Udāyin,
that disciples would revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence,
there are disciples [209] of mine, Udāyin,
who live at the roots of trees,
in the open air,
and who for eight months
do not go under a roof.

But I, Udāyin,
sometimes stay in gabled houses, smeared inside and out,

sheltered from the winds, having door-bolts that fasten and windows that close.

'The recluse Gotama is content
with any kind of lodging
and speaks in praise of content
with any kind of lodging' -
if it were for this, Udāyin,
that disciples would revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence,
it would not be, Udāyin, those of my disciples who live at the roots of trees,
in the open air,
and who for eight months
do not go under a roof,
who would revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me for this behaviour (of mine) and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence.

§

'The recluse Gotama is aloof
and speaks in praise of aloofness' -
if it were for this, Udāyin,

that disciples would revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence,
there are disciples of mine, Udāyin, who have gone to remote lodgings in the forest and who, having plunged into remote lodgings in forest and jungle,
stay there;
these return to the midst of the Order every half-month for the recitation of the Obligations.<sup>23</sup>

But I, Udāyin,
sometimes stay crowded round by monks and nuns, men and women lay-disciples, by kings
and kings' chief ministers, by leaders and disciples of other sects.'

'The recluse Gotama is aloof
and speaks in praise of aloofness' -
if it were for this, Udāyin,
that disciples would revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence,
it would not be, Udāyin,
those of my disciples
who have gone to remote lodgings in the forest and who, having plunged into remote lodgings
in forest and jungle,

stay there,
but who return to the midst of the Order every half-month for the recitation of the Obligations, who would revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me for this behaviour (of mine) and,
revering and respecting,
would live in dependence.

It is thus, Udāyin - for these five ways of behaving - that disciples do not revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
live in dependence.

---

---

But there are, Udāyin, five other things
for which disciples revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
live in dependence.

What are the five?

As to this, Udāyin,
disciples of mine
admire the higher morality,
and think:

'The recluse Gotama is of moral habit, he is possessed of the most excellent body of moral habit.'

Inas- [210] much, Udāyin, as disciples of mine
admire the higher morality,
and think:

'The recluse Gotama is of moral habit,
he is possessed of the most excellent body of moral habit.'

This is the first thing, Udāyin, for which disciples of mine revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
live in dependence.

---

And again, Udāyin, disciples of mine admire the surpassing know-ledge-and-vision,
and think:

'When the recluse Gotama says:

"I know, I see" -

it is because he does know,
does see.

The recluse Gotama teaches dhamma
from super-knowledge,
not without super-knowledge;
the recluse Gotama teaches dhamma that has a causal basis<sup>24</sup>,
not without a causal basis;
the recluse Gotama teaches dhamma that is convincing,<sup>25</sup> not unconvincing.'

Inasmuch, Udāyin,
as disciples of mine admire the surpassing knowledge-and-vision,
and think:
'When the recluse Gotama says:
"I know, I see" -
it is because he does know,
does see.

The recluse Gotama teaches dhamma
from super-knowledge,
not without super-knowledge;
the recluse Gotama teaches dhamma
that has a causal basis,
not without a causal basis;
the recluse Gotama teaches dhamma
that is convincing, not unconvincing.'

This is the second thing, Udāyin, for which disciples of mine revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me and,

revering and respecting,
live in dependence.

---

And again, Udāyin,
disciples of mine admire the higher wisdom, and the situation does not occur when they think:

'The recluse Gotama is wise;
he is endowed with the most excellent body of wisdom.

(Yet) he will not see (in advance) a future way of speech<sup>26</sup> nor will he refute with dhamma<sup>27</sup> a present opposed teaching
that is rightly (to be) refuted.'

What do you think about this, Udāyin?

Could disciples of mine,
knowing thus,
seeing thus,
interrupt a chance conversation?"

"No, revered sir."

"It is not I, Udāyin, that expect instruction from disciples;
on the contrary,
it is the disciples themselves that expect instruction from me.<sup>28</sup>

So that, Udāyin,
the situation does not occur when disciples [211] of mine who admire the higher wisdom think:

'He would neither see (in advance) a future way of speech nor would he refute with dhamma
a present opposed teaching
that is rightly (to be) refuted.'

This is the third thing, Udāyin, for which disciples of mine revere, respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
live in dependence.

---

And again, Udāyin,
those disciples of mine
who are beset by some anguish,
overwhelmed by anguish,
having approached me,
ask about the ariyan truth of anguish.

On being asked by them
about the ariyan truth of anguish,
I explain.

I bend my mind to the answer to their question.

And again, Udāyin,
those disciples of mine
who are beset by some anguish,
overwhelmed by anguish,
having approached me,
ask about about the ariyan truth of the uprising of anguish.

On being asked by them
about the ariyan truth of anguish,
I explain.

I bend my mind to the answer to their question.

And again, Udāyin,
those disciples of mine
who are beset by some anguish,
overwhelmed by anguish,
having approached me,
ask about about the ariyan truth of the stopping of anguish.

On being asked by them
about the ariyan truth of anguish,
I explain.

I bend my mind to the answer to their question.

And again, Udāyin,
those disciples of mine
who are beset by some anguish,
overwhelmed by anguish,
having approached me,
ask about about the ariyan truth of the course leading to the stopping of
anguish.

On being asked by them
about the ariyan truth leading to the stopping of anguish, I explain.

I bend my mind to the answer to their question.

This is the fourth thing, Udāyin,
for which disciples of mine revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
live in dependence.

---

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine develop the four applications of mindfulness.<sup>29</sup>

Herein, Udāyin,
a monk fares along contemplating the body in the body,
ardent,
clearly conscious (of it),
mindful (of it),
so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world.

He fares along contemplating the feelings in the feelings,
ardent,
clearly conscious (of it),
mindful (of it),
so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world.

He fares along contemplating the mind in the mind,
ardent,
clearly conscious (of it),

mindful (of it),
so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world.

He fares along contemplating fares along contemplating mental objects in mental objects,
ardent,
clearly conscious (of it),
mindful (of it),
so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world.

As to this,
many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment and to going beyond through super-knowledge.<sup>30</sup>

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine
develop the four right strivings.<sup>31</sup>

Herein, Udāyin,
a monk generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives for the non-arising of evil unskilled states of mind
that have not arisen;

he generates desire,
he endeavours,

stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives for the getting rid [212] of evil unskilled states of mind
that have arisen;

he generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives for the arising of skilled states of mind
that have not arisen;

he generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives for the maintenance, preservation,
increase,
maturity,
development
and completion
of skilled states of mind
that have arisen.

As to this,
many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine develop the four bases of psychic power.<sup>32</sup>

Herein, Udāyin,
a monk cultivates the basis of psychic power that is possessed of concentration of intention with activities of striving;

he cultivates the basis of psychic power that is possessed of concentration of energy with activities of striving;

he cultivates the basis of psychic power that is possessed of concentration of consciousness with activities of striving;

he cultivates the basis of psychic power that is possessed of concentration of investigation with activities of striving.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine develop the five controlling faculties.<sup>33</sup>

Herein, Udāyin,
a monk develops the controlling faculty of faith,
leading to tranquillity,
leading to awakening;

he develops the controlling faculty of energy,
leading to tranquillity,
leading to awakening;

he develops the controlling faculty of mindfulness,
leading to tranquillity,
leading to awakening;

he develops the controlling faculty of concentration,
leading to tranquillity,
leading to awakening;

he develops the controlling faculty of wisdom,
leading to tranquillity,
leading to awakening.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine develop the five powers.

Herein, Udāyin,
a monk develops the power of faith,
leading to tranquillity,
leading to awakening;

he develops the power of energy,
leading to tranquillity,
leading to awakening;

he develops the power of mindfulness,
leading to tranquillity,
leading to awakening;

he develops the power of concentration,
leading to tranquillity,
leading to awakening;

he develops the power of wisdom,
leading to tranquillity,
leading to awakening.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine develop the seven limbs [213] of awakening.<sup>34</sup>

Herein, Udāyin, a monk develops mindfulness as a limb of awakening and which is dependent on aloofness,
dependent on dispassion,
dependent on stopping,
ending in renunciation;

he develops investigation of dhamma as a limb of awakening
and which is dependent on aloofness,
dependent on dispassion,
dependent on stopping,
ending in renunciation;

he develops energy as a limb of awakening
and which is dependent on aloofness,
dependent on dispassion,
dependent on stopping,
ending in renunciation;

he develops rapture as a limb of awakening
and which is dependent on aloofness,
dependent on dispassion,
dependent on stopping,
ending in renunciation;

he develops serenity as a limb of awakening
and which is dependent on aloofness,
dependent on dispassion,
dependent on stopping,
ending in renunciation;

he develops concentration as a limb of awakening
and which is dependent on aloofness,
dependent on dispassion,
dependent on stopping,
ending in renunciation;

he develops even-mindedness as a limb of awakening
and which is dependent on aloofness,
dependent on dispassion,
dependent on stopping,
ending in renunciation.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine develop the ariyan eightfold Way.

Herein, Udāyin, a monk develops perfect view, he develops perfect intention,
he develops perfect speech, he develops perfect action, he develops perfect mode of livelihood, he develops perfect endeavour, he develops perfect mindfulness, he develops perfect concentration.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine develop the eight Deliverances.<sup>35</sup>

Being in the fine-material sphere,
he sees material shapes;
this is the first deliverance.

Not perceiving material shape internally
he sees external material shapes;
this is the second deliverance.

By thinking of the Fair,<sup>36</sup> he is intent on it;
this is the third deliverance.

By passing quite beyond perceptions of material shapes,
by the going down of perceptions of sensory reactions, by not attending to perceptions of variety,
thinking:

'Ether is unending'

entering on the plane of infinite ether,
he abides in it;
this is the fourth deliverance.

By passing quite beyond the plane of infinite ether,
thinking:

'Consciousness is unending,' entering on the plane of infinite consciousness,

he abides in it;
this is the fifth deliverance.

By passing quite beyond the plane of infinite consciousness,
thinking:

'There is not anything,' entering on the plane of no-thing,

he abides in it;
this is the sixth deliverance.

By passing quite beyond the plane of no-thing, entering on the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception,
he abides in it;
this is the seventh deliverance.

By passing quite beyond the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-
perception,
entering on the stopping of perception and feeling,
he abides in it;
this is the eighth deliverance.

[214] As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,

practising which disciples of mine develop the eight spheres of mastery.<sup>37</sup>

Perceiving material shape internally, one sees external material shapes, small,
comely,
ugly,
and he is one perceiving thus:

'Having mastered them,
I know, I see';

this is the first sphere of mastery.

Perceiving material shape internally,
another sees external material shapes, illimitable,
comely,
ugly,
and he is one perceiving thus:

'Having mastered them,
I know, I see';

this is the second sphere of mastery.

Not perceiving material shape internally,
another sees external material shapes,
small,
comely,
ugly,
and he is one perceiving thus:

'Having mastered them,
I know, I see';

this is the third sphere of mastery.

Not perceiving material shape internally,
another sees external material shapes,
illimitable,
comely,
ugly,
and he is one perceiving thus:

'Having mastered them,
I know, I see';

this is the fourth sphere of mastery.

Not perceiving material shape internally, another sees external material shapes that are blue-green,<sup>38</sup> blue-green in colour,
blue-green in appearance,
reflecting blue-green.

As the flax blossom is blue-green,
blue-green in colour,
blue-green in appearance,
reflecting blue-green;
or again, as that fine muslin of Benares,
of delicate finish on both sides,
is blue-green
blue-green in colour,
blue-green in appearance,
reflecting blue-green,
even so anyone who,
not perceiving material shape internally,
sees external material shapes that are blue-green,
blue-green in colour,
blue-green in appearance,

reflecting blue-green,
is one perceiving thus:

'Having mastered them,
I know, I see'

this is the fifth sphere of mastery.

Not perceiving material shape internally, another sees external material shapes that are yellow,
yellow in colour,
yellow in appearance,
reflecting yellow.

As the kaṇṇikāra blossom is yellow,
yellow in colour,
yellow in appearance,
reflecting yellow,
or again, as that fine muslin of Benares,
of delicate finish on both sides,
is yellow,
yellow in colour,
yellow in appearance,
reflecting yellow,
even so anyone who,
not perceiving material shape internally, sees external material shapes that are yellow,
yellow in colour,
yellow in appearance,
reflecting yellow,
is one perceiving thus:

'Having mastered them,
I know, I see'

this is the sixth sphere of mastery.

Not perceiving material shape internally,[215] another sees external material shapes that are red, red in colour,
red in appearance,
reflecting red.

As the bandhujīvaka blossom is red,
red in colour,
red in appearance,
reflecting red
or again, as that fine muslin of Benares,
of delicate finish on both sides,
is red,
red in colour,
red in appearance,
reflecting red
even so anyone who,
not perceiving material shape internally,
sees external material shapes that are red,
red in colour,
red in appearance,
reflecting red,
is one perceiving thus:

'Having mastered them,
I know, I see'

this is the seventh sphere of mastery.

Not perceiving material shape internally, another sees external material shapes that are white,
white in colour,
white in appearance,
reflecting white.

As the morning star is white,
white in colour,
white in appearance,
reflecting white,
or again, as that fine muslin of Benares,
of delicate finish on both sides,
is white,
white in colour,
white in appearance,
reflecting white,
even so anyone who,
not perceiving material shape internally, sees external material shapes that are white,
white in colour,
white in appearance,
reflecting white,
is one perceiving thus:

'Having mastered them,
I know, I see';

this is the eighth sphere of mastery.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,

practising which disciples of mine develop the ten spheres of the devices.<sup>39</sup>

One is aware of the earth-device above,
below,
across,
undivided,
illimitable;

another is aware of the water-device
above,
below,
across,
undivided,
illimitable;

another is aware of the fire-device
above,
below,
across,
undivided,
illimitable;

another is aware of the wind-device
above,
below,
across,
undivided,
illimitable;

another is aware of the blue-green device
above,
below,
across,

undivided,
illimitable;

another is aware of the yellow device
above,
below,
across,
undivided,
illimitable;

another is aware of the red device
above,
below,
across,
undivided,
illimitable;

another is aware of the white device
above,
below,
across,
undivided,
illimitable;

another is aware of the space device
above,
below,
across,
undivided,
illimitable;

another is aware of the consciousness device
above,
below,
across,

undivided,
illimitable.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine develop the four meditations.

Herein, Udāyin, a monk, aloof from pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
enters and abides in the first meditation
which is accompanied by initial thought and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness,
and is rapturous and joyful.

He drenches,<sup>40</sup> saturates,
permeates,
suffuses
this very body
with the rapture and joy
that are born of aloofness;
there is no part of his whole body
that is not suffused
with the rapture and joy
that are [216] born of aloofness.

Udāyin, as a skilled bath-attendant or his apprentice, having sprinkled bath-powder into a bronze vessel, might knead it together with drops of water until the ball of lather has taken up moisture, is drenched with moisture, suffused with moisture inside and out,
but there is no oozing - even so, Udāyin, does a monk drench,
saturate,
permeate,
suffuse
this very body
with the rapture and joy
that are born of aloofness;
there is no part of his whole body
that is not suffused
with the rapture and joy
that are born of aloofness.

And again, Udāyin, a monk, by allaying initial and discursive thought,
with the mind subjectively tranquillised
and fixed on one point, enters on and abides in
the second meditation
which is devoid of initial and discursive thought,
is born of concentration
and is rapturous and joyful.

He drenches,
saturates,
permeates,
suffuses
this very body
with the rapture and joy

that are born of concentration;
there is no part of his whole body
that is not suffused
with the rapture and joy
that are born of concentration.

Udāyin, as a pool of water with water welling up within it, but which has no inlet for water from the eastern side, no inlet for water from the western side, no inlet for water from the northern side, no inlet for water from the southern side, and even if the god did not send down showers upon it from time to time,
yet a current of cool water having welled up from that pool would drench,
saturate,
permeate,
suffuse
that pool with cool water; there would be no part of that pool that was not suffused with cool water.

Even so, Udāyin, does a monk drench,
saturate,
permeate,
suffuse
this very body
with the rapture and joy
that are born of concentration;
there is no part of his whole body
that is not suffused
with the rapture and joy
that are born of concentration.

And again, Udāyin, a monk
by the fading out of rapture,
dwells with equanimity,
attentive and clearly conscious
and experiences in his person
that joy of which the ariyans say:

'Joyful lives he who has equanimity
and is mindful,'

and he enters on and abides in the third meditation.

He drenches,
saturates,
permeates,
suffuses
this very body
with the joy that has no rapture;
there is no part of his whole body
that is not suffused
with the joy that has no rapture.

As in a pond of white lotuses or a pond of red lotuses or a pond of blue lotuses, some white lotuses
or red lotuses
or blue lotuses
are born in the water,
grow up in the water, never rising above the surface but flourishing beneath it - these from their roots to their tips are drenched,

saturated,
permeated,
suffused
by cool water.

Even so, Udāyin, a monk drenches,
saturates,
permeates,
suffuses
this very body
with the joy that has no rapture;
there is no part of his whole body
that is not suffused
with the joy that has no rapture.

And again, Udāyin, a monk
by getting rid of joy
and by getting rid of anguish, by the going down
of his former pleasures and sorrows, enters on and abides in
the fourth meditation
which has neither anguish nor joy,
and which is entirely purified
by equanimity and mindfulness.

He, having suffused this very body with a mind that is [217] utterly pure, utterly clean,
comes to be sitting down;
there [332] is no part of his whole body
that is not suffused
with a mind that is utterly pure,
utterly clean.

Udāyin, as a monk might be sitting down who has clothed himself including his head
with a white cloth,
no part of his whole body would not be suffused with the white cloth.

Even so, Udāyin, a monk,
having suffused this very body
with a mind that is utterly pure,
utterly clean,
comes to be sitting down;
there is no part of his whole body that is not suffused by a mind that is utterly pure,
utterly clean.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples, practising which disciples of mine comprehend thus:

'This body of mine,
having material shape,
made of the four great elements,
originated from mother and father,
nourished on gruel and sour milk,

is of a nature to be constantly rubbed away,
pounded away,
broken up
and scattered,<sup>41</sup> but this consciousness of mine is fastened there, bound there.<sup>42</sup>

Udāyin, as an emerald jewel,<sup>43</sup>
of lovely water,
well cut into eight facets,
translucent,
flawless,
having all good qualities,
might be strung on a thread, blue-green
or yellow
or red
or white
or orange-coloured;
and a man with vision,
having put it in his hand,
might reflect:

'This emerald jewel
of lovely water,
well cut into eight facets,
translucent,
flawless,
having all good qualities,
might be strung on a thread,
blue-green
or yellow
or red
or white
or orange-coloured.'

Even so, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples, practising which disciples of mine know<sup>44</sup> thus:

'This body of mine,
having material shape,
made of the four great elements,
originated from mother and father,
nourished on gruel and sour milk,
is of a nature to be constantly rubbed away,
pounded away,
broken up
and scattered,
but this consciousness<sup>45</sup> of mine is fastened there, bound there.'

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine
from this body (mentally) produce (another) body,
having material shape,
mind-made,<sup>46</sup> having all its major and minor parts, not deficient in any sense-organ.<sup>47</sup>

As, Udāyin,
a man might draw an arrow from a reed<sup>48</sup> and might think [218] thus:

'This is the reed,
this the arrow,
the reed is one thing,
the arrow another;
it is from the reed
that the arrow has been drawn';

or again, Udāyin,
as a man might draw a sword from the scabbard
and might think thus:

'This is the sword,
this the scabbard,
the sword is one thing,
the scabbard another;
it is from the scabbard that the sword has been drawn';

or again, Udāyin,
as a man might take a snake out of the slough
and might think thus:

'This is the snake,
this the slough,
the snake is one thing,
the slough another;
it is from the slough
that the snake has been taken out.'

Even so, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples, practising which my disciples

from this body
(mentally) produce (another) body, having material shape,
mind-made,
having all its major and minor parts,
not deficient in any sense-organ.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine experience the various forms of psychic power;<sup>49</sup>

having been one they become manifold;
having been manifold they become one;

manifest or invisible
they go unhindered through a wall,
through a rampart,
through a mountain
as if through air;

they plunge into the ground and up again
as if in water;

they walk upon the water
without parting it

as if on the ground;

sitting cross-legged
they travel through the air
like a bird on the wing;

and with their hands
they rub and stroke this moon and sun which are of such power and majesty,

and even as far as the Brahma-world they have power with the person.

As, Udāyin,
a skilled potter
or potter's apprentice from properly prepared clay could make whatever shaped clay vessel he wished;

or as a skilled ivory-worker or ivory-worker's apprentice from properly prepared ivory could make whatever shaped ivory vessel he wished;

or as a skilled goldsmith or goldsmith's apprentice from properly prepared gold could make whatever shaped gold vessel he wished -

even so, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine experience the various forms of psychic power experience the various forms of psychic power;

having been one they become manifold;
having been manifold they become one;

manifest or invisible
they go unhindered through a wall,
through a rampart,
through a mountain
as if through air;

they plunge into the ground
and up again
as if in water;

they walk upon the water
without parting it
as if on the ground;

sitting cross-legged
they travel through the air
like a bird on the wing;

and with their hands
they rub and stroke this moon and sun
which are of such power and majesty,

and even as far as the Brahma-world [219] they have power with the person.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,

practising which disciples of mine through the purified deva-element of hearing
surpassing that of men,
hear both sounds;
the deva-like and the human,
those that are distant
and those that are near.

As, Udāyin,
a powerful conch-blower could,
without trouble,
inform the four quarters,
even so, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine
through the purified deva-element of hearing
surpassing that of men,
hear both sounds;
the deva-like and the human,
those that are distant
and those that are near.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine comprehend with the mind

the minds of other beings, of other individuals;<sup>50</sup>

they comprehend the mind with attachment
as a mind with attachment;

they comprehend the mind without attachment
as a mind without attachment;

they comprehend the mind with aversion
as a mind with aversion;

they comprehend the mind without aversion
as a mind without aversion

they comprehend the mind with confusion
as a mind with confusion

they comprehend the mind without confusion
as a mind without confusion

they comprehend the mind that is contracted as a mind that is contracted

they comprehend the mind that is distracted
as a mind that is distracted

they comprehend the mind that has become great as a mind that has become great

they comprehend the mind that has not become great
as a mind that has not become great

they comprehend the mind with (some other mental state) superior to it as a mind with (some other mental state) superior to it

they comprehend the mind with no (other mental state) superior to it as a mind with no (other mental state) superior to it.

they comprehend the mind that is composed
as a mind that is composed

they comprehend the mind that is not composed as a mind that is not composed

they comprehend the mind that is freed
as a mind that is freed

they comprehend the mind that is not freed
as a mind that is not freed.

Udāyin, it is like a woman or a man, young and of tender years, fond of adornment,
who,
regarding the reflection of (her or his) own face in a perfectly pure and perfectly clean mirror or in a bowl of clear water would, if it had a mole on it, know that it had,
and if not,
would know that it had not.<sup>51</sup>

Even so, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine
comprehend with the [220] mind
the mind of other beings,
of other individuals;

they comprehend the mind with attachment
as a mind with attachment;

they comprehend the mind without attachment
as a mind without attachment;

they comprehend the mind with aversion
as a mind with aversion;

they comprehend the mind without aversion
as a mind without aversion

they comprehend the mind with confusion
as a mind with confusion

they comprehend the mind without confusion
as a mind without confusion

they comprehend the mind that is contracted
as a mind that is contracted

they comprehend the mind that is distracted
as a mind that is distracted

they comprehend the mind that has become great
as a mind that has become great

they comprehend the mind that has not become great
as a mind that has not become great

they comprehend the mind with (some other mental state) superior to it as a mind with (some other mental state) superior to it

they comprehend the mind with no (other mental state) superior to it as a mind with no (other mental state) superior to it.

they comprehend the mind that is composed
as a mind that is composed

they comprehend the mind that is not composed
as a mind that is not composed

they comprehend the mind that is freed
as a mind that is freed

they comprehend the mind that is not freed
as a mind that is not freed.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine recollect a variety of former habitations,<sup>52</sup> that is to say:

one birth,
two births,
three births, four births, five births,
ten births, twenty births, forty births, fifty births,
a hundred births,
a thousand births,
a hundred thousand births,
many an eon of integration,
many an eon of disintegration,
many an eon of integration-disintegration;
such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I came to be in another state
where such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this I arose here.

Thus may I remember (my) divers former habitations
in all their modes and detail,'

Udāyin, it is like<sup>53</sup> a man who might go from his own village to another village, and who from that village might go to another village and from that village
might return to his own village.

This might occur to him:

'I went from my own village to a certain other village where I stood thus,
sat down thus,
spoke thus,
was silent thus;
and from that village
I went to another village where too I stood thus,
sat down thus,
spoke thus,
was silent thus;

then from that village
I returned to my own village.'

Even so, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine recollect a variety of former habitations,
that is to say:

one birth,
two births,
three births, four births, five births,
ten births, twenty births, forty births, fifty births,
a hundred births,
a thousand births,
a hundred thousand births,
many an eon of integration,
many an eon of disintegration,
many an eon of integration-disintegration;
such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I came to be in another state
where such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this I arose here.

Thus may I remember (my) divers former habitations
in all their modes and detail,'

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine
with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men,
see beings as they are passing hence and coming to be, <sup>54</sup> and they comprehend that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going,
according to the consequences of deeds
and they think:

Indeed these worthy beings were possessed of wrong conduct in body,
speech
and thought,
they were scoffers at the ariyans,
holding a wrong view,
incurring deeds [221] consequent on a wrong view -

these,
at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a sorrowful state,
a bad bourn,
the abyss,
Niraya Hell.

But these worthy beings
who were possessed of good conduct in body,
speech
and thought,
who were not scoffers at the ariyans,
holding a right view,
incurring deeds consequent on a right view -
these
at the breaking up of the body after dying
have arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

Thus with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men,
see beings as they are passing hence
and coming to be,
and they comprehend that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going,
according to the consequences of deeds.

It is as if, <sup>55</sup> Udāyin, there might be two houses with doors, and if a man with vision were standing there between them he might see people entering and leaving the houses, visiting and strolling about.

Even so, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine
with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men,
see beings as they are passing hence
and coming to be,
and they comprehend that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going,
according to the consequences of deeds
and they think:

Indeed these worthy beings
were possessed of wrong conduct in body,
speech
and thought,
they were scoffers at the ariyans,
holding a wrong view,
incurring deeds consequent on a wrong view -
these,
at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a sorrowful state,
a bad bourn,
the abyss,
Niraya Hell.

But these worthy beings
who were possessed of good conduct in body,

speech
and thought,
who were not scoffers at the ariyans,
holding a right view,
incurring deeds consequent on a right view -
these
at the breaking up of the body after dying
have arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

Thus with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men,
see beings as they are passing hence
and coming to be,
and they comprehend that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going,
according to the consequences of deeds.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

And again, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine
by the destruction of the cankers, having realised here-now through their own super-knowledge

the freedom of mind
and the freedom through intuitive wisdom
that are cankerless,
enter and abide therein.

Udāyin,
it is like<sup>55</sup> a pure,
limpid,
serene pool of water where,
if a man with vision
were standing on the bank, he might see oysters
and shells,
and gravel
and pebbles,
and shoals of fish
moving about
and keeping still.

It might occur to him:

'This pool of water is pure,
limpid,
serene,
here these oysters
and shells,
and the gravel
and pebbles,
and shoals of fish
are moving about
and keeping still.'

Even so, Udāyin,
a course has been pointed out by me for disciples,
practising which disciples of mine

by the destruction of the cankers, having realised here-now
through their own super-knowledge
the freedom of mind
and the freedom through wisdom
that are cankerless,
enter and abide therein.

As to this, many of my disciples abide
attained to accomplishment
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

§

This, Udāyin, is the fifth thing for which disciples of mine revere, respect,
esteem
and honour me and,
revering and respecting,
live in dependence.

[222] These, Udāyin, are the five things for which disciples of mine revere,
respect,
esteem
and honour me
and, revering and respecting,
live in dependence."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the wanderer Sakuludāyin rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Greater Discourse to Sakuludāyin
The Seventh

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. M. Sta. 79.

<sup>2</sup> MA. iii. 235 calls him Aimabhara. A wanderer of this name is referred to at A. ii. 29, 176, with the other two mentioned above.

<sup>3</sup> As in the Sandaka Sutta, above, p. 192. For Sandaka road Sakuludayin, and for Ānanda read the Lord.

<sup>4</sup> purimāni divasāni purimatarāni, as at M. ii. 31.

<sup>5</sup> kutūhalasālā; cf. D. i. 179, S. iv. 398.

<sup>6</sup> As at M. i. 198. The Tathāgata is honoured in this sense by wise people, MA. iii. 236.

<sup>7</sup> na labhati. Chalmers: "remonstrated."

<sup>8</sup> Some became householders, some came into this teaching, MA. iii. 237.

<sup>9</sup> Cf. following with D. i. 8, S. iii. 12.

<sup>10</sup> avmññan te viparāvattaṃ.

<sup>11</sup> āropito te vādo. Cf. Vin. i. 60, S. i. 160.

<sup>12</sup> niggahīto'si.

<sup>13</sup> cara vāda-ppamokkhāya. Cf. iti-vāda-ppamokkkā-nisaṃsa at M. i. 133, S. v. 73, A. ii. 26.

<sup>14</sup> akkuṭṭho dhammakkosena. MA. iii. 237 says that dhamma is sabhāva, nature, disposition, behaviour.

<sup>15</sup> Cf. M. ii. 122.

<sup>16</sup> Cf. D. iii. 85.

<sup>17</sup> MA. iii. 238 says the wanderer means no more than aloof in body, but the Lord is aloof with the three forms of aloofness (cf. Vism. 140, SnA 299, 516, DA, 169, MA. ii. 143, Asl. 164).

<sup>18</sup> Cf. Miln. 213, Vism. 170.

<sup>19</sup> dhammena. See above, p. 205, n. 8. [n.14 here]

<sup>20</sup> Cf. Vism. 66, 67.

<sup>21</sup> ucchepake vate rata. MA. iii. 240, reading va te, has bhatte as a variant reading.

<sup>22</sup> Cf. D. i. 106.

<sup>23</sup> pātimokkha.

<sup>24</sup> Cf. A. i. 276, cited at Kvu. 661. Cf. Mhvs. iii. 51. Sanidāna is explained at MA. iii. 241 as sappaccaya; for the teaching is causal: sahetukam pana taṃ desanaṃ katvā.

<sup>25</sup> sappāṭihāriya, explained at MA. iii. 241 as sakāraṇa. See G.S. i. 254, n. 3, [n.4 here] and CPD. s.v. appāṭihāriya, "not convincing, without arguments." The meaning is perhaps: he teaches a reliable dhamma; cf. D. ii. 104. See also appāṭihītrakata at D. i. 193, 239, "witless "or "unreliable."

<sup>26</sup> vādapatha, perhaps "line of argument."

<sup>27</sup> saha dhammena, explained at MA. iii. 242 as sakāraṇena. Cf. MA. iii. 241: sakāraṇam in explanation of sappāṭihāriyam. Therefore saha dhammena may mean here: with convincing arguments, or sound argument, i.e. well presented.

<sup>28</sup> Cf. Vin. ii. 187: "disciples do not protect me in regard to knowledge-and-vision and I do not expect protection from disciples as regards this."

<sup>29</sup> See M. Sta. 10.

<sup>30</sup> abhiññā-vosāna-pāramippatta, as at A. iii. 9; cf. M. ii. 211. Lamotte, Mpps. ii. 701 says: pāra ... veut dire 'l'autre rive'; mi veut dire ... 'arriver à.' So, pāramī, pāramitā, means that having realised perfection or excellence, one then arrives beyond on the Further Shore = amata (deathlessness) and nibbāna. Cf. MA. iii. 453 which uses the compound nibbānappatta. The Beyond, or Further Shore, is where there is no reaction to sensory impingement, where "all is still" (Sn. 920); the gaining of such a state is a fruit of intense meditative exercises.

<sup>31</sup> As at A. ii. 15, 256, etc.

<sup>32</sup> As at M. i. 103 (M.L.S. i. 147).

<sup>33</sup> cf. S. v. 227, etc. On indriya, see PED. They correspond to the five powers (immediately below). Indriya appears to be connected with Vedic Indra, Pali inda, lord, ruler. The five would therefore seem to be not so much "moral faculties" (B.H.S.D.) as ruling faculties, controlling forces, controls, but I have elsewhere, in this translation, rendered saṁvara by "control," csp. pātimokkhasaṁvara.

<sup>34</sup> Cf. MA. 11 (M.L.S. i. 15).

<sup>35</sup> See D. ii. 70.

<sup>36</sup> By concentrating in meditation on the perfectly pure and bright colours as the objects of kasina (for kasina, see below, p. 215). Also, according to

MA. iii. 256 = DA. 613, quoting Pṭs. ii. 30, by way of the four brahmavihāras.

<sup>37</sup> abhibhāyatana; see D. ii. 110, A. i. 40, iv. 305, etc.; also see Dhs. §204 and Bud. Psych. Ethics, note on §204.

<sup>38</sup> These colours: blue-green, yellow, red, white, refer to personal colours: blue-green (or dark blue) to the hair or bile, etc.; yellow to skin or soles and palms, etc.; red to the flesh or blood or tongue, etc.; white to the bones or teeth or nails. These stages of meditative mastery are called parikamma (at e.g. MA. iii. 257), "preparatory," i.e. to attainment-concentration, appanā-samādhi.

<sup>39</sup> kaṣiṇāyatana. As at A. v. 46. See G.S. v. 31, n. 1, and Vism. 97, 110. The kaṣiṇa are purely external devices used in meditation exercises to produce and develop concentration and attain the four jhāna.

<sup>40</sup> This exposition of the four meditations with the similes has occurred at M. i. 276-278 (M.L.S. i. 330 f.); and see D. i. 73 ff.

<sup>41</sup> Cf. M. 1. 144.

<sup>42</sup> As at D. i. 76.

<sup>43</sup> Cf. M. ii. 33, iii. 121; D. i. 76, ii. 13, etc. See PTC., s.v. aṭṭhaṃsa.

<sup>44</sup> Above, pajānanii, "comprehend here jānanti, "know."

<sup>45</sup> me, "of mine," not in the text here although it is above.

<sup>46</sup> manomaya as at Dhp. 1, 2. MA. iii. 263 explains: manena nibbattitaṃ.

<sup>47</sup> As at D. i. 77; cf. also D. i. 34, 186, 195.

<sup>48</sup> Dial. i. 88, n. 2 notes that "this old simile has occurred already in the Satapatha-Brāhmaṇa IV, 3, 3, 16. "The other notes at Dial. i. 88 should also be consulted. A. K. Coomaraswamy, Some Pali Words, p. 166, says that when the fletcher goes to the muñja marshes, what he pulls out is for him the arrow and what he leaves behind is the plant. The point of all these similes is that what is pulled out resembles what it is pulled out from.

49 As at M. i. 34, etc. All these are psychic powers of the spirit. The Brahma-world is no doubt the highest world of mentality and mental activity, and where the meditator is unhindered by reaction to sense-impressions.

50 As at M. i. 34, 39, etc.

51 As at D. i. 80.

52 As at M. i. 22, etc.

53 As at M. i. 278.

54 As at M. i. 22, etc.

55 As at M. i. 279.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
3. Paribbājaka Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Wanderers

78. Discourse to Samaṇamaṇḍikā's Son

Samaṇamaṇḍikā Sutta

The Middle Length Sayings

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Now at that time the wanderer Uggāhamāna, Samaṇamaṇḍikā's son, was staying in the One Hall, set round with a row of tinduka trees,<sup>1</sup> in Malhkā's park which was intended for discussion,<sup>2</sup> together with a company of wanderers numbering at least three hundred.<sup>3</sup>

Then early one morning the carpenter Pancakaṅga left Sāvattḥī so as to see the Lord.

Then it occurred to Pancakaṅga the carpenter:

"It is not yet the right time to see the Lord.

The Lord has withdrawn.

Nor is it the season to see the monks who are developing their minds.<sup>4</sup>

The monks who are developing their minds have withdrawn.

Suppose that I were to approach Mallikā's park, which is intended for discussion,
the One Hall,
set round with a row of tinduka trees,
and Uggāhamāna the wanderer, Samaṇamaṇḍikā's son?"<sup>5</sup>

Then [223] Pancakaṅga the carpenter approached Mallikā's park, which is intended for discussion,
the One Hall,
set round with a row of tinduka trees,
and Uggāhamāna the wanderer, Samaṇamaṇḍikā's son.

At that time Uggāhamāna was sitting down with a great company of wanderers shouting out with a loud noise, a great noise,<sup>6</sup> talking various kinds of inferior talk
that is to say
talk on kings,
thieves,
great ministers,
armies,
fears,
battles,

food,
drink,
clothes,
beds,
garlands,
scents,
relations,
vehicles,
villages,
market towns,
towns,
the country,
women,
heroes,
streets,
wells,
those departed before,
talk of diversity,
speculation about the world,
speculation about the sea,
talk about becoming or not becoming thus or thus.

Uggāhamāna saw the carpenter Pancakaṅga coming in the distance;
seeing him,
he called his own company to order,
saying;

"Good sirs, let there be little noise;
do not, good sirs, make a noise;
this is a disciple of the recluse Gotama who is coming - the carpenter Pancakaṅga.

For as long as white-frosted householders, disciples of the recluse Gotama, have been staying at Sāvattthī, the carpenter Pancakaṅga has been among them.

These venerable ones wish for little noise, they are trained to little noise, they are praisers of little noise.

So, if he knows that this is a company of little noise, he may consider approaching."

Then these wanderers fell silent.

Then Pancakaṅga the carpenter approached Uggāhamāna;
having approached
he exchanged greetings with Uggāhamāna;
having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

Uggāhamāna spoke thus to Pancakaṅga the carpenter
as he was sitting down at a respectful distance:

"I, carpenter, lay down that an individual who is endowed with four qualities is abounding in skill,
of the highest skill,
an unconquerable recluse
attained to the utmost attainments.

With what four?

As to this, carpenter,
he does no evil deed with his body,
he speaks no evil speech,
he intends no evil intention,
he leads no evil mode of livelihood.

I lay down, carpenter, that if an individual is endowed with these four qualities he is abounding in skill,
of the highest skill,
an unconquerable recluse
attained to the utmost attainments."

But the carpenter Pancakaṅga neither rejoiced in what Uggāhamāna had said nor scoffed.

Neither rejoicing nor scoffing,
rising from his seat,
he departed,
thinking:

"I will discover the meaning of what was said in the Lord's presence."

Then Pancakaṅga the carpenter
approached the Lord;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance Pancakaṅga the carpenter told the Lord the whole of the conversation he had had with Uggāhamāna.

This said, the Lord spoke thus to Pancakaṅga the carpenter:

"This being so, carpenter, then according to the speech of Uggāhamāna
a young baby boy
lying on its back<sup>7</sup> would be of [224] abounding skill, of the highest skill,

an unconquerable recluse
attained to the utmost attainments.

For, carpenter,
a young baby boy lying on its back does not think of its own body.<sup>8</sup>

How then could it do an evil deed with its body, except for a little kicking about?

A young baby boy, carpenter,
lying on its back
does not think of its own voice.

How then could it utter an evil speech, except for a little crying?

A young baby boy, carpenter,
lying on its back
does not think about its own intention.

How then could it intend an evil intention, except for a little excitement?<sup>9</sup>

A young baby boy, carpenter,
lying on its back
does not think of its own mode of livelihood.

How then could it lead an evil mode of livelihood, except for taking its mother's milk?

This being so, carpenter,
then according to the speech of Uggāhamāna
a young baby boy lying on its back would be of abounding skill,
of the highest skill,

an unconquerable recluse
attained to the utmost attainments.

Now I, carpenter, lay down that an individual,
endowed with four qualities, is neither of abounding skill nor of the highest skill nor is he an unconquerable recluse attained to the utmost attainments;
and that these moreover merely distinguish<sup>10</sup>
a young baby boy lying on its back.

With what four?

As to this, carpenter,
he does no evil deed with his body,
he utters no evil speech,
he intends no evil intention,
he leads no evil mode of livelihood.

I, carpenter, lay down
that if an individual is endowed with these four qualities he is neither abounding in skill,
nor of the highest skill, nor an unconquerable recluse
attained to the utmost attainments;
and that these moreover merely distinguish
a young baby boy lying on its back.

I, carpenter, lay down
that an individual,
endowed with ten qualities,

is abounding in skill,
of the highest skill,
an unconquerable recluse
attained to the utmost attainments.

I say it is to be understood for him,<sup>11</sup> carpenter, that these<sup>12</sup> are unskilled moral habits.

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter, that hence-originating
are unskilled moral habits.

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter, that here unskilled moral habits are stopped without remainder.

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter, that [225] faring along thus,
he is faring along
for the stopping of unskilled moral habits.

■

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter, that these are skilled moral habits.

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter,
that hence-originating
are skilled moral habits.

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter, that here skilled moral habits are stopped without remainder.

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter,
that faring along thus,

he is faring along
for the stopping of skilled moral habits.

■

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter, that these are unskilled intentions.

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter,
that hence-originating
are unskilled intentions.

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter, that here unskilled intentions
are stopped without remainder.

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter,
that faring along thus,
he is faring along
for the stopping of unskilled intentions.

■

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter, that these are skilled intentions.

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter,
that hence-originating
are skilled intentions.

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter, that here skilled intentions
are stopped without remainder.

I say it is to be understood for him, carpenter,
that faring along thus,

he is faring along
for the stopping of skilled intentions.

■

And which, carpenter, are the unskilled moral habits?

Unskilled deed of body, unskilled deed of speech, evil mode of livelihood - these, carpenter, are called unskilled moral habits.

And how, carpenter,
do these unskilled moral habits originate?

Their origination is spoken of too.

It should be answered that the origination is in the mind.<sup>13</sup>

Which mind?

For the mind is manifold, various,
diverse.

That mind<sup>14</sup> which has attachment,
aversion,
confusion -
originating from this
are unskilled moral habits.

But where,<sup>15</sup> carpenter, are these unskilled moral habits stopped without remainder?

Their stopping is spoken of too.

As to this, carpenter, a monk,
getting rid of wrong conduct in body, develops right conduct in body;
getting rid of wrong conduct in speech, he develops right conduct in speech;
getting rid of wrong conduct in thought, he develops right conduct in thought;
getting rid of a wrong mode of livelihood,
he leads his life with a right mode of livelihood.

It is thus that these unskilled moral habits are stopped without remainder.

And faring along in what way, carpenter,
is he faring along
for the stopping of unskilled moral habits?

As to this, carpenter,
a monk generates desire, 16
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the non-arising of evil unskilled states of mind
that have not arisen.

He generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the getting rid of evil unskilled states of mind
that have arisen

He generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the arising of skilled states of mind
that have not arisen

He generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the maintenance,
preservation,
increase,
maturity,
development
and completion
of skilled states of mind that have [226] arisen.

Faring along thus, carpenter,
he is faring along
for the stopping of unskilled moral habits.

And which, carpenter,
are the skilled moral habits?

Skilled deed of body,
skilled deed of speech;
and I, carpenter, say that included in moral habit is entire purity of mode of livelihood.

These, carpenter, are called skilled moral habits.

And how, carpenter,
do these skilled moral habits originate?

Their origination is spoken of too.

It should be answered that the origination is in the mind.

Which mind?

For the mind is manifold,
various,
diverse.

That mind which is devoid of attachment, devoid of aversion, devoid of confusion -
originating from this
are the skilled moral habits.

And where, carpenter, are these skilled moral habits
stopped without remainder?

Their stopping is spoken of too.

As to this, carpenter,
a monk is of moral habit and has no addition to make to moral habit,<sup>17</sup> and he comprehends that freedom of mind, that freedom through intuitive wisdom as they really are.

Herein<sup>18</sup> are these skilled moral habits of his
stopped without remainder.

And faring along in what way, carpenter,
is he faring along
for the stopping of skilled moral habits?

As to this, carpenter,
a monk generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the non-arising of evil unskilled states of mind
that have not arisen.

He generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the getting rid of evil unskilled states of mind
that have arisen

He generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the arising of skilled states of mind
that have not arisen

He generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the maintenance,
preservation,

increase,
maturity,
development
and completion
of skilled states of mind that have arisen.

Faring along thus, carpenter,
he is faring along
for the stopping of skilled moral habits.

And which, carpenter, are unskilled intentions?

Intention for sense-pleasures, intention for malevolence, intention for harming.

These, carpenter, are called unskilled intentions.

And how, carpenter, do these unskilled intentions originate?

Their origination is spoken of too.

It should be answered
that their origination is in perception.

Which perception?

For perception is many,
various,
diverse:
perception of sense-pleasures, perception of malevolence, perception of harming - originating from these are unskilled intentions.

But where, carpenter,
are these unskilled intentions
stopped without remainder?

Their stopping is spoken of too.

As to this, carpenter, a monk,
aloof from the pleasures of the [227] senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
entering into the first meditation
which is accompanied by initial thought
and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness,
and is rapturous and joyful,
abides in it.

Herein are these unskilled intentions
stopped without remainder.

And faring along in what way, carpenter,
is he faring along
for the stopping of unskilled intentions?

As to this, carpenter,
a monk generates desire,
he endeavours,
he stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the non-arising of evil unskilled states of mind
that have not arisen.

He generates desire,
he endeavours,
he stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives

for the getting rid of evil unskilled states of mind
that have arisen

He generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the arising of skilled states of mind
that have not arisen

He generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the maintenance,
preservation,
increase,
maturity,
development
and completion
of skilled states of mind that have arisen.

Faring along thus, carpenter,
he is faring along
for the stopping of unskilled intentions.

And which, carpenter, are skilled intentions?

Intention for renunciation, intention for non-malevolence, intention for nonharming.

These, carpenter, are called skilled intentions.

And how, carpenter,
do these skilled intentions originate?

Their origination is spoken of too.

It should be answered
that their origination is in perception.

Which perception?

For perception is many,
various,
diverse:
perception of renunciation, perception of non-malevolence, perception of non-harming - originating from these are skilled intentions.

But where, carpenter,
are these skilled perceptions stopped without remainder?

Their stopping is spoken of too.

As to this, carpenter, a monk,
by allaying initial and discursive thought,
his mind subjectively tranquillised
and fixed on one point,
enters on
and abides in
the second meditation
which is devoid of initial and discursive thought,
is born of concentration
and is rapturous and joyful.

Herein are these skilled intentions
stopped without remainder.

And faring along in what way, carpenter,
is he faring along
for the stopping of skilled intentions?

As to this, carpenter,
a monk generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the non-arising of evil unskilled states of mind
that have not arisen.

He generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the getting rid of evil unskilled states of mind
that have arisen

He generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the arising of skilled states of mind
that have not arisen

He generates desire,
he endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives
for the maintenance,
preservation,

increase,
maturity,
development
and completion
of skilled states of mind that have arisen.

Faring along thus, carpenter,
he is faring along
for the stopping of skilled intentions.

And endowed with what ten qualities do I, carpenter, lay down that an individual is abounding in skill,
of the highest skill,
an unconquerable recluse
attained to the utmost attainments?

As to this, carpenter,
a monk is endowed with the perfect view of an adept,
he is endowed with the perfect intention of an adept, he is endowed with the perfect speech of an adept, he is endowed with the perfect action of an adept, he is endowed with the perfect mode of livelihood of an adept, he is endowed with the perfect endeavour of an adept, he is endowed with the perfect mindfulness of an adept, he is endowed with the perfect concentration of an adept, he is endowed with the perfect knowledge of an adept, he is endowed with the perfect freedom of an adept.

I, carpenter, lay down
that an individual,
endowed with these ten qualities,
is abounding in skill,
[228] of the highest skill,
an unconquerable recluse attained to the highest attainments."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, Pancakaṅga the carpenter
rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse to Samaṇamaṇḍikā ('s son):
The Eighth

---

<sup>1</sup> MA. iii. 266 says that the One Hall, ekasālā, was surrounded by rows of tinduka and timbaru trees. At first there was only the one hall, and although later many more were built for the wanderers, such as Paṭṭhapāda and others, the name of One Hall was retained.

<sup>2</sup> samayappavādake. MA. iii. 266 says this is an ārāma, a park, where brahmins, Jains, unclothed wanderers and so on meet together to discuss and to state their opinions. Samayappavādaka is therefore a descriptive epithet of the park that Mallikā had made for the wanderers, and not "the debating hall" as such.

<sup>3</sup> This sentence is also at D. i. 178.

<sup>4</sup> manobhāvāniyā bhikkhū, as at M. iii. 261; S. iii. 1; Miln.. 129.

<sup>5</sup> Although Uggāhamāna always receives this full title in this Discourse, for the sake of brevity I shall refer to him as Uggāhamāna only.

<sup>6</sup> As in Suttas 76, 77, see above, pp. 192, 203.

<sup>7</sup> Cf. M. i. 394.

<sup>8</sup> kāyo ti pi na hoti. MA. iii. 267 says it does not know the difference between its own body and those of others.

<sup>9</sup> It cries or laughs according to whether it has come from Niraya Hell or a deva-world, MA. iii. 268.

<sup>10</sup> samadhiggayha tiṭṭhati, see above, p. 184, n. 2.

<sup>11</sup> tahaṃ, a locative of ta.

<sup>12</sup> This and the next two sentences begin respectively with ime, ito, idha.

<sup>13</sup> citta.

<sup>14</sup> I think the reading here should be yaṃ cittaṃ (instead of sacittaṃ) as in the paragraph below on the skilled moral habits.

<sup>15</sup> kuhiṃ. MA, iii. 269 says katamaṃ ṭhānaṃ pāpuṇitvā, having achieved which stage? - the stage of stream-attainment, or which? The answer is Immediately given, and its conclusion: 'It is here ...' means, according to MA. iii. 269, in the fruit of stream-attainment.

<sup>16</sup> As at M. ii. II.

<sup>17</sup> sīlavā hoti no ca sīlamayo. VvA. 10 adduces six meanings of the word maya, and as an example of the sixth gives dānamaya, sīlamaya, in the sense of adding a syllable for the sake of completeness. But MA. iii. 270 says no ca sīlamayo means that, being possessed of moral habit, there is nothing further than this to be done.

<sup>18</sup> yattha: in the fruit of arahantship, MA. iii. 270.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
3. Paribbājaka Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Wanderers

79. Lesser Discourse to Sakuludāyin

Cūḷa Sakuludāyi Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels' feeding place.

Now at that time the wanderer Sakuludāyin was living in the wanderers' park at the peacocks' feeding place together with a large company of wanderers.

Then the Lord, having dressed in the morning, taking his bowl and robe, entered Rājagaha for almsfood.<sup>1</sup>

Then it occurred to the Lord:

"It is too early to walk for almsfood in Rājagaha.

Suppose I were to approach the wanderers' park,
the peacocks' feeding place
and the wanderer Sakuludāyin

"Then the Lord approached the peacocks' feeding place
in the wanderers' park.

Now at that time the wanderer Sakuludāyin was sitting down with the great company of wanderers shouting out with a loud noise,
a great noise,
talking various kinds of inferior talk
that is to say
talk on kings,
thieves,
great ministers,
armies,
fears,
battles,
food,
drink,
clothes,
beds,
garlands,
scents,
relations,
vehicles,
villages,
market towns,
towns,
the country,
women,
heroes,
streets,
wells,
those departed before,

talk of diversity,
speculation about the world,
speculation about the sea,
talk about becoming or not becoming
thus or thus.

The wanderer Sakuludāyin saw the Lord coming in the distance;
seeing him, he called his own company to order, saying:

"Good sirs, let there be little noise;
do not, good sirs, make a noise;
this is the recluse Gotama who is coming

The the recluse Gotama wishes for little noise, is trained to little noise,
praises little noise.

So he may consider approaching
if he knows that this is a company of little noise."

Then these wanderers fell silent.

Then the Lord approached the wanderer Sakuludāyin.

The wanderer Sakuludāyin spoke thus to the Lord:

"Let the revered one come,
there is a welcome for the revered one;
it is long since the revered one made this opportunity!

That is to say for coming here.

Let the revered one sit down,
this seat is ready."

Then the Lord sat down on the seat that was ready.

And the wanderer Sakuludāyin,
having taken a low seat,
sat down at a respectful distance.

The Lord spoke thus to the wanderer Sakuludāyin
as he was sitting down at a respectful distance:

"What is the talk
for which you are now gathered together here, Udāyin?"

And what was your talk
that was interrupted?"

"Let be that talk, revered sir, for which we are now gathered together here.

It will not be difficult for the Lord to hear this talk later.

When I, Lord,
am not near this company,
then this company is sitting down talking a variety of inferior talk.

But when I, Lord,
am near this company,
then this company is sitting down gazing at my face,
saying:

'We will listen to whatever dhamma
the recluse Udāyin speaks to us.'

But when, Lord, the Lord is near this company, then I and this company are alike sitting down

gazing at the Lord's face,
and saying:

'We will listen to whatever dhamma
the Lord speaks to us.'

"Well then, Udāyin, let something occur to you here so that you can speak it to me."

"Some time ago, revered sir, one who was all-knowing,
all-seeing,
claiming all-embracing knowledge-and-vision,
said:

'Whether I am walking
or standing still or asleep
or awake,
knowledge-and-vision is constantly and perpetually before me.'<sup>2</sup>

He, on being asked a [229] question by me concerning the past,
shelved the question by (asking) another,
answered off the point
and evinced temper
and ill-will
and sulkiness.<sup>3</sup>

It was because of this, revered sir, that rapture arose in me respecting the Lord, and I thought:

'Ah, indeed it is the Lord, ah, indeed it is the Well-farer that is skilled in these matters.'

"But who was this, Udāyin, that all-knowing,
all-seeing,
claiming all-embracing knowledge-and-vision,
said:

'Whether I am walking
or standing still or asleep
or awake,
knowledge-and-vision is constantly and perpetually before me,' and who,
on being asked a question by you
concerning the past,
shelved the question by (asking) another,
answered off the point
and evinced temper
and ill-will
and sulkiness?"

"Revered sir, it was Nātaputta the Jain."

"Udāyin,
whoever could recollect a variety of former habitations,
that is to say:

One birth,
two births,
three births,
four births,
five births,

ten births,
twenty births,
thirty births,
forty births,
fifty births,
a hundred births,
a thousand births,
a hundred thousand births,
and many an eon of integration
and many an eon of disintegration
and many an eon of integration-disintegration;
such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I came to be in another state
where such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I arose here
and could recollect thus
in all their mode and detail
a variety of former habitations, either he could ask me a question concerning the past or I could ask him a question concerning the past;

either he could turn his mind to answering my question concerning the past or I could turn my mind to answering his question concerning the past.

Udāyin,
whoever could with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
behold beings as they are passing hence
and coming to be,
mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going
according to the consequences of their deeds,
thinking:

Indeed these worthy beings
who were possessed of wrong conduct in body,
who were possessed of wrong conduct of speech,
who were possessed of wrong conduct of thought,
scoffers at the ariyans,
holding a wrong view,
incurring deeds consequent on a wrong view -
these, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a sorrowful state,
a bad bourn,
the abyss,
Niraya Hell.

But these worthy beings
who were possessed of good conduct in body,
who were possessed of good conduct in speech,
who were possessed of good conduct in thought,
who did not scoff at the ariyans,

holding a right view,
incurring deeds consequent on a right view -
these, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

And thus with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
see beings as they pass hence,
as they arise;
could comprehend that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going
according to the consequences of their deeds, either he could ask me a question concerning the future or I could ask him a question concerning the future;

either he could turn his mind to answering my question concerning the future
or I could turn my mind to answering his question concerning the future.

Wherefore, Udāyin,
let be the past,
let be the future.

I will teach you dhamma:

If this is,
that comes to be;
from the arising of this,
that arises;
if this is not,

that does not come to be;
from the stopping of this,
that is stopped."

"But I, revered sir,
even to the extent that I have realised this individuality of mine, am not able to recollect it with its mode and detail.

How then should I recollect a variety of former habitations,
that is to say:

One birth,
two births,
three births,
four births,
five births,
ten births,
twenty births,
thirty births,
forty births,
fifty births,
a hundred births,
a thousand births,
a hundred thousand births,
and many an eon of integration
and many an eon of disintegration
and many an eon of integration-disintegration;
such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I came to be in another state

where such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I arose here

and say that I recollect a variety of former habitations in all their mode and detail,
like the Lord?

Then I, revered sir,
do not even see a mud-sprite<sup>4</sup> at present.

How then should I
with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
behold beings as they are passing hence
and coming to be,
mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going according to the consequences of their deeds,
thinking:

Indeed these worthy beings
who were possessed of wrong conduct in body,
who were possessed of wrong conduct of speech,
who were possessed of wrong conduct of thought,
scoffers at the ariyans,
holding a wrong view,

incurring deeds consequent on a wrong view -
these, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a sorrowful state,
a bad bourn,
the abyss,
Niraya Hell.

But these worthy beings
who were possessed of good conduct in body,
who were possessed of good conduct in speech,
who were possessed of good conduct in thought,
who did not scoff at the ariyans,
holding a right view,
incurring deeds consequent on a right view -
these, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

And thus with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
see beings as they pass hence,
as they arise;
and comprehend that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going
according to the consequences of their deeds,

like the [230] Lord?

So that when, revered sir, the Lord spoke thus to me:

'Let be the past,
let be the future.

I will teach you dhamma:

If this is,
that comes to be;
from the arising of this,
that arises;
if this is not,
that does not come to be;
from the stopping of this,
that is stopped."

- then that is not abundantly clear to me.

Nevertheless I, revered sir, could satisfy the Lord's mind with an explanation of a question that belongs to our own teachers."

"What do your own teachers say, Udāyin?"

"Revered sir, our own teachers speak thus:

"This is the highest lustre,<sup>5</sup>
this is the highest lustre."

"But when your own teachers speak thus to you, Udāyin:

"This is the highest lustre,
this is the highest lustre,'

which is this highest lustre?"

"Revered sir, there is no other lustre superior to
or more excellent than this lustre, it is the highest lustre."

"But which is this lustre, Udāyin, than which there is no other lustre superior or more excellent?"

"Revered sir, there is no other lustre
superior to
or more excellent than that lustre, it is the highest lustre."

"You would be long in expanding this, Udāyin.

You say:

'Revered sir, there is no other lustre
superior to
or more excellent than this lustre,
it is the highest lustre,'

but you do not point to this lustre.

Udāyin, it is as though a man should say:<sup>6</sup>

'Whoever is the belle of this countryside,
I want her,
I desire her.'

Another man might say to him:

'My good man,
do you know whether this belle of the countryside whom you want and desire is a noble maiden
or a brahmin
or a merchant
or a worker?'

Asked this, he would say:

'No.'

The other might say to him:

'My good man,
do you know the name
or the clan
of this belle of the countryside
whom you want and desire?'

Asked this, he would say:

'No.'

The other might say to him:

'My good man,
do you know whether she is tall
or short
or of medium height,
or dark
or brown
or sallow;
or what village
or market town
or what town
she belongs to?'

Asked this, he might say:

'No.'

The other might speak to him thus:

'My good man,
do you want and desire

her whom you know not,
see not?'

Asked this, he might say:

'Yes.'

What do you think about this, Udāyin?

This being so,
surely that man's irresponsible talk does not prosper him?"<sup>7</sup>

[231] "Certainly, revered sir,
this being so,
that man's irresponsible talk
does not prosper him."

"But even so do you, Udāyin, say:

'Revered sir, there is no other lustre
superior to
or more excellent than this lustre,
it is the highest lustre.'

But you do not point to this lustre."

---

"Revered sir, as an emerald jewel<sup>8</sup>,
of lovely water,
well cut into eight facets,
if placed on a pale piece of cloth shines and gleams and glows -

of such a lustre
is the hale self<sup>9</sup> after dying."

---

"What do you think about this, Udāyin?

Of these two lustres,
which is the surpassing and more excellent:
that emerald jewel,
of lovely water,
cut into eight facets
that, if placed on a pale piece of cloth
shines and gleams and glows;
or some glow-worm
or fire-fly
in the dense darkness of the night?"

"Why, revered sir, of these two lustres, the surpassing and more excellent
is the glow-worm
or fire-fly
in the dense darkness of the night."

"What do you think about this, Udāyin?

Of these two lustres,
which is the surpassing and more excellent:
the glow-worm
or fire-fly
in the dense darkness of the night or an oil-lamp
in the dense darkness of the night?"

"Why, revered sir, the oil-lamp."

"What do you think about this, Udāyin?"

Of these two lustres,
which is the surpassing and more excellent:
the oil-lamp
in the dense darkness of the night
or a great blaze of fire
in the dense darkness of the night?"

"Why, revered sir,
the great blaze of fire
in the dense darkness of the night."

"What do you think about this, Udāyin?"

Of these two lustres,
which is the surpassing and more excellent:
the great blaze of fire
in the dense darkness of the night or the morning star
in a clear cloudless sky
towards dawn?"

"Why, revered sir,
the morning star
in a clear cloudless sky
towards dawn
is the surpassing and more excellent
of these two lustres."

"What do you think about this, Udāyin?"

Of these two lustres,
which is the surpassing and more excellent:
the morning star

in a clear cloudless sky
towards dawn
or the moon at its zenith<sup>10</sup>
in [232] a clear cloudless sky
at midnight
on an Observance day,
a fifteenth?"

"Why, revered sir,
on an Observance day,
a fifteenth,
the moon at its zenith
in a clear cloudless sky
at midnight."

"What do you think about this, Udāyin?"

Of these two lustres,
which is the surpassing and more excellent:
the moon at its zenith
in a clear cloudless sky
at midnight
on an Observance day,
a fifteenth,
or the sun at its zenith
in a clear cloudless sky
at noonday
in the last month of the rains
in the autumn?"

"Why, revered sir,
the sun at its zenith
in a clear cloudless sky
at noonday
in the last month of the rains
in the autumn

is of these two lustres
the surpassing and more excellent."

"Greater than these are those many devas, Udāyin, who do not share in<sup>11</sup> the brilliance of these moons and suns -
that I comprehend.

But then I do not say:

'There is no other lustre
superior to
or more excellent than this lustre.'

But you, Udāyin,
although this lustre of a glow-worm
or a fire-fly
is feebler and poorer,
say it is the highest lustre.

And you do not point to that lustre.

"The Lord has settled the talk, the Well-farer has settled the talk."

"But why do you, Udāyin, speak thus:

'The Lord has settled the talk, the Well-farer has settled the talk?'"

"Revered sir, our own teachers speak thus:

'This is the highest lustre,
this is the highest lustre.'

But these teachers of ours, revered sir,
on being questioned,
cross-questioned

and pressed for reasons by the Lord, are empty,
void
and have fallen short."<sup>12</sup>

---

"But, Udāyin, is there a world that is exclusively happy?

Is there a reasoned course<sup>13</sup>
for realising a world that is exclusively happy?"

"Revered sir, our own teachers speak thus:

"There is a world that is exclusively happy;
there is a reasoned course
for realising a world that is exclusively happy."

"And which, Udāyin, is this reasoned course for reaching a world that is exclusively happy?"

"As to this, revered sir, someone,
giving up onslaught on creatures,
abstains from onslaught on creatures;
giving up taking what has not been given,
he abstains from taking what has not been given;
giving up wrong conduct in regard to sense-pleasures, he abstains from wrong conduct in regard to sense-pleasures;
giving up lying [233] speech, he abstains from lying speech;
or he lives undertaking a certain asceticism."<sup>14</sup>

This, revered sir, is a reasoned course
for realising a world that is exclusively happy."

"What do you think about this, Udāyin?"

At the time when,
giving up onslaught on creatures,
he abstains from onslaught on creatures, is the self at that time exclusively happy
or is it happy and sorrowful?"

"It is happy and sorrowful, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, Udāyin?"

At the time when giving up taking what has not been given,
he abstains from taking what has not been given,
is the self at that time exclusively happy
or is it happy and sorrowful?"

"It is happy and sorrowful, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, Udāyin?"

At the time when giving up wrong conduct in regard to sense-pleasures, he abstains from wrong conduct in regard to sense-pleasures,
is the self at that time exclusively happy
or is it happy and sorrowful?"

"It is happy and sorrowful, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, Udāyin?"

At the time when, giving up lying speech,
he abstains from lying speech,
is the self at that time exclusively happy
or is it happy and sorrowful?"

"It is happy and sorrowful, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, Udāyin?"

At the time when he lives undertaking some asceticism,
is the self at that time exclusively happy
or is it happy and sorrowful?"

"It is happy and sorrowful, revered sir,"

"What do you think about this, Udāyin?"

Is not then the course
for realising a world that is exclusively happy one that is both happy and sorrowful?"

"The Lord has settled this talk,
the Well-farer has settled this talk."

"But why do you, Udāyin, speak thus:

'The Lord has settled this talk,
the Well-farer has settled this talk'?"

"Revered sir, our own teachers speak thus:

'There is a world that is exclusively happy,
there is a reasoned course
for realising a world that is exclusively happy.'

But these teachers of ours, revered sir,
on being questioned,
cross-questioned
and pressed for reasons by the Lord,
are empty,
void,
and have fallen short.

But, revered sir, is there a world that is exclusively happy?

Is there a reasoned course
for realising a world that is exclusively happy?"

"There is indeed, Udāyin, a world that is exclusively happy.

There is a reasoned course
for realising a world that is exclusively happy."

"And which, revered sir, is this reasoned course
for realising a world that is exclusively happy?"

"As to this, Udāyin, a monk,
aloof from pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
enters and abides in the first meditation,
which is accompanied by initial thought and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness
and is rapturous and joyful.

By allaying initial and discursive thought,
the mind subjectively tranquillised
and fixed on one point, he enters and abides in the second [234] meditation,
which is devoid of initial and discursive thought,
is born of concentration
and is rapturous and joyful.

By the fading out of rapture,
he dwells with equanimity,
attentive and clearly conscious,
and experiences in his person
that joy of which the ariyans say:

'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful',
and he enters and abides in the third meditation.

This, Udāyin, is that reasoned course for realising a world that is exclusively happy."

"But this, revered sir, is not a reasoned course
for realising a world that is exclusively happy.

For the world that is exclusively happy might have been already realised."

"Indeed, Udāyin,
a world that is exclusively happy could not have been already realised.

For this is itself the reasoned course for realising a world that is exclusively happy."

When this had been said, the wanderer Sakuludāyin's company shouted out with a loud noise,
a great noise:

"We have heard to here from our own teachers,
we have heard to here from our own teachers.

We comprehend nothing more beyond this."

Then the wanderer Sakuludāyin, having quietened those wanderers,
spoke thus to the Lord:

"But when could that world which is exclusively happy be realised, revered sir?"

"As tō this, Udāyin, a monk, by getting rid of joy
by getting rid of anguish,

by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows,
enters and abides in the fourth meditation,
which has neither anguish nor joy,
and which is entirely purified
by equanimity and mindfulness.

As many as are the devatas that have uprisen in a world that is exclusively happy, he remains and talks
and falls into conversation with these devatas.

Indeed, Udāyin, a world that is exclusively happy might have been already realised."

"Now, revered sir,
is it not for realising this world that is exclusively happy that monks fare the Brahma-faring under the Lord?"

"No, Udāyin, it is not for the sake of realising this world
that is exclusively happy that monks fare the Brahma-faring under me.

There simply are, Udāyin, other things superior and more excellent
for the sake of realising which monks fare the Brahma-faring under me."

"But what, revered sir, are these things
superior and more excellent,
for the sake of realising which monks fare the Brahma-faring under the Lord?"

"As to this, Udāyin,
a Tathāgata arises in the world,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
endowed with (right) knowledge and conduct,
Well-farer,
knower of the worlds,
matchless charioteer of men to be tamed,
teacher of devas and men,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.<sup>15</sup>

He makes known this world
with the devas,
with Māra,
with Brahmā,
creation
with its recluses and brahmans,
its devas and men,
having realised them
by his own super-knowledge.

He teaches dhamma
which is lovely at the beginning, lovely in the middle,
lovely at the ending,
with the spirit and the letter;
he proclaims the Brahma-faring
wholly fulfilled,
quite purified.

A householder
or a householder's son
or one born in another family
hears that dhamma.

Having heard that dhamma,
he gains faith in the Tathāgata.

Endowed with this faith
that he has acquired,
he reflects in this way:

"The household life is confined and dusty;
going forth is of the open;
it is not easy for one who lives in a house
to fare the Brahma-faring
wholly fulfilled,
wholly pure,
polished like a conch-shell.

Suppose now that I,
having cut off hair and beard,
having put on saffron robes,
should go forth from home
into homelessness?'

After a time,
getting rid of his wealth,
be it small or great,
getting rid of his circle of relations,
be it small or great,
having cut off his hair and beard,
having put on saffron robes,
he goes forth from home
into homelessness.

He, being thus one who has gone forth
and who is endowed with the training
and the way of living of monks, abandoning onslaught on creatures,
is one who abstains from onslaught on creatures;

the stick laid aside,
the knife laid aside,
he lives kindly,
scrupulous,
friendly
and compassionate
towards all breathing things and creatures.

Abandoning the taking of what is not given,
he is one who abstains from taking what is not given;
being one who takes (only) what is given,
who waits for what is given,
not by stealing he lives with a self become pure.

Abandoning unchastity,
he is one who is chaste,
keeping remote (from unchastity),
abstaining from dealings with women.

Abandoning lying speech,
he is one who abstains from lying speech,
a truth-speaker,
a bondsman to truth,
trustworthy,
dependable,
no deceiver of the world.

Abandoning slanderous speech,
he is one who abstains from slanderous speech;
having heard something here
he is not one for repeating it elsewhere
for (causing) variance among these (people),
or having heard something elsewhere
he is not one to repeat it there
for (causing) variance among these (people).

In this way
he is a reconciler of those who are at variance,
and one who combines those who are friends.

Concord is his pleasure,
concord his delight,
concord his joy,
concord is the motive of his speech.

Abandoning harsh speech,
he is one who abstains from harsh speech.

Whatever speech is gentle,
pleasing to the ear,
affectionate,
going to the heart,
urbane,
pleasant to the manyfolk,
agreeable to the manyfolk -
he comes to be one who utters speech like this.

Abandoning frivolous chatter,
he is one who abstains from frivolous chatter.

He is a speaker at a right time,
a speaker of fact,
a speaker on the goal,
a speaker on dhamma,
a speaker on discipline,
he speaks words that are worth treasuring,
with similes at a right time
that are discriminating,
connected with the goal.

He comes to be one who abstains
from what involves destruction to seed-growth,
to vegetable growth.

He comes to be one who eats one meal a day,
refraining at night,
abstaining from eating at a wrong time.

He comes to be one who abstains from watching shows of dancing, singing,
music.

He comes to be one who abstains
from using garlands,
scents,
unguents,
adornments,
finery.

He comes to be one who abstains
from using high beds,
large beds.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting gold and silver.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting raw grain.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting raw meat.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting women and girls.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting women slaves and men slaves.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting goats and sheep.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting fowl and swine.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting elephants, cows, horses, mares.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting fields and sites.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting messages or going on such.

He comes to be one who abstains from buying and selling.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting from cheating with weights.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting from cheating with bronzes.

He comes to be one who abstains
from cheating with measures.

He comes to be one who abstains
from the crooked ways of bribery, fraud and deceit.

He comes to be one who abstains
from maiming, murdering, manacling, highway robbery.

He comes to be contented
with the robes for protecting his body,
with the almsfood for sustaining his stomach.

Wherever he goes
he takes these things with him as he goes.

As a bird on the wing
wherever it flies

takes its' wings with it as it flies,
so a monk,
contented with the robes for protecting his body,
with the almsfood for sustaining his stomach,
wherever he goes
takes these things with him as he goes.

He, possessed of the ariyan body of moral habit, subjectively experiences unsullied well-being.

Having seen a material shape with the eye,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of sight uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of sight,
he comes to control over the organ of sight.

Having heard a sound with the ear,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of hearing uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of hearing,
he comes to control over the organ of hearing.

Having smelt a smell with the nose,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of smell uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of smell,
he comes to control over the organ of smell.

Having savoured a taste with the tongue,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of taste uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of taste,
he comes to control over the organ of taste.

Having felt a touch with the body,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of touch uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of touch,

he comes to control over the organ of touch.

Having cognised a mental object with the mind,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he lives with this organ of mind uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of mind,
he comes to control over the organ of mind.

If he is possessed of this ariyan control of the (sense-) organs,
he subjectively experiences unsullied well-being.

Whether he is setting out
or returning,
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is looking down
or looking round,
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is bending back
or stretching out (his arm),
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is carrying his outer cloak,
his bowl,
his robe,
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is munching,
drinking,
eating,
savouring,
he is one who comports himself properly;

whether he is obeying the calls of nature,
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is walking,
standing,
asleep,
awake,
talking,
silent,
he is one who comports himself properly.

Possessed of this ariyan body of moral habit and possessed of this ariyan control of the (sense-) organs and possessed of this ariyan mindfulness
and clear consciousness,
he chooses a remote lodging in a forest,
at the root of a tree,
on a mountain slope,
in a wilderness,
in a hill-cave,
in a cemetery,
in a forest haunt,
in the open
or on a heap of straw.

He, returning from alms-gathering
after his meal,
sits down cross-legged
holding the back erect,
having made mindfulness
rise up in front of him.

He, having got rid of covetousness for the world,
lives with a mind devoid of coveting,
he purifies the mind of coveting.

By getting rid of the taint of ill-will,
he lives benevolent in mind;
and compassionate for the welfare
of all creatures and beings,
he purifies the mind of the taint of ill-will.

By getting rid of sloth and torpor,
he lives devoid of sloth and torpor;
perceiving the light,
mindful and clearly conscious,
he purifies the mind of sloth and torpor.

By getting rid of restlessness and worry,
he lives calmly,
the mind subjectively tranquillised,
he purifies the mind of restlessness and worry.

By getting rid of doubt,
he lives doubt-crossed;
unperplexed as to the states that are skilled,
he purifies his mind of doubt.

He, by getting rid Of these five hindrances - defilements of a mind and weakening to intuitive wisdom - aloof from pleasure of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
enters and abides in the first meditation,
which is accompanied by initial thought and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness
and is rapturous and joyful.

This is a thing, Udāyin,
superior and more excellent,
for the sake of realising which
monks fare the Brahma-faring under me.

And again, Udāyin, a monk,
by allaying initial and discursive thought,
the mind subjectively tranquillised
and fixed on one point,
enters and abides in the second meditation,
which is devoid of initial and discursive thought,
is born of concentration
and is rapturous and joyful.

This is a thing, Udāyin,
superior and more excellent,
for the sake of realising which
monks fare the Brahma-faring under me.

And again, Udāyin, a monk,
by the fading out of rapture,
dwells with equanimity,
attentive and clearly conscious,
and experiences in his person
that joy of which the ariyans say:

'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful',

and he enters and abides in the third meditation.

This is a thing, Udāyin,
superior and more excellent,
for the sake of realising which
monks fare the Brahma-faring under me.

And again, Udāyin, a monk,
by getting rid of joy,
by getting rid of anguish,
by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows,
enters and abides in the fourth meditation,
which has neither anguish nor joy,

and which is entirely purified
by equanimity and mindfulness.

This too is a thing, Udāyin,
superior and more excellent,
for the sake of realising which
monks fare the Brahma-faring under me.

Thus with the mind composed,
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
fixed,
immovable,
he directs his mind to the knowledge and recollection of former habitations,<sup>16</sup> that is to say:

One birth,
two births,
three births,
four births,
five births,
ten births,
twenty births,
thirty births,
forty births,
fifty births,
a hundred births,
a thousand births,
a hundred thousand births,
and many an eon of integration
and many an eon of disintegration
and many an eon of integration-disintegration;
such a one was I by name,

having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I came to be in another state
where such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I arose here
and could recollect thus
in all their mode and detail
a variety of former habitations.

This too is a thing, Udāyin,
for the sake of realising which
monks fare the Brahma-faring under me.

Thus with the mind composed,
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
fixed,
immovable,
he directs his mind to the knowledge of the passing hence and coming to be of beings.

With the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
he beholds beings as they are passing hence
and coming to be,
mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going
according to the consequences of their deeds,
thinking:

Indeed these worthy beings
who were possessed of wrong conduct in body,
who were possessed of wrong conduct of speech,
who were possessed of wrong conduct of thought,
scoffers at the ariyans,
holding a wrong view,
incurring deeds consequent on a wrong view -
these, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a sorrowful state,
a bad bourn,
the abyss,
Niraya Hell.

But these worthy beings
who were possessed of good conduct in body,
who were possessed of good conduct in speech,
who were possessed of good conduct in thought,
who did not scoff at the ariyans,
holding a right view,
incurring deeds consequent on a right view -
these, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

And thus with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
he sees beings as they pass hence,
as they arise;
and he comprehends that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going
according to the consequences of deeds.

This too is a thing,
superior and more excellent, Udāyin,
for the sake of realising which
monks fare the Brahma-faring under me.

Thus with the mind composed,
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
fixed,
immovable,
he directs his mind to the knowledge of the destruction of the cankers.

He comprehends as it really is:

This is anguish,
this the arising of anguish,
this the stopping of anguish,
this the course leading to the stopping of anguish.

He comprehends as it really is:

These are the cankers,
this the arising of the cankers,
this the stopping of the cankers,
this the course leading to the stopping of the cankers.

Knowing thus,
seeing thus,
his mind is freed from the canker of sense-pleasures
and his mind is freed from the canker of becoming
and his mind is freed from the canker of ignorance.

In freedom
the knowledge comes to be:

"I am freed";

and he comprehends:

Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.

This too is a thing,
superior and more excellent, Udāyin,
for the sake of realising which
monks fare the Brahma-faring under me.

These, Udāyin, are the things,
superior and more excellent,
for the sake of realising which
monks fare the Brahma-faring under me."

When this had been said,
the wanderer Sakuludāyin spoke thus to [236] the Lord:

"It is excellent, revered sir, excellent, revered sir.

It is as if, revered sir,
one might set upright what had been upset,
or might disclose what was covered,
or point out the way
to one who had gone astray,
or might bring an oil-lamp into the darkness so that those with vision might see material shapes - even so in many a figure is dhamma made clear by the Lord.

I, revered sir, am going to the Lord for refuge
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May I, revered sir,
receive the going forth in the Lord's presence, may I receive ordination?"

When this had been said the company of the wanderer Sakuludāyin spoke thus to him:

"Do not, good Udāyin,
fare the Brahma-faring
under the recluse Gotama;
do not, good Udāyin,
having been a teacher,
live as a pupil.

As what was once a good water-pot might spring a leak, so would be this performance of the good Udāyin.

Do not, good Udāyin,
fare the Brahma-faring
under the recluse Gotama;
do not, good Udāyin,
having been a teacher,
live as a pupil."

It was thus that the company of the wanderer Sakuludāyin made for the wanderer Sakuludāyin a stumbling-block in (the way of) the Brahma-faring under the Lord.<sup>17</sup>

Lesser Discourse to Sakuludāyin:
The Ninth

---

<sup>1</sup> As in Sta. 77; and cf. Stas. 76, 78.

<sup>2</sup> As at M. i. 519.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. M. i. 250.

<sup>4</sup> paṃsupisācaka.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. the following with M. ii. 40. Vaṇṇa is a word of several meanings, such as colour, caste, beauty, appearance, praise.

<sup>6</sup> As at D. i. 241.

<sup>7</sup> appāṭhīrakata bhāsita, as at M. ii. 41, D. i. 193, 239, 242, 244. MA. iii. 273 explains as anniyānika amūlaka niratthaka, what does not lead onwards, is groundless and without a goal. Cf. appāṭhāriya at M. ii. 9.

<sup>8</sup> Cf. M. ii. 17.

<sup>9</sup> Cf. M. ii. 228. MA. iii. 273 says it is said that at the time of dying the self shines as though in the world of the Subhakiṇha devas.

<sup>10</sup> abhido. MA. iii. 274 says: gaganamajjhe ... majjhantike.

<sup>11</sup> nānubhonti, not to share in, draw on or derive from.

<sup>12</sup> As at M. i. 233.

<sup>13</sup> ākāravatī paṭipadā. Cf. ākāravatī saddhā, a reasoned faith, at M. i. 320.

<sup>14</sup> tapogūṇa.

<sup>15</sup> As in M. Sta. 27 (see M.L.S. i. 223 ff.), and M. Sta. 51. M. ii. 38 does not repeat.

<sup>16</sup> See M.L.S. i. 28.

<sup>17</sup> MA. iii. 275 says because he did not obtain the going forth they made this disturbance; and that later (i.e. anāgate, in the future), in the time of Āsoka, he became the thera called Assagutta (see Miln. 6 ff., VbhA. 272, Asl. 419) who was topmost of abiders in (the meditation on) friendliness, even extending a mind of friendliness to animals. It is because the Buddha knew that this would be so that he taught dhamma to Sakuludāyin.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
3. Paribbājaka Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Wanderers

80. Discourse to Vekhanassa

Vekhanassa Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapindika's monastery.

Then the wanderer Vekhanassa<sup>1</sup> approached the Lord; having approached, [237] he greeted the Lord;
and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he stood at a respectful distance.

As he was standing at a respectful distance, the wanderer Vekhanassa uttered a solemn utterance
in the Lord's presence:

"This is the highest lustre,
this is the highest lustre."

"But why do you, Kaccāna,<sup>2</sup> speak thus:

'This is the highest lustre,
this is the highest lustre?'

Which is this highest lustre?"

"Good Gotama, there is no other lustre
superior to
or more excellent than this lustre, it is the highest lustre."

"But which, Kaccāna, is this lustre
than which there is no other lustre superior or more excellent?"

"Good Gotama, there is no other lustre
superior to
or more excellent than this lustre,
it is the highest lustre."

"You would be long in expanding this, Kaccāna.

You say:

'Good Gotama, there is no other lustre
superior to
or more excellent than this lustre,
it is the highest lustre.'

But you do not point to this lustre.

Kaccāna, it is as though a man should say:

'Whoever is the belle of this countryside,
I want her,

I desire her.'<sup>3</sup>

Another man might say to him:

'My good man,
do you know whether this belle of the countryside
whom you want and desire
is a noble maiden
or a brahmin
or a merchant
or a worker?'

Asked this, he would say:

'No.'

The other might say to him:

'My good man,
do you know the name
or the clan
of this belle of the countryside
whom you want and desire?'

Asked this, he would say:

'No.'

The other might say to him:

'My good man,
do you know whether she is tall
or short
or of medium height,
or dark
or brown
or sallow;

or what village
or market town
or what town
she belongs to?'

Asked this, he might say:

'No.'

The other might speak to him thus:

'My good man,
do you want and desire
her whom you know not,
see not?'

Asked this, he might say:

'Yes.'

What do you think about this, Kaccāna?

This being so,
surely that man's irresponsible talk
does not prosper him?"

"Certainly, revered sir,
this being so,
that man's irresponsible talk
does not prosper him."

"But even so do you, Kaccāna, say:

'Revered sir, there is no other lustre
superior to
or more excellent than this lustre,
it is the highest lustre.'

But you do not point to this lustre."

---

"Revered sir, as an emerald jewel,
of lovely water,
well cut into eight facets,
if placed on a pale piece of cloth
shines and gleams and glows -
of such a lustre
is the hale self after dying."

---

"What do you think about this, Kaccāna?"

Of these two lustres,
which is the surpassing and more excellent:
that emerald jewel,
of lovely water,
cut into eight facets
that, if placed on a pale piece of cloth
shines and gleams and glows;
or some glow-worm
or fire-fly
in the dense darkness of the night?"

"Why, revered sir, of these two lustres,
the surpassing and more excellent
is the glow-worm

or fire-fly
in the dense darkness of the night."

"What do you think about this, Kaccāna?

Of these two lustres,
which is the surpassing and more excellent:
the glow-worm
or fire-fly
in the dense darkness of the night
or an oil-lamp
in the dense darkness of the night?"

"Why, revered sir, the oil-lamp."

"What do you think about this, Kaccāna?

Of these two lustres,
which is the surpassing and more excellent:
the oil-lamp
in the dense darkness of the night
or a great blaze of fire
in the dense darkness of the night?"

"Why, revered sir,
the great blaze of fire
in the dense darkness of the night."

"What do you think about this, Kaccāna?

Of these two lustres,
which is the surpassing and more excellent:
the great blaze of fire
in the dense darkness of the night
or the morning star
in a clear cloudless sky
towards dawn?"

"Why, revered sir,
the morning star
in a clear cloudless sky
towards dawn
is the surpassing and more excellent
of these two lustres."

"What do you think about this, Kaccāna?"

Of these two lustres,
which is the surpassing and more excellent:
the morning star
in a clear cloudless sky
towards dawn
or the moon at its zenith
in a clear cloudless sky
at midnight
on an Observance day,
a fifteenth?"

"Why, revered sir,
on an Observance day,
a fifteenth,
the moon at its zenith
in a clear cloudless sky
at midnight."

"What do you think about this, Kaccāna?"

Of these two lustres,
which is the surpassing and more excellent:
the moon at its zenith
in a clear cloudless sky
at midnight
on an Observance day,
a fifteenth,

or the sun at its zenith
in a clear cloudless sky
at noonday
in the last month of the rains
in the autumn?"

"Why, revered sir,
the sun at its zenith
in a clear cloudless sky
at noonday
in the last month of the rains
in the autumn
is of these two lustres
the surpassing and more excellent."

"Greater than these are those many devas, Kaccāna, who do not share in the brilliance
of these moons and suns -
that I comprehend.

But then I do not say:

'There is no other lustre
superior to
or more excellent than this lustre.'

But you, Kaccāna,
although this lustre of a glow-worm
or a fire-fly
is feebler and poorer,
say it is the highest lustre.

And you do not point to that lustre.

---

These five, Kaccāna, are the strands of sense-pleasures.<sup>4</sup>

Which five?

Material shapes cognisable by the eye,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

Sounds cognisable by the ear,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

Smells cognisable by the nose,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

Tastes cognisable by the tongue,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,

connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

Touches cognisable by the body,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

These, Kaccana, are the five strands of sense-pleasures.

Whatever happiness, Kaccāna, whatever pleasure
arises in consequence of these five strands of sense-pleasure, this is called happiness in sense-pleasures.

Thus, because of sense-pleasures there is happiness in sense-pleasures;
from happiness in sense-pleasures the topmost happiness in sense-pleasures<sup>5</sup> is there accounted topmost."

When this had been said,
the wanderer Vekhanassa spoke thus to [238] the Lord:

"It is wonderful, good Gotama, it is marvellous, good Gotama.

So far this is well spoken by the good Gotama:

'Because of sense-pleasures
there is happiness in sense-pleasures;
from happiness in sense-pleasures

the topmost happiness in sense-pleasures is there accounted topmost."

"Hard is this for you to understand, Kaccāna - sense-pleasures,
or the happiness in sense-pleasures,
or the topmost happiness in sense-pleasures - you who are of another view, another allegiance,
another objective,
of a different observance and under a different teacher.<sup>6</sup>

But those monks, Kaccāna, who are perfected ones,
the cankers destroyed,
who have lived the life,
done what was to be done,
shed the burden,
who have attained their own goal,
the fetters of becoming utterly destroyed,
and who are freed by perfect profound knowledge - these would know:
sense-pleasures,
or the happiness in sense-pleasures,
or the topmost happiness in sense-pleasures."

When this had been said,
the wanderer Vekhanassa, angry and displeased,
scorning even the Lord,
despising even him,
saying<sup>7</sup> even of him:

"The recluse Gotama shall be disgraced,"

spoke thus to the Lord:

"But it is just that there are here some recluses and brahmans
who, not knowing the past,
not seeing the future,
yet claim:

'Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.'

This speech of theirs
proves merely ridiculous, worthless,
empty,
void."<sup>8</sup>

"This censure is only just, Kaccāna, for those recluses and brahmans
who, not knowing the past,
not seeing the future,
yet claim:

'Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.'

But, Kaccāna,
let be the past,
let be the future."<sup>9</sup>

Let there come an intelligent man, guileless,
honest,

straight,
and who says:

'I instruct,
I teach dhamma.<sup>10</sup>

Faring along as instructed
it will not be long before (some man)
of himself will know,
of himself will see.'

Even so, indeed,
is deliverance from the direst bond -
that is from the bond of ignorance.

Kaccāna, it is like a young baby boy lying on his [239] back and bound around his neck with a fivefold swaddling, it might be with swaddlings of thread.

As he grows up and develops his faculties he would be released from those swaddlings, and in the absence of swaddlings he would know:

'I am released.'

Even so, Kaccāna, let there come intelligent man,
guileless,
honest,
straight,
and who says:

'I instruct, I teach dhamma.

Faring along as instructed
it will not be long before (some man)
of himself will know,
of himself will see.'

Even so, indeed,
is deliverance from the direst bond -
that is from the bond of ignorance."

When this had been said,
the wanderer Vekhanassa spoke thus to the Lord:

"It is excellent, good Gotama,
excellent, good Gotama.

Revered sir, it is as if one might set upright what had been upset,
or might disclose what was covered,
or show the way
to one who had gone astray, or bring an oil-lamp into the darkness so that those with vision might see material shapes —
even so in many a figure has dhamma been made clear by the Lord.

I, revered sir, am going to the Lord for refuge
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the Lord accept me as a lay follower going for refuge
from this day forth
for as long as life lasts."

Discourse to Vekhanassa:
The Tenth

Division on Wanderers:
The Third

---

<sup>1</sup> MA. iii. 277 says he was the teacher of Sakuludāyin (of Stas. 77 and 79). Wishing to find out why his pupil had been defeated by Gotama, and to defeat him himself on the question of the highest lustre, he went the forty-five yojanas from Rājagaha to Sāvattthī.

<sup>2</sup> Kaccāna (or Kaccāyana) was the name of a gotta, a family or clan. Presumably therefore Vekhanassa belonged to this clan.

<sup>3</sup> Exactly as in the preceding Discourse, above, p. 230.

<sup>4</sup> As at M. i. 85.

<sup>5</sup> MA. iii. 277 calls this nibbāna.

<sup>6</sup> As at M. i. 487.

<sup>7</sup> vadamāno. This passage is also found at M. ii. 200, D. i. 90; at the latter the reading is upavadamāno, insulting.

<sup>8</sup> Cf. D. i. 240.

<sup>9</sup> As at M. ii. 32. MA. iii. 278 says Gotama said this because the wanderer had no knowledge of former habitations making it suitable to talk about the past; and no knowledge of the deva-vision making it suitable to talk about the future.

<sup>10</sup> As at Vin. i. 9, where the sentence is attributed to Gotama himself.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
4. Rāja Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
4. The Royal Division

81. Discourse on Ghaṭikāra

Ghaṭikāra Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time<sup>1</sup> the Lord was walking on tour among the Kosalans together with a large Order of monks.

Then the Lord, turning aside from the road, smiled (when he came to a) certain place.

Then it occurred to the venerable Ānanda:

"What is the cause,
what the reason
that the Lord is smiling?"

Not without motive
do Tathāgatas smile."

Then the venerable Ānanda,
having arranged his robe over one shoulder,
having saluted the Lord with joined palms,
spoke thus to the Lord:

"Now, revered sir, what is the cause,
what the reason
that the Lord is smiling?

Not without motive
do Tathāgatas smile."

"Once upon a time, Ānanda,
in this district
there was a village township called Vebhaḷiṅga, prosperous and wealthy
and crowded with people.

And, Ānanda, the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, lived depending on the village township of Vebhaḷiṅga,.

At that time, Ānanda,
the monastery of the Lord Kassapa<sup>2</sup> was here.

At that time, ṅanda,
the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, instructed an Order of monks while he was seated here."

Then the venerable Ānanda, having laid down an outer cloak folded into four,
spoke thus to the Lord:

"Well then, revered sir, let the Lord sit down.

This self-same piece of ground will (then) have been made use of

by two perfected ones,
fully Self-Awakened Ones."

Then the Lord sat down on the appointed seat.

As he was seated
the Lord spoke thus to the venerable Ānanda:

"Once upon a time, Ānanda,
in this district
there was a village township called Vebhaḷiṅga, prosperous and wealthy
and crowded with people.

And, Ānanda,
the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
lived depending on the village township of Vebhaḷiṅga,.

At that time, Ānanda,
the monastery of the Lord Kassapa was here.

At that time, ṭnanda,
the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, instructed an Order of monks while he was seated here."

And, Ānanda,
in the village township of Vebhaḷiṅga, the potter named Ghaṭīkāra was a supporter - the chief supporter -
of the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

And, Ānanda,
a brahman youth named [244] Jotipāla<sup>3</sup> was a friend - a dear friend - of the potter Ghaṭīkāra.

Then, Ānanda,
the potter Ghaṭīkāra addressed the brahman youth Jotipāla, saying:

'Let us go, dear Jotipāla, we will approach the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened
One,
so as to see him.

A sight of this Lord, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
would be greatly prized by me.'

When this had been said, Ānanda, the brahman youth Jotipāla spoke thus
to the potter Ghaṭīkāra:

'Yes, dear Ghaṭīkāra,
but of what use is it
to see this little shaveling recluse?

And a second time, Ānanda,
the potter Ghaṭīkāra addressed the brahman youth Jotipāla, saying:

'Let us go, dear Jotipāla,
we will approach the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened
One,
so as to see him.

A sight of this Lord, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
would be greatly prized by me.'

When this had been said, Ānanda,
the brahman youth Jotipāla spoke thus
to the potter Ghaṭīkāra:

'Yes, dear Ghaṭīkāra,
but of what use is it
to see this little shaveling recluse?

And a third time, Ānanda, did Ghaṭīkāra the potter speak thus to the brahman youth Jotipāla:

'Let us go, dear Jotipāla, we will approach the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
so as to see him.

A sight of this Lord, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
would be greatly prized by me.'

When this had been said, Ānanda,
the brahman youth Jotipāla spoke thus
to the potter Ghaṭīkāra:

'Yes, dear Ghaṭīkāra,
but of what use is it
to see this little shaveling recluse?

'Well then, dear Jotipāla, taking a back-scratcher and bath-powder,
we will go to the river to bathe.'

Ānanda, the brahman youth Jotipāla answered the potter Ghaṭīkāra in assent, saying:

' Yes, dear.'

Then, Ānanda, the potter Ghaṭīkāra
and the brahman youth Jotipāla,
taking a back-scratcher and bath-powder,
went to the river to bathe.

Then, Ānanda,
the potter Ghaṭīkāra spoke thus to the brahman youth Jotipāla:

'This, dear Jotipāla,
is near the monastery
of the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

Let us go, dear Jotipāla,
we will approach the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened
One,
so as to see him.

A sight of this Lord, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
would be greatly prized by me.'

When this had been said, Ānanda,
the brahman youth Jotipāla spoke thus
to the potter Ghaṭikāra:

'Yes, dear Ghaṭikāra,
but of what use is it
to see this little shaveling recluse?'

And a second time Ānanda, the potter Ghaṭikāra spoke thus
to the brahman youth Jotipāla:

'This, dear Jotipāla,
is near the monastery
of the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

Let us go, dear Jotipāla,
we will approach the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened
One,
so as to see him.

A sight of this Lord, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
would be greatly prized by me.'

When this had been said, Ānanda,
the brahman youth Jotipāla spoke thus
to the potter Ghaṭīkāra:

'Yes, dear Ghaṭīkāra,
but of what use is it
to see this little shaveling recluse?'

And a third time, Ānanda, did Ghaṭīkāra the potter speak thus
to the brahman youth Jotipāla:

'This, dear Jotipāla,
is near the monastery
of the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

A sight of this Lord, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
would be greatly prized by me.'

And a third time, Ānanda, did the brahman youth Jotipāla speak thus
to the potter Ghaṭīkāra:

'Yes, dear Ghaṭīkāra,
but of what use is it
to see this little shaveling recluse?'

Then, Ānanda, the potter Ghaṭīkāra, having laid hold of the brahman youth Jotipāla by the waist-band,
spoke thus:

'This, dear [245] Jotipāla,
is near the monastery
of the Lord Kassapa.

Let us go, dear Jotipāla,
we will approach the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened

One
so as to see him.

A sight of this Lord, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
would be greatly prized by me.'

Then, Ānanda,
the brahman youth Jotipāla, having disengaged his waist-band, spoke thus to the potter Ghaṭikāra:

'Yes, dear Ghaṭikāra,
but of what use is it
to see this little shaveling recluse?

Then, Ānanda, the potter Ghaṭikāra, having laid hold of the brahman youth Jotipāla by the hair - he had just performed an ablution of his head -
spoke thus:

'This, dear Jotipāla,
is near the monastery
of the Lord Kassapa.

Let us go, dear Jotipāla,
we will approach the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened
One
so as to see him.

A sight of this Lord, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
would be greatly prized by me.'

Then, Ānanda, it occurred to the brahman youth Jotipāla:

'Indeed it is wonderful,
indeed it is marvellous,
that this potter Ghaṭikāra, being of lowly birth,

should lay hold of my hair although I have performed an ablution of my head, and thinking:ed1

'Indeed this<sup>4</sup> surely cannot be insignificant.'

he spoke thus to the potter Ghaṭikāra:

'Is it really necessary,<sup>5</sup> dear Ghaṭikāra?'

'It is really necessary, dear Jotipāla, most surely a sight of this Lord, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
would be greatly prized by me.'

'Well then, dear Ghaṭikāra, let go (of my hair);
we will get along.'

Then, Ānanda, the potter Ghaṭikāra
and the brahman youth Jotipāla approached the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

When they had approached,
Ghaṭikāra the potter greeted the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
and sat down at a respectful distance.

But the brahman youth Jotipāla exchanged greetings with the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

And, Ānanda,
as the potter Ghaṭikāra was sitting down at a respectful distance, he spoke thus to the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened
One:

'Revered sir, this brahman youth Jotipāla is my friend - my dear friend.

Let the Lord teach him dhamma.

Then, Ānanda, the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, gladdened, roused, incited, delighted the potter Ghaṭṭikāra and the brahman youth Jotipāla, with talk on dham- [246] ma.<sup>6</sup>

Then, Ānanda, the potter Ghaṭṭikāra and the brahman youth Jotipāla, gladdened, roused, incited, delighted by the Lord Kassapa's talk on dhamma, having rejoiced in what the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, had said, having given thanks and risen from their seats, greeting the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, they departed keeping their right sides towards him.

Then, Ānanda, the brahman youth Jotipāla spoke thus to the potter Ghaṭṭikāra:

'How is it that you, dear Ghaṭṭikāra, on hearing this dhamma, do not go forth from home into homelessness?

'But, dear Jotipāla, do you not know that I look after my blind and ageing parents?

'Well then, dear Ghaṭīkāra,
I will go forth from home into homelessness.'

Then, Ānanda, the potter Ghaṭīkāra
and the brahman youth Jotipāla approached the Lord Kassapa; having approached and having greeted the Lord Kassapa, perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
they sat down at a respectful distance.

And, Ānanda, as Ghaṭīkāra the potter was sitting down at a respectful distance, he spoke thus to the Lord Kassapa:

'Revered sir, this brahman youth Jotipāla is my friend - my dear friend.

May the Lord let him go forth.'

Ānanda, Jotipāla the brahman youth received the going forth in the presence of the Lord Kassapa,<sup>7</sup> perfected one, fully Self-Awakened
One,
he received the ordination.

Then, Ānanda, not long after the brahman youth Jotipāla had received ordination -
half a month after his ordination -
the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, having stayed at Vebhaṅga, for as long as he found suitable,
set out on tour for Benares;
walking on tour,
in due course he arrived at Benares.

While he was there, Ānanda, the Lord Kassapa, stayed near Benares at Isipatana in the deer-park.

Ānanda, Kikī, the king of Kāsi, heard that the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One had arrived at Benares and was staying near Benares at Isipatana in the deer-park.

Then, Ānanda, Kikī, the king of Kāsi,
having had many lovely vehicles harnessed, having mounted a lovely vehicle, set off for Benares with the many lovely vehicles and with great royal pomp so as to see the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

For as long as the ground was possible for a vehicle he went in the vehicle, then having dismounted from it, he approached the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, on foot;
having approached
and having greeted the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened
One,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

Ānanda, as Kikī, the king of Kāsi,
was sitting down at a respectful distance,
the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One,
roused,
incited,
gladdened [247]
and delighted him with talk on dhamma.

Then, Ānanda, Kikī, the king of Kāsi,
roused,
delighted by the Lord Kassapa
with talk on dhamma,
spoke thus to the Lord Kassapa:

'Revered sir, may the Lord consent to a meal with me on the morrow together with the Order of monks.'

Ānanda, the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One consented by becoming silent.

Then, Ānanda, Kikī the king of Kāsi, having understood the Lord Kassapa's consent,
rising from his seat
and greeting the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, departed keeping his right side towards him.

Then, Ānanda, towards the end of that night when Kikī, the king of Kāsi, had had sumptuous foods,
solid and soft,
prepared in his own dwelling:
dry yellow rices,<sup>8</sup> various curries,
the black grains removed,
and various condiments, he had the time announced to the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, saying:

'It is time, revered sir,
the meal is ready.'

Then, Ānanda, the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, having dressed in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe,
approached the dwelling of Kikī, the king of Kāsi;
having approached,
he sat down on the appointed seat
together with the Order of monks.

Then, Ānanda, Kikī, the king of Kāsi, with his own hand served and satisfied with sumptuous foods,

solid and soft,
the Order of monks
with the Awakened One at its head.

Then, Ānanda, when the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One had eaten and had withdrawn his hand from the bowl, Kikī, the king of Kāsi, taking a low seat,
sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Kikī, the king of Kāsi spoke thus to the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One:

'Revered sir, may the Lord consent to (accept) my rains-residence in Benares;
there will be suitable support for the Order.'

'No, sire, I have (already) consented to (accept) a rains-residence.'

And a second time Kikī, the king of Kāsi spoke thus to the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One:

'Revered sir, may the Lord consent to (accept) my rains-residence in Benares;
there will be suitable support for the Order.'

'No, sire, I have (already) consented
to (accept) a rains-residence.'

And a third time, Ānanda, did Kikī, the king of Kāsi, speak thus to the Lord Kassapa:

'Revered sir, may the Lord consent
to (accept) my rains-residence in Benares;

there will be suitable support for the Order.'

'No, sire, I have (already) consented
to (accept) a rains-residence.'

Then, Ānanda, Kikī, the king of Kāsi thought:

'The Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One does not consent
to (accept) my rains-residence in Benares, and he was depressed and grieved.<sup>9</sup>

Then, Ānanda, Kikī, the king of Kāsi, spoke thus to the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One:

'Then, have you, revered sir, some other supporter than me?

'There is, sire, a village township called Vebhaṅga,.

There is a [248] potter there called Ghaṭikāra; he is my supporter -
the chief supporter.

But you, sire, think:

The Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, does not consent
to (accept) my rains-residence in Benares, and you are depressed and grieved.

This is not so with the potter Ghaṭikāra and nor can it be so.

For, sire, the potter Ghaṭikāra has gone to the Awakened One for refuge, he has gone to dhamma for refuge, he has gone to the Order for refuge.

Ghaṭṭikāra, the potter, sire,
is restrained from onslaught on creatures,
restrained from taking what has not been given,
restrained from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures, restrained from lying speech, restrained from occasions of sloth engendered by strong drink and spirits.

Ghaṭṭikāra the potter, sire,
is possessed of unwavering confidence in the Awakened One unwavering confidence in dhamma unwavering confidence the Order, he is possessed of moral habits that are dear to the ariyans.

Ghaṭṭikāra the potter, sire, doubts not about anguish he doubts not about the uprising of anguish he doubts not about the stopping of anguish, he doubts not about the course leading to the stopping of anguish.

Ghaṭṭikāra the potter, sire, is a one-meal-man, a Brahma-farer,
virtuous,
lovely in character.

Ghaṭṭikāra the potter, sire,
is one who has laid aside jewels and wrought gold, who is without gold and silver.

Ghaṭṭikāra the potter, sire, does not dig the earth either with a spade or with his own hand;
willingly he makes a vessel from the soil of a bank that is crumbling

or scratched out by rats and dogs,
and he speaks thus:

"He that likes,
if he lays down fragments of husked rice here, fragments of kidney-beans, fragments of chick-peas, may take whatever he likes."10

Ghaṭīkāra the potter, sire, looks after his blind ageing parents.

Ghaṭīkāra the potter, sire, by the destruction of the five fetters binding to this lower (shore), is of spontaneous uprising,
he attains final nibbāna there, he is not liable to return from that world.

At one time I, sire,
was staying in the village township of Vebhaṅga.

Then I, sire,
having dressed in the morning,
taking my bowl and robe,
approached the parents of the potter Ghaṭīkāra;
having approached,
I spoke thus to the parents of the potter Ghaṭīkāra:

"Now, where has this potter11 gone?"

"Revered sir, your supporter has gone out, saying:

Now, having taken conjei from the pot, having taken curry from the cauldron,
enjoy them."

Then I, sire,
having taken conjeŷ from the pot,
having taken curŷ from the cauldron,
enjoyed them,
and rising up from my seat I departed.

Then, sire, Ghaṭikāra the potter approached his parents;
having approached,
he spoke thus to his parents:

"Who is it that,
having taken conjeŷ from the pot,
having taken curŷ from the cauldron
and having enjoyed them,
is going away?"

"It is the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, dear, that, having taken conjeŷ from the pot,
having taken curŷ from the cauldron
and having enjoyed them,
is going away."

Then, sire, it occurred to Ghaṭikāra the potter:

"Indeed it is a gain for me,
indeed it is well gotten by me
that the Lord Kassapa,
has such trust in me."

Then, sire,
joy and happiness did not leave Ghaṭikāra the potter for half a month
or his parents for seven days.

At one time I, sire,
was staying in this very village township of Vebhaḷiṅga,.

Then I, sire,
having dressed in the morning,
taking my bowl and robe,
approached the parents of the potter Ghaṭīkāra;
having approached,
I spoke thus to the parents of the potter Ghaṭīkāra:

"Now, where has this potter gone?"

"Revered sir, your supporter has gone out, saying:

Now, having taken boiled rice from the pan,
having taken curry from the cauldron,
enjoy them."

Then I, sire,
having taken boiled rice from the pan,
having taken curry from the cauldron,
enjoyed them,
and rising up from my seat I departed.

Then, sire, Ghaṭīkāra the potter approached his parents;
having approached,
he spoke thus to his parents:

"Who is it that,
having taken boiled rice from the pan,
having taken curry from the cauldron,
and having enjoyed them,
is going away?"

"It is the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, dear, that, having taken boiled rice from the pan,
having taken curry from the cauldron,
and having enjoyed them,
is going away."

Then, sire, it occurred to Ghaṭṭikāra the potter:

"Indeed it is a gain for me,
indeed it is well gotten by me
that the Lord Kassapa,
has such trust in me."

Then, sire,
joy and happiness did not leave Ghaṭṭikāra the potter for half a month
or his parents for seven days.

At one time I, sire, was staying in this very village township of Vebhaṅga..

At that time the hut leaked.

So I, sire, addressed the monks, saying:

"Go, monks, and find out if there is grass in the dwelling of Ghaṭṭikāra the potter."

When this had been said, sire, the monks spoke thus to me:

"There is no grass, revered sir,
in the dwelling of Ghaṭṭikāra the potter, but his house has a grass roof."

"Go, monks, and strip the grass from the house of Ghaṭṭikāra the potter."

Then, sire, these monks stripped the grass
from the house of Ghaṭṭikāra the potter.

Then, sire, the parents of Ghaṭṭikāra the potter spoke thus to the monks:

"Who are they
that are stripping the grass from the house?"

"Sister,' the monks said,
"the Lord Kassapa's hut is leaking."

"Take it, revered sirs, take it, my honourable friends."<sup>12</sup>

Then, sire, Ghaṭikāra the potter approached his parents;
having approached,
he spoke thus to his parents:

"Who are they
that have stripped the grass from the house?"

"Monks, [250] dear;
the hut of the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, is leaking."

Then, sire, it occurred to Ghaṭikāra the potter:

"Indeed it is a gain for me,
indeed it is well gotten by me that the Lord Kassapa, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, has such trust in me."

Then, sire,
joy and happiness did not leave the potter Ghaṭikāra
for half a month
or his parents for seven days.

Then, sire,
for a whole three months<sup>13</sup> that house stood with its roof open to the sky, but it did not rain into it.

Such a one, sire, is Ghaṭīkāra the potter.'

'It is a gain, revered sir, it is well gotten, revered sir, by Ghaṭīkāra the potter in whom the Lord has such trust.'

Then, Ānanda, Kikī, the king of Kāsi, sent as many as five hundred cartloads of husked rice to Ghaṭīkāra the potter, dry yellow rices
and suitable curries.<sup>14</sup>

Then, Ānanda, these king's men, having approached Ghaṭīkāra the potter,
spoke thus:

'These five hundred cartloads of husked rice, revered sir, have been sent to you by Kikī, the king of Kāsi, with dry yellow rices
and suitable curries.

Accept them, revered sir.

The king is very busy, there is much to be done.'

'I am quite satisfied since this is for me from the king.'

It may be, Ānanda, that this will occur to you:

'Now, at that time
the brahman youth Jotipāla
was someone else.'

But this, Ānanda, should not be thought of in this way.

I, at that time,
was Jotipāla the brahman youth."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the venerable Ānanda rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on Ghaṭikāra: The First

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. A. iii. 214-215 for the opening of this Discourse. For the whole episode, told with some interesting variations, see Mhvu. i. 317 jf.i (Mhvu. Translation i. 265 ff. in S.B.B.).

<sup>2</sup> All references in this Discourse to "the Lord Kassapa" are followed by the terms "perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One." I have omitted this full designation for reasons of space. [Ed.: reinserted for this version.]

<sup>3</sup> At D. ii. 230 called the son of the brahman Govinda. At Jā. i. 43 called the Bodhisatta; see also the end of this Discourse. Cf. Budv. xxv. 10 ff., Miln. 221 ff. Also see the point of controversy at Kvu. 286 [Pts. of Contr. IV.8 p 167] as to whether the Bodhisatta was a Brahma-farer and following the (right) method at the time of the Buddha Kassapa.

<sup>4</sup> "This going (gamana) of ours (to visit the Lord) cannot be insignificant or small; it will be great," MA. iii. 281. The text here may be slightly confused, see v. ll. at M. ii. 47. But all the time Jotipāla was more and more coming over to the idea of visiting the Lord Kassapa.

<sup>5</sup> yāvetadohi pi. MA. iii. 281 gives the meaning as yāvetaparamam, and the sense as: In order to go there, is all this exertion necessary; from pleading, seizing hold of my waist - band and letting it go, and then to the length of taking hold of my hair?

<sup>6</sup> MA. iii. 282 says that this was concerned with the attainment of mindfulness.

<sup>7</sup> MA. iii. 282 says that Bodhisattas go forth in the presence of Buddhas.

<sup>8</sup> paṇḍumuṭṭikassa sālino. MA. iii. 283 says: muṭṭake katvā sukkhāpitassa rattasālino. Tassa kira sālino vappakālato paṭṭhāya ayam parihāro.

<sup>9</sup> As at M. i. 448, 457.

<sup>10</sup> MA. iii. 284-5 says he does not trade in the vessels he has fired. But once people know they can take what they like, they bring him useful materials from the forest.

<sup>11</sup> bhaggava; cf. Kumbhakāra Jātaka, and see PED. This that "seems to have been a generic name for all potters" is here not "a special form of address," as suggested in DPPN.

<sup>12</sup> bhadramukha, as at M. ii. 210; S. i. 74. In translating the word thus, I follow the note at K.S. i. 100.

<sup>13</sup> MA. ill. 286 says that the Lord had already passed one of the four months of the rains before he sent for the grass thatch.

<sup>14</sup> These were to be for him and the Order of monks for three months, MA. iii, 287.

---

<sup>ed1</sup> Ms. Horner has here: 'and should think' which makes no sense.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
4. Rāja Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
4. The Royal Division

82. Discourse with Raṭṭhapāla

Raṭṭhapāla Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord,
walking on tour among the Kurus
together with a large Order of monks arrived at the market [251] town of the Kurus called Thullakoṭṭhita.

The brahmins and householders of Thullakoṭṭhita heard:

"Indeed the recluse Gotama,
the son of the Sakyans,
gone forth from the Sakyan family,
walking on tour among the Kurus
together with a large Order of monks has arrived at Thullakoṭṭhita.

A lovely report about the revered Gotama has gone forth thus:

'This Lord is perfected, wholly Self-Awakened,
endowed with (right) knowledge and conduct,
well-farer,
knower of the worlds,
incomparable charioteer of men to be tamed,
teacher of devas and men,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.

He makes known this world
with the devas,
with Māra,
with Brahma,
creation with its recluses and brahmans,
its devas and men,
having realised them
by his own super-knowledge.

With the meaning and the spirit
he teaches dhamma
that is lovely in the beginning,
lovely in the middle,
lovely at the ending;
he proclaims the Brahma-faring wholly fulfilled,
quite purified.

It were good to see perfected ones like this."

Then the brahmans and householders of Thullakoṭṭhita
approached the Lord;
having approached,
some, having greeted the Lord,
sat down at a respectful distance;

some exchanged greetings with the Lord,
and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
sat down at a respectful distance;
some, having saluted the Lord with joined palms,
sat down at a respectful distance;
some, having made known their names and clans in the Lord's presence,
sat down at a respectful distance;
some, becoming silent,
sat down at a respectful distance.

As the brahmans and householders of Thullakoṭṭhita were sitting down at a respectful distance, the Lord gladdened,
roused,
incited
and delighted them
with a talk on dhamma.

Now at that time
a young man of family named Raṭṭhapāla,<sup>1</sup> the son of a leading family in that very Thullakoṭṭhita, was sitting down in this assembly.

Then it occurred to Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family:<sup>2</sup>

"In so far as I understand dhamma taught by the Lord, it is no easy matter for one living in a house
to fare the Brahma-faring
completely fulfilled,
completely pure
and polished like a conch-shell.

Suppose that I,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
should go forth from home
into homelessness?"

Then the brahmins and householders of Thullakoṭṭhita, gladdened,
roused,
incited
and delighted
by the Lord's talk on dhamma, rejoicing [252] in what the Lord had said and giving thanks for it, rising from their seats and greeting the Lord,
departed keeping their right sides towards him.

And not long after the brahmins and householders of Thullakoṭṭhita had departed,
Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family,
approached the Lord;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance;
sitting down at a respectful distance,
he spoke thus to the Lord:

"In so far as I, revered sir, understand dhamma taught by the Lord, it is no easy matter
for one living in a house
to fare the Brahma-faring
completely fulfilled,
completely pure
and polished like a conch-shell.

I wish, revered sir,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
to go forth from home
into homelessness.

May I, revered sir,
receive the going forth
in the Lord's presence,
may I receive ordination."

"But have you, Raṭṭhapāla, your parents consent
for going forth from home
into homelessness?"

"I have not, revered sir, the consent of my parents
for going forth from home
into homelessness."

"Raṭṭhapāla, Tathāgatas do not allow (one<sup>3</sup>) to go forth without the consent of the parents."

"I, revered sir,
will do whatever is necessary so that my parents will consent to my going forth from home
into homelessness."

Then Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family,
having greeted the Lord
keeping his right side towards him,
rising from his seat
approached his parents;

having approached,
he spoke thus to his parents:

"Mother and father,
in so far as I understand dhamma taught by the Lord,
it is no easy matter
for one living in a home
to fare the Brahma-faring
completely fulfilled,
completely pure,
and polished like a conch-shell.

I wish,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
to go forth from home
into homelessness.

Consent to my going forth from home
into homelessness."

When this had been said,
the parents of Ratthapāla, the young man of family,
spoke thus to him:

"You, dear Ratthapāla,
are our only child,
dear and beloved,
you live in comfort
and are well cared for;
you, dear Ratthapāla,
do not know anything of suffering.

Come you, dear Ratthapāla,
eat and drink
and amuse yourself;
eating,

drinking
and amusing yourself,
you can enjoy diverting yourself
with sense-pleasures
and doing meritorious things.

We do not consent [253]
that you should go forth from home
into homelessness.

If you were to die
we should be desolate without you.

How could we,
while you are living,
consent to your going forth from home
into homelessness?"

■

And a second time Ratthapāla, the young man of family, spoke thus to his parents:

"Mother and father, in so far as I understand dhamma taught by the Lord,
it is no easy matter
for one living in a home
to fare the Brahma-faring
completely fulfilled,
completely pure,
and polished like a conch-shell.

I wish,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
to go forth from home
into homelessness.

Consent to my going forth from home
into homelessness."

And a second time,
when this had been said,
the parents of Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family,
spoke thus to him:

"You, dear Ratṭhapāla,
are our only child,
dear and beloved,
you live in comfort
and are well cared for;
you, dear Ratṭhapāla,
do not know anything of suffering.

Come you, dear Ratṭhapāla,
eat and drink
and amuse yourself;
eating,
drinking
and amusing yourself,
you can enjoy diverting yourself
with sense-pleasures
and doing meritorious things.

We do not consent
that you should go forth from home
into homelessness.

If you were to die
we should be desolate without you.

How could we,
while you are living,
consent to your going forth from home
into homelessness?"

■

And a third time Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family,
spoke thus to his parents:

"Mother and father, in so far as I understand dhamma taught by the Lord,
it is no easy matter
for one living in a home
to fare the Brahma-faring
completely fulfilled,
completely pure,
and polished like a conch-shell.

I wish,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
to go forth from home
into homelessness.

Consent to my going forth from home
into homelessness."

And a third time,
when this had been said,
the parents of Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family,
spoke thus to him:

"You, dear Ratṭhapāla,
are our only child,
dear and beloved,
you live in comfort
and are well cared for;
you, dear Ratṭhapāla,
do not know anything of suffering.

Come you, dear Ratṭhapāla,
eat and drink

and amuse yourself;
eating,
drinking
and amusing yourself,
you can enjoy diverting yourself
with sense-pleasures
and doing meritorious things.

We do not consent
that you should go forth from home
into homelessness.

If you were to die
we should be desolate without you.

How could we,
while you are living,
consent to your going forth from home
into homelessness?"

■

Then Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family, not receiving his parents' consent, lay down there on the bare ground
and said:

"Here will there be death for me or going forth."

Then the parents of Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family,
spoke thus to him:

"You, dear Raṭṭhapāla, are our only child,
dear and beloved,
you live in comfort
and are well cared for;

you, dear Raṭṭhapāla,
do not know anything of suffering.

Get up, dear Raṭṭhapāla,
eat and drink
and amuse yourself;
eating,
drinking,
amusing yourself
you can enjoy diverting yourself with sense-pleasures
and doing meritorious things.

We do not consent
that you should go forth from home
into homelessness.

If you were to die
we should be desolate without you.

How could we,
while you are living,
consent to your going forth from home
into homelessness?"

When this had been said,
Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family,
was silent.

■

And a second time the parents of Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family,
spoke thus to him:

"You, dear Raṭṭhapāla, are our only child,
dear and beloved,
you live in comfort
and are well cared for;

you, dear Ratṭhapāla,
do not know anything of suffering.

Get up, dear Ratṭhapāla,
eat and drink
and amuse yourself;
eating,
drinking,
amusing yourself
you can enjoy diverting yourself with sense-pleasures
and doing meritorious things.

We do not consent
that you should go forth from home
into homelessness.

If you were to die
we should be desolate without you.

How could we,
while you are living,
consent to your going forth from home
into homelessness?"

And a second time, when this had been said, Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family,
was silent.

■

And a third time the parents of Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family,
spoke thus to him:

"You, dear Ratṭhapāla, are our only child,
dear and beloved,
you live in comfort
and are well cared for;

you, dear Ratṭhapāla,
do not know anything of suffering.

Get up, dear Ratṭhapāla,
eat and drink
and amuse yourself;
eating,
drinking,
amusing yourself
you can enjoy diverting yourself with sense-pleasures
and doing meritorious things.

We do not consent
that you should go forth from home
into homelessness.

If you were to die
we should be desolate without you.

How could we,
while you are living,
consent to your going forth from home
into homelessness?"

And a third time, when this had been said, Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family,
was silent.

■

Then the parents of Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family, approached his friends;
having approached,
they spoke thus to them;

"This Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family, is lying down on the bare ground, dears,

and saying:

'Here will there be death for me
or going forth.'

Come, dears, approach Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family;
having approached,
speak thus to him:

'You, good Raṭṭhapāla,
are your parents' only child,
dear and beloved,
you live in comfort
and are well cared for;
you, good Raṭṭhapāla,
do not know anything of suffering.

Get up, good Raṭṭhapāla,
eat and drink
and [254] amuse yourself;
eating,
drinking
and amusing yourself,
you can enjoy diverting yourself with sense-pleasures
and doing meritorious things.

Your parents do not consent
that you should go forth from home
into homelessness.

If you were to die
your parents would be desolate without you.

How can they,
while you are living,

consent to your going forth from home
into homelessness?"

■

Then the friends of Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family, having answered his parents in assent, approached Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family;
and having approached,
they spoke thus to him:

"You, good Ratṭhapāla,
are your parents' only child,
dear and beloved,
you live in comfort
and are well cared for;
you, good Ratṭhapāla,
do not know anything of suffering.

Get up, good Ratṭhapāla,
eat and drink
and amuse yourself;
eating,
drinking
and amusing yourself,
you can enjoy diverting yourself
with sense-pleasures
and doing meritorious things.

Your parents do not consent
that you should go forth from home
into homelessness.

If you were to die
your parents would be desolate without you.

How can they,
while you are living,
consent to your going forth from home
into homelessness?"

When this had been said,
Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family,
was silent.

■

And a second time the friends of Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family,
spoke thus to him:

"You, good Ratṭhapāla,
are your parents' only child,
dear and beloved,
you live in comfort
and are well cared for;
you, good Ratṭhapāla,
do not know anything of suffering.

Get up, good Ratṭhapāla,
eat and drink
and amuse yourself;
eating,
drinking
and amusing yourself,
you can enjoy diverting yourself
with sense-pleasures
and doing meritorious things.

Your parents do not consent
that you should go forth from home
into homelessness.

If you were to die
your parents would be desolate without you.

How can they,
while you are living,
consent to your going forth from home
into homelessness?"

And a second time,
Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family,
was silent.

■

And a third time
did the friends of Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family,
speak thus to him:

"You, good Ratṭhapāla,
are your parents' only child,
dear and beloved,
you live in comfort
and are well cared for;
you, good Ratṭhapāla,
do not know anything of suffering.

Get up, good Ratṭhapāla,
eat and drink
and amuse yourself;
eating,
drinking
and amusing yourself,
you can enjoy diverting yourself
with sense-pleasures
and doing meritorious things.

Your parents do not consent
that you should go forth from home
into homelessness.

If you were to die
your parents would be desolate without you.

How can they,
while you are living,
consent to your going forth from home
into homelessness?"

And a third time,
Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family,
was silent.

■

Then the friends of Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family,
approached his parents;
and having approached,
they spoke thus to them:

"Mother and father,
this Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family,
is lying on the bare pound there saying:

'Here will there be death for me
or going forth.'

If you do not consent that Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family, should go forth from home into homelessness, he will die there.

But if you consent to his going forth from home into homelessness, after he has gone forth you may see him again.

If Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family, does not enjoy the going forth from home
into homelessness,
what alternative will there be for him?

He will come back here.

Consent to the going forth from home
into homelessness
of Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family."

"We consent, dears,
to the going forth from home
into homelessness
of Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family.

But after he has gone forth, he must come and see us."

Then the friends of Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family, approached him;
and having approached,
they spoke thus to him:

"You, good Raṭṭhapāla,
are your parents' only child,
dear and beloved,
you live in comfort
and are well cared for;
you, good Raṭṭhapāla,
do not know anything of suffering.

Get up,
eat and drink

and amuse yourself;
eating,
drinking
and amusing yourself,
you can enjoy diverting yourself
with sense-pleasures
and doing [255] meritorious things.

Your parents have consented to your going forth from home
into homelessness,
but after you have gone forth you must see your parents."

Then Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family, having got up
and regained his strength,
approached the Lord;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family,
spoke thus to the Lord:

"I, revered sir,
have my parents' consent for the going forth from home
into homelessness.

May the Lord let me go forth."

Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family,
received the going forth
in the Lord's presence, he received ordination.

---

Not long after the venerable Raṭṭhapāla had been ordained - half a month after he had been ordained - the Lord, having stayed for as long as he found suitable in Thullakoṭṭhita, set out on tour for Sāvattthī;
and in due course,
walking on tour,
he arrived at Sāvattthī.

While he was there
the Lord stayed near Sāvattthī
in the Jeta Grove
in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla,
dwelling alone,
aloof,
diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
having soon realised
here and now
by his own super-knowledge that incomparable goal of the Brahma-faring for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home
into homelessness,
entering on it,
he abided in it.

And he knew:

"Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.

"And the venerable Raṭṭhapāla
was one of the perfected ones.

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla approached the Lord;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the venerable Raṭṭhapāla spoke thus to the Lord:

"I want, revered sir,
to see my parents,
if the Lord allows me."

Then the Lord
with his mind carefully reflected on the venerable Raṭṭhapāla's reasoning of mind.

When the Lord knew that it was impossible for the venerable Raṭṭhapāla, throwing off the training,
to return to the secular life, then the Lord spoke thus
to the venerable Raṭṭhapāla:

"Do now, Raṭṭhapāla, that for which you think it is the right time."

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla,
rising from his seat,
having greeted the Lord

keeping his right side towards him, having packed away his bedding, set out on tour for Thullakoṭṭhita
taking his bowl and robe;
and in due course,
walking on tour,
he arrived at Thullakoṭṭhita.

[256] While he was there,
the venerable Raṭṭhapāla stayed near Thullakoṭṭhita in the deer-park of the Kuru king.

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla,
dressing in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe,
entered Thullakoṭṭhita for almsfood;
while he was walking on an uninterrupted round for almsfood, he approached his own parents' house.

Now at that time the venerable Raṭṭhapāla's father was having his hair combed in the middle hall which had a door.<sup>4</sup>

He saw the venerable Raṭṭhapāla, coming in the distance, and seeing him,
he spoke thus:

"Our only son,
dear and beloved,
has gone forth among these shaveling recluses."

And the venerable Raṭṭhapāla, received neither alms nor a refusal<sup>5</sup> at his own father's house; all he received was abuse.

Now at that time
the woman slave of the venerable Ratṭhapāla's relations wanted to throw away the previous evening's barley-gruel.

But the venerable Ratṭhapāla spoke thus to her:

"If that, sister,
is to be thrown away,
put it here in my bowl."

Then as the woman slave of the venerable Ratṭhapāla's relations was putting the previous evening's barley-gruel into his bowl
she recognised his hands and feet and voice.

So the woman slave
of the venerable Ratṭhapāla's relations approached his mother,
and having approached,
she spoke thus to her:

"If it please you, madam, you should know that the young master Ratṭhapāla is back."

"Now then, if you speak the truth, you are a freed woman."

Then the venerable Ratṭhapāla's mother approached his father;
and having approached,
she spoke thus to his father:

"If it please you, householder, you should know that Ratṭhapāla, the young man of family, is indeed back."

Now at that time
the venerable Raṭṭhapāla was eating the previous evening's barley-gruel in a room provided for the purpose.<sup>6</sup>

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla's father approached him;
having approached,
he spoke thus to him:

"Can it be, dear Raṭṭhapāla, [257] that you are eating last evening's barley-gruel?

Surely, dear Raṭṭhapāla, you should come into your own home?"

"Where, householder, is there a home for us who have gone forth from home
into homelessness?

We are houseless ones, householder.

I did come to your home, householder; but I received neither alms there nor a refusal;
all I received was abuse."

"Come, dear Raṭṭhapāla, we will go to the house."

"No, householder,
I have done with eating for today."

"Well then, dear Raṭṭhapāla, consent to a meal on the morrow."

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla consented by becoming silent.

And when the venerable Raṭṭhapāla's father had understood that he had consented, he went up to his own dwelling;
and having gone there,
he had a great heap made
of gold coins and gold,
and having had them hidden with screens, he summoned the venerable Raṭṭhapāla's former wives,
and said:

"Come you, daughters-in-law, adorn yourselves with the adornments adorned with which you used to be dear to Raṭṭhapāla, the young man of family, and beloved by him."

And towards the end of that night the venerable Raṭṭhapāla's father, having had sumptuous foods,
solid and soft,
prepared in his own dwelling,
had the time announced
to the venerable Raṭṭhapāla,
saying:

"It is time, dear Raṭṭhapāla,
the meal is ready."

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla,
having dressed in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe,
approached his own father's dwelling;

having approached,
he sat down on the seat made ready.

And the venerable Raṭṭhapāla's father, having had that heap of gold coins and gold uncovered, spoke thus to the venerable Raṭṭhapāla:

"This, dear Raṭṭhapāla, is your mother's wealth, the other is your father's,
the other your paternal grandfather's.<sup>7</sup>

It is possible, dear Raṭṭhapāla, both to enjoy riches
and do meritorious things.

Come you, dear Raṭṭhapāla,
throwing off the training and returning to the secular life, enjoy riches
and do meritorious things."

"If you, householder,
would do my bidding,
having loaded this heap of gold coins and gold into wagons, and then having had it brought down, you would have it dropped in the middle stream of the river Ganges.

What is the reason for this?

It is from that source, householder, that there will arise for you grief,
sorrow,
suffering,

lamentation
and despair."

Taking hold of his feet, the venerable Raṭṭhapāla's former wives [258] then spoke thus to him:

"How, young master,
of what kind
are those nymphs
for whose sake you fare the Brahma-faring?"

"We, sisters, do not fare the Brahma-faring for the sake of nymphs."

Saying,

"The young master Raṭṭhapāla addresses us with the word 'sisters,'" they fell down fainting just there.

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla spoke thus to his father:

"If you would give food, householder, give it;
but do not annoy us."

"Eat, dear Raṭṭhapāla,
the meal is ready."

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla's father with his own hand
served and satisfied the venerable Raṭṭhapāla with sumptuous food,
solid and soft.

And when the venerable Raṭṭhapāla had eaten and had withdrawn his hand from the bowl, standing he spoke these verses:<sup>8</sup>

"See<sup>9</sup> the pranked-out puppet-shape,<sup>10</sup> a mass of sores, a congeries,<sup>11</sup> afflicted, much thought of,<sup>12</sup> for which there is never stability.

See the pranked-out form with jewels and rings, the bones sheathed in skin, resplendent with the clothes,

The feet dyed with lac, the face with powder smeared - enough for delusion of a fool, but not for the quester of the Beyond.

Hair braided eightfold, eyes with collyrium smeared - enough for delusion of a fool, but not for the quester of the Beyond.

Like a new collyrium-box, embossed, is the foul body, adorned - enough for delusion of a fool, but not for the quester of the Beyond.

The trapper set a snare; the deer touched not the net.
Having eaten the crop, we go while the deer-catchers lament."

---

[259] After the venerable Raṭṭhapāla had spoken these verses while he was standing,
he approached the deer-park of the Kuru king;<sup>13</sup>
having approached,
he sat down for the day-sojourn
at the root of a tree.

Then the Kuru king addressed a trapper,<sup>14</sup> saying:

"Clear a pleasure-ground, good trapper,
in the deer-park;
we will go to see the lovely ground."

"Yes, sire,"

and when the trapper had answered the Kuru king in assent, he saw, while he was clearing the deer-park, the venerable Ratṭhapāla sitting down for the day-sojourn
at the root of a tree;
on seeing him,
he approached the Kuru king,
and having approached,
he spoke thus to him:

"Sire, the deer-park is cleared;
but there is the young man of family, Ratṭhapāla, the son of a leading family near this very Thullakoṭṭhita, and whom you have constantly praised, sitting at the root of a tree for the day-sojourn."

"Well then, good trapper, no more now today of the pleasure-ground, but we will now at once pay respects to the revered Ratṭhapāla."

And when he had said:

"Give away all the solid and soft food that has been prepared,"

he had many lovely vehicles harnessed, and having mounted a lovely vehicle, he set forth from Thullakoṭṭhita in great royal pomp

with the many lovely vehicles so as to see the venerable Ratṭhapāla.

Having gone by vehicle for as far as the ground was passable, and having then descended from the vehicle, with his princely train he approached the venerable Ratṭhapāla on foot;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the venerable Ratṭhapāla;
and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he stood at a respectful distance.

As he was standing at a respectful distance,
the Kuru king spoke thus to the venerable Ratṭhapāla:

"Let the revered Ratṭhapāla sit down here on the elephant-rug."<sup>15</sup>

[260] "No, sire; you sit down,
I am sitting on a seat of my own."

The Kuru king sat down on the prepared seat;
while he was sitting down
the Kuru king spoke thus to the venerable Ratṭhapāla:

"Good Ratṭhapāla,
there are these four kinds of loss followed by which
some (men) here,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
go forth from home into homelessness.

What are the four?

Loss through old age,
loss through illness,
loss of wealth,
loss of relations.

■

And what, good Raṭṭhapāla, is loss through old age?

As to this, good Raṭṭhapāla, someone is worn,
old,
full of years,
has lived his span
and is at the close of his life.

He reflects thus:

'I am now worn,
old,
full of years,
I have lived my span
and am at the close of my life,
so it is not easy for me
to acquire wealth not already acquired or to use to advantage
the wealth already acquired.

Suppose that I,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
should go forth from home
into homelessness?

So he, following<sup>ed1</sup> this loss through old age,
having cut off hair and beard,

having donned saffron garments,
goes forth from home into homelessness.

Good Ratṭhapāla, this is called
loss through old age.

But the revered Ratṭhapāla is still young, endowed with the coal-black hair of radiant youth, in his early prime,
and there is none of this loss through old age for the revered Ratṭhapāla.

What has the good Ratṭhapāla known or seen
or heard
that he has gone forth from home
into homelessness?

■

And what, good Ratṭhapāla, is
loss through illness?

As to this, good Ratṭhapāla, someone is ill,
in pain,
grievously ill.

He reflects thus:

'I am now ill,
in pain,
grievously ill,
so it is not easy for me
to acquire wealth not already acquired
or to use to advantage
the wealth already acquired.

Suppose that I,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
should go forth from home
into homelessness?

So he, following this loss through illness,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
goes forth from home
into homelessness.

Good Raṭṭhapāla, this is called
loss through illness.

But the revered Raṭṭhapāla is still free from illness, not ailing,
possessed of a good digestion that is neither too cold nor too hot,
and there is none of this loss through illness for the revered Raṭṭhapāla.

What has the good Raṭṭhapāla known or seen
or heard
that he has gone forth from home
into homelessness?

■

And what, good Raṭṭhapāla, is
loss of wealth?

As to this, good [261] Raṭṭhapāla, someone is rich,
of great possessions,

very wealthy,
but gradually these riches of his diminish.

He reflects thus:

'Formerly I was rich,
of great possessions,
very wealthy,
but gradually these riches of mine have diminished,
so it is not easy for me
to acquire wealth not already acquired
or to use to advantage
the wealth already acquired.

Suppose that I,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
should go forth from home
into homelessness?

So he, following this loss through wealth,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
goes forth from home
into homelessness.

Good Ratṭhapāla, this is called
loss of wealth.

But the revered Ratṭhapāla is the son of a leading family in this very Thullakoṭṭhita, and there is none of this loss of wealth
for the revered Ratṭhapāla.

What has the good Ratṭhapāla known
or seen

or heard
that he has gone forth from home
into homelessness?

■

And what, good Raṭṭhapāla, is
loss of relations?

As to this, good Raṭṭhapāla, someone has many friends and acquaintances,
kith and kin,
but gradually these relations of his diminish.

He reflects thus:

'Formerly I had many friends and acquaintances,
kith and kin,
but gradually these relations of mine have diminished,
so it is not easy for me
to acquire wealth not already acquired
or to use to advantage
the wealth already acquired.

Suppose that I,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
should go forth from home
into homelessness?

So he, following this loss through relations,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
goes forth from home
into homelessness.

Good Ratṭhapāla, this is called
loss of relations.

But the revered Ratṭhapāla has many friends and acquaintances,
kith and kin,
in this very Thullakoṭṭhita,
and there is none of this loss of relations for the revered Ratṭhapāla.

What has the good Ratṭhapāla known
or seen
or heard
that he has gone forth from home
into homelessness?

■

These, good Ratṭhapāla, are the four kinds of loss followed by which
some (men) here,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
go forth from home into homelessness.

But there are none of these
for the revered Ratṭhapāla.

What has the good Ratṭhapāla known
or seen
or heard
that he has gone forth from home
into homelessness?"

■

"There are, sire,
four expoundings of Dhamma expounded by the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One;
because I have known
and seen
and heard these
I have gone forth from home
into homelessness.

What are the four?

The first expounding of Dhamma expounded by the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One is that:

'The unstable world
is brought to an end.'<sup>16</sup>

Because I have known
and seen
and heard this
I have gone forth [262] from home
into homelessness.

The second expounding of Dhamma expounded by the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One is that:

'The world is no refuge,
no guard.'

Because I have known
and seen
and heard this
I have gone forth from home
into homelessness.

The third expounding of Dhamma expounded by the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One is that:

'The world is not one's own,
one must go
leaving everything.'

Because I have known
and seen
and heard this
I have gone forth from home
into homelessness.

The fourth expounding of Dhamma expounded by the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One is that:

'The world lacks and is unsatisfied,
a slave to craving.'

Because I have known
and seen

and heard this
I have gone forth from home into homelessness.

These, sire, are the four expoundings of Dhamma expounded by the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One;
because I have known
and seen
and heard these
I have gone forth from home
into homelessness."

■

"The good Ratṭhapāla says:

'The unstable world
is brought to an end.'

But how is the meaning of this saying to be understood,
good Ratṭhapāla?"

"What do you think about this, sire?"

Were you,
at the age of twenty
or twenty-five,
expert in (handling) an elephant and a horse
and a chariot
and a bow
and a sword,
strong of leg and arm,
able<sup>17</sup> and proficient in warfare?"

"I, good Ratṭhapāla,
at the age of twenty
or twenty-five,
was expert in (handling) an elephant
and a horse
and a chariot
and a bow
and a sword,
I was strong of leg and arm,
able and proficient in warfare;
methinks I was sometimes inspired;
I saw none equal to myself in strength."

"What do you think about this, sire?

Are you still so strong in leg and arm,
able and proficient in warfare?"

"No, good Ratṭhapāla,
I am now worn,
old,
full of years,
I have lived my span
and am at the close of my life -
round eighty years of age.

Sometimes, good Ratṭhapāla, when I want to take a step in one direction I step in another."18

"It was in reference to this, sire,
that the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One, said:

'The unstable world [263]
is brought to an end.'

Because I have known
and seen
and heard this
I have gone forth from home
into homelessness."

"It is wonderful, good Raṭṭhapāla,
it is marvellous, good Raṭṭhapāla,
that this was so well spoken
by the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One, that:

'The unstable world
is brought to an end.'

For, good Raṭṭhapāla,
the unstable world
is brought to an end.

■

Now, good Raṭṭhapāla,
in this royal family
are squadrons of elephants and squadrons of horses and squadrons of chariots and squadrons of infantry which, if we were in distress, would defend us.<sup>19</sup>

The good Raṭṭhapāla says:

'The world is no refuge,
no guard.'

But how is the meaning of this saying to be understood, good Raṭṭhapāla?"

"What do you think about this, sire?"

Have you any chronic illness?"

"I have a chronic illness of wind,
good Raṭṭhapāla.

Sometimes friends and acquaintances,
kith and kin
stand round me, saying:

'Now the Kuru king will pass away,
now the Kuru king will pass away!'"

"What do you think about this, sire?"

Would you be able to say to friends and acquaintances,
kith and kin:

'Let the good friends and acquaintances,
kith and kin,
ease my pain,
let them all share this feeling
so that I could experience
a more buoyant feeling?

Or do you have to experience that feeling alone?"

"I, good Raṭṭhapāla, am not able to say to friends and acquaintances,

kith and kin:

'Let the good friends and acquaintances,
kith and kin,
ease my pain,
let them all share this feeling
so that I could experience
a more buoyant feeling.

So I have to experience that feeling alone."

"It was in reference to this, sire,
that the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One, said:

'The world is no refuge,
no guard.'

Because I have known
and seen
and heard this
I have gone forth from home
into homelessness."

"It is wonderful, good Raṭṭhapāla,
it is marvellous, good Raṭṭhapāla,
that this was so well spoken
by the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One, that:

'The world is no refuge,
no guard.'

For, good Raṭṭhapāla,
the world is no refuge,
no guard.

■

Now, Raṭṭhapāla,
in this royal family
is an abundance of gold coins and gold, both in the ground and above it.<sup>20</sup>

The good [264] Raṭṭhapāla says:

'The world is not one's own,
one must go
leaving everything.'

But how is the meaning of this saying to be understood,
good Raṭṭhapāla?"

"What do you think about this, sire?"

Although you at present divert yourself
endowed with
and possessed of
the five strands of sense-pleasures, will you hereafter be able to say:

'Even so am I diverting myself
endowed with
and possessed of these same five strands of sense-pleasures?'

Or will others come into this wealth while you go on

according to kamma?"

"Although I at present, dear Ratthapāla, divert myself
endowed with
and possessed of
the five strands of sense-pleasures,
I will not hereafter be able to say:

'Even so am I diverting myself
endowed with
and possessed of
these same five strands of sense-pleasures.'

So others will come into this wealth while I go on
according to kamma"

"It was in reference to this, sire,
that the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One, said:

'The world is not one's own,
one must go
leaving everything.'

Because I have known
and seen
and heard this
I have gone forth from home
into homelessness."

"It is wonderful, good Ratthapāla, it is marvellous, good Ratthapāla,

that this was so well spoken
by the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One, that:

'The world is not one's own, one must go leaving everything.'

For, good Raṭṭhapāla,
the world is not one's own,
one must go
leaving everything.

■

Now, the good Raṭṭhapāla says:

'The world lacks and is unsatisfied,
a slave to craving.'

But how is the meaning of this saying to be understood,
good Raṭṭhapāla?"

"What do you think about this, sire?"

Is the Kuru you dwell in as master, 21 prosperous?"

"Yes, good Raṭṭhapāla, the Kuru I dwell in as master is prosperous."

"What do you think about this, sire?"

If a trustworthy,
reliable man
were to come to you here from the east and having approached you should say:

'If it please you, sire,
you should know that I am coming from the east,
and have seen a great country there,
rich,
prosperous,
thronged with people;
there were many squadrons of elephants there,
squadrons of horses,
squadrons of chariots,
squadrons of infantry;
there is much ivory there,
much gold
both unwrought [265]
and wrought,
many women are there.

And it is possible to conquer it with such and such a force.

Conquer it, sire.'

What would you do?"

"When I had conquered it, good Ratthapāla, I should dwell in it as master."

"What do you think about this, sire?"

If a trustworthy,
reliable man
were to come to you here from the west and having approached you
should say:

'If it please you, sire,
you should know that I am coming from the east,
and have seen a great country there,
rich,
prosperous,
thronged with people;
there were many squadrons of elephants there,
squadrons of horses,
squadrons of chariots,
squadrons of infantry;
there is much ivory there,
much gold
both unwrought
and wrought,
many women are there.

And it is possible to conquer it
with such and such a force.

Conquer it, sire.'

What would you do?"

"When I had conquered it, good Raṭṭhapāla,
I should dwell in it as master."

"What do you think about this, sire?"

If a trustworthy,
reliable man
were to come to you here from the north and having approached you
should say:

'If it please you, sire,
you should know that I am coming from the east,
and have seen a great country there,

rich,
prosperous,
thronged with people;
there were many squadrons of elephants there,
squadrons of horses,
squadrons of chariots,
squadrons of infantry;
there is much ivory there,
much gold
both unwrought
and wrought,
many women are there.

And it is possible to conquer it
with such and such a force.

Conquer it, sire.'

What would you do?"

"When I had conquered it, good Raṭṭhapāla,
I should dwell in it as master."

"What do you think about this, sire?"

If a trustworthy,
reliable man
were to come to you here from the south and having approached you
should say:

'If it please you, sire,
you should know that I am coming from the east,
and have seen a great country there,
rich,
prosperous,
thronged with people;

there were many squadrons of elephants there,
squadrons of horses,
squadrons of chariots,
squadrons of infantry;
there is much ivory there,
much gold
both unwrought
and wrought,
many women are there.

And it is possible to conquer it
with such and such a force.

Conquer it, sire.'

What would you do?"

"When I had conquered it, good Raṭṭhapāla,
I should dwell in it as master."

"It was in reference to this, sire,
that the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One, said:

'The world lacks and is unsatisfied,
a slave to craving.'

Because I have known
and seen
and heard this
I have gone forth from home
into homelessness."

"It is wonderful, good Raṭṭhapāla,
it is marvellous, good Raṭṭhapāla,

that this was so well spoken
by the Lord who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One, that:

'The world lacks
and is unsatisfied,
a slave to craving.'

For, good Raṭṭhapāla,
the world lacks,
it is unsatisfied,
it is a slave to craving."

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla said this;
having said this,
he further spoke thus;<sup>22</sup>

"I see men of wealth in the world-acquiring property, from delusion they give not away; out of greed a hoard of wealth they make,
and hanker sorely after more sense-pleasures.

A king, having forcibly conquered the earth, inhabiting a land with the ocean its confines, not satisfied with this side of the sea hankers after the sea's further side too.

Kings and full many another man come to their dying their cravings not gone; [266] as those that still lack they put off the body; yet in the world is no satisfaction in sense-pleasures.<sup>23</sup>

Letting down their hair, kinsmen bewail him and say: 'Alas, he is not undying.'

Bearing him wrapped in a shroud, kindling a pyre, they cremate him then.

Being prodded by stakes, he burns in the one garment, riches got rid of.
Not to one who is dying are kinsfolk a refuge any more than are friends or intimates here.

Heirs carry off his wealth;
but the being goes on according to kamma.
Wealth does not follow him who is dying, nor child or wife, nor wealth or kingdom.

Long life is not gained from wealth, nor is old age banished by property.
'For brief is this life,' the wise say, non-eternal, subject to change.

Rich and poor feel the touch,<sup>24</sup> fool and wise are touched alike.
But the fool, as though struck down by folly, prostrate lies, while the wise, touched by the touch, trembles not.

Wherefore better than wealth is wisdom by which one here secures accomplishment.<sup>25</sup> Not being accomplished in this-becoming or that,<sup>26</sup> they do evil deeds from delusion.

[267] He comes to a womb and to another world, being bound to samsara,<sup>27</sup> in a successive (round); one of little wisdom, having faith in him, comes to a womb and to another world.

As a thief of evil nature, caught in the act of breaking in, is ruined<sup>28</sup> by his own kamma, so the race, of evil nature, is hereafter, in another world, ruined by its own kamma.

Divers sweet, delightful sense-pleasures in various ways disturb the mind; having seen the peril in sense-pleasures,
I, O sire, have therefore gone forth.

As fruits from the tree, so fall men, both young and old, on the break up of the body.
Having seen<sup>29</sup> this too, I have gone forth, sire.
Better indeed is sure recluseship."

Discourse with Ratṭhapāla:
The Second

---

<sup>1</sup> At A. ii. 24 called chief of those gone forth from faith.

<sup>2</sup> The story of Ratṭhapāla's efforts to be ordained and of the events immediately following is very similar to the story of Sudinna at Vin. iii. 12 ff. There are also some interesting variations.

<sup>3</sup> puttam, of Vin. iii. 12 (and cf. Vin. i. 83) is omitted here, perhaps because Ratṭhapāla was at this time rather more than a child.

<sup>4</sup> MA. iii. 295 says: at the porch of the door in the middle of a house with seven porched doors. See above, p. 47.

<sup>5</sup> A refusal would mean that without waiting longer the bhikkhu could pass on to the next house; and might receive the necessary alms there.

<sup>6</sup> kuddam nissāya. Perhaps "leaning against a wall." But MA. iii. 297 says "in that district there were halls in benefactors' houses, where seats were prepared and vessels of water, and where those who had gone forth sat down and ate when they were walking for alms. ... For those who have gone forth do not sit down to eat in unsuitable places as do beggars." The exact meaning of kuḍḍa (v.l. kuṭṭa, kuḍḍa- and kuṭṭamūla) in this passage is however not clear.

<sup>7</sup> pitāmahaṃ, perhaps more exactly "ancestors'."

<sup>8</sup> Verses as at Thag. 769-774, there also ascribed to Raṭṭhapāla. The remainder of his verses are at M. ii. 72-74 (Thag. 776-788), with the exception of Thag. ver. 775, 789-703 which occur only there.

<sup>9</sup> This verse also occurs at Dhp. 147, being spoken, according to DhA. iii. 104 on account of Sirimā, the beautiful courtesan of Rājagaha.

<sup>10</sup> bimba, a shape, image; cf. S. i. 134. MA. iii. 301 = DhA. iii. 109 = ThagA. explain by attabhāva.

<sup>11</sup> samussitaṃ. MA. iii. 302 says that, with 300 bones, held together by 900 sinews, smeared with 900 lumps of flesh, it is built up (ussita, erected?) on every side.

<sup>12</sup> bahusaṃkappaṃ, by others.

<sup>13</sup> rājā Koravyo, It is not clear whether Koravya was his personal name or a generic name of the king of the Kurus, See DPPN. s.v. Korabya.

<sup>14</sup> migava. MA. iii. 304 says this is the name of the keeper of the pleasaunce. If so, his name was derived from his occupation. The same word has already occurred in the first line of the last verse above, and there in no way seems to be a proper name. Chalmers translates as "hunter." As a proper name migava is not included in DPPN. Moreover, in Pali, a proper name is usually further defined to show who the person was: brahman, householder, king and so on.

<sup>15</sup> As at M. ii. 113. Had the word hattkatthara not been translated as "clump of flowers" by Chalmers, it would have needed no comment. As it is, it must be noticed that at Vin. i. 192, D. i. 7, A. i. 181 it is in a sequence with assatthara rathatthara, horse-rug, chariot-rug, and therefore appears to be elephant-rug. MA. iii. 305 says that a thin "elephant-rug" filled with flowers (? bahalapuppho) having been folded double, is spread and indicated (abhilakkhita, distinguished) for it would not be suitable to sit on it uninvited.

<sup>16</sup> Upanīyati loko addhuvo. On upanīyati, to be led, driven, to be carried on or away, see K.S. i. 4, n. 1,

<sup>17</sup> Reading alamatto with the text, other versions and MA. iii. 307 against one tentative v.l. and PED. which read, as in other contexts, alamattho. The meaning in each case however seems to be samattho (as also at DA. 660), to which at MA. iii. 307 is added attabhāvo, the individual. Samattha-attabhāva would therefore mean: "the individual is sufficient unto himself," self-reliant, self-sufficient, which also could be taken as a meaning of alamatta, "self is enough."

<sup>18</sup> Cf. DhA. i. 7 mahallakassa ... hatthapādā anassavā, honti, an old man's arms and legs are disobedient.

<sup>19</sup> pariyodhāya vattissanti. cf. S. i. 72-73 where the Buddhist view is given: that however many squadrons might guard (rakkhanti) a person, yet attā (self) is not guarded by them, tesam arakkhito attā; for theirs is merely an outer guard, not an inner.

<sup>20</sup> vehāsaṭṭha (with v.l. vehāsagata) as at Vin. iii. 48. See B.D. i. p. 79, n. 6 for further references.

<sup>21</sup> ajjhāmsati. Cf. Jā. vi. 273, where koravya is explained as Kururaṭṭha-vāsika, a dweller in the Kuru kingdom.

<sup>22</sup> In the following unmetrical rendering, I have attempted to be more exactly literal than either Mrs. Rhys Davids or Lord Chalmers. Otherwise I would have followed one or other of these beautiful versions, the former to be found in Pss. Breath., and the latter in Fur. Dial ii., and both of which I have found very helpful.

<sup>23</sup> Meaning, I think, that they cannot be satiated.

<sup>24</sup> phusanti phassam, i.e. they touch the touch, namely of dying, maraṇa-phassa, MA. iii. 308.

<sup>25</sup> I.e. arahantship.

<sup>26</sup> bhavābhavesu, explained at MA. iii. 308 as "in low and excellent becomings," and at ThagA. as mahantāmantesu bhavesu. Bhavābhava also occurs at Sn. 1060, 1068; and at ThīgA. 71, saṃsaranto bhavābhava; it means in the various becomings. Cf. phalāphala, a variety, or all kinds, of fruit.

<sup>27</sup> saṃsāram āpajja, undergoes, experiences, produces saṃsāra. Cf. S. i. 37, 38, satto saṃsāram āpādi.

<sup>28</sup> haññati, is struck, hit, killed, destroyed.

<sup>29</sup> In answer to the king's questions, put in the narrative part of this Discourse, Ratṭhapāla now tells him what he has seen and heard to make him go forth.

---

<sup>ed1</sup> Woodward here has "So he that is followed by this loss through old age...", but the idea is, as above that it is following these losses that some persons give up the world.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
4. Rāja Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
4. The Royal Division

83. Discourse on Makhādeva<sup>1</sup>

Makhādeva Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Mithilā in Makhādeva's Mango Grove.<sup>2</sup>

Then the Lord smiled (when he [268] came to a) certain place.

Then it occurred to the venerable Ānanda:

"What is the cause,
what the reason
that the Lord is smiling?"

Not without motive
do Tathāgatas smile."

Then the venerable Ānanda,
having arranged his robe over one shoulder,
having saluted the Lord with joined palms,
spoke thus to the Lord:

"Now, revered sir, what is the cause,
what the reason
that the Lord is smiling?

Not without motive
do Tathāgatas smile."<sup>3</sup>

"Once upon a time, Ānanda, in this very Mithilā
there was a king named Makhādeva, a dhamma-man,
a king under dhamma,
firm in dhamma,
a great king who fared by dhamma
among brahmans and householders,
townsfolk and countryfolk,
and who observed the Observance
on the fourteenth,
fifteenth
and eighth days
of the half-month."<sup>4</sup>

Then, Ānanda, at the end of many years,
many hundreds of years,
many thousands of years,
King Makhādeva addressed his barber,
saying:

'When, good barber,
you see grey hairs growing on my head,
then you may tell me.'

Ānanda, the barber answered King Makhādeva in assent,
saying,

'Yes, sire.'

Then, Ānanda, at the end of many years,
many hundreds of years,
many thousands of years,
the barber saw grey hairs growing on King Makhādeva's head.

Seeing that, Ānanda,
he spoke thus to King Makhādeva:

'Death's messengers<sup>5</sup> have appeared to his majesty;
grey hairs are to be seen growing on his head.'

'Well then, good barber, when you have pulled out those grey hairs properly with the tweezers, place them on my fingers.'

'Yes, your majesty.'

And when, Ānanda, the barber had answered King Makhādeva in assent, he pulled out the grey hairs properly with the tweezers and placed them on King Makhādeva's fingers.

And, Ānanda, King Makhādeva, having given the boon of a village to the barber,
had the prince who was his eldest son summoned
and spoke thus:

'Dear Prince,
Death's messengers have appeared to me;
grey hairs are to be seen growing on my head.'

Human sense-pleasures [269] have been enjoyed by me;
it is now time to seek deva-like sense-pleasures.

Come you, dear Prince,
rule this kingdom.

For I, having cut off my hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
will go forth from home
into homelessness.

And now, dear Prince,
when you too see grey hairs growing on your head,
then, having given the boon of a village to the barber,
having handed over the kingdom properly
to the prince who is your eldest son, having cut off your hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
you should go forth from home
into homelessness.

This lovely custom
founded by me
you should maintain;
do not you be the last man after me.

Dear Prince, while two persons exist
and there is a breaking of such a lovely custom, whichever of these (breaks it) he is the last man.<sup>6</sup>

So I, dear Prince, speak thus to you:

This lovely custom
founded by me
you should maintain;
do not you be the last man after me!

Then, Ānanda, King Makhādeva, having given the boon of the village to the barber,
having handed over the kingdom properly
to the prince who was his eldest son, having in this very Makhādeva Mango Grove
cut off his hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
went forth from home
into homelessness.

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of friendliness,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of friendliness
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of compassion,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;

he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of compassion
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of sympathetic joy,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of sympathetic joy
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of equanimity,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,

below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of equanimity
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

But, Ānanda, King Makhādeva had played at boys' sports<sup>7</sup>
for 84,000 years,
had ruled as a viceroy<sup>8</sup>
for 84,000 years,
and had ruled as a king
for 84,000 years;
for 84,000 years,
gone forth from home into homelessness
in this very Makhādeva Mango Grove,
he fared the Brahma-faring.

He, having developed the four Brahma-abidings, was one who at the breaking up of the body after dying reached the Brahma-world.

---

And, Ānanda, at the end of many years,
many hundreds of years,
many thousands of years,
King Makhādeva's son addressed his barber,
saying:

'When, good barber,
you see grey hairs growing on my head,
then you may tell me.'

Ānanda, the barber answered King Makhādeva's son in assent,
saying,

'Yes, sire.'

Then, Ānanda, at the end of many years,
many hundreds of years,
many thousands of years,
the barber saw grey hairs growing on King Makhādeva's son head.

Seeing that, Ānanda,
he spoke thus to King Makhādeva's son:

'Death's messengers have appeared to his majesty;
grey hairs are to be seen growing on his head.'

'Well then, good barber,
when you have pulled out those grey hairs properly with the tweezers,
place them on my fingers.'

'Yes, your majesty.'

And when, Ānanda, the barber had answered King Makhādeva's son in assent,
he pulled out the grey hairs properly with the tweezers
and placed them on King Makhādeva's son's fingers.

And, Ānanda, King Makhādeva's son,
having given the boon of a village to the barber,
had the prince who was his eldest son summoned
and spoke thus:

'Dear Prince,
Death's messengers have appeared to me;
grey hairs are to be seen growing on my head.

Human sense-pleasures have been enjoyed by me;
it is now time to seek deva-like sense-pleasures.

Come you, dear Prince,
rule this kingdom.

For I, having cut off my hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
will go forth from home
into homelessness.

And now, dear Prince,
when you too see grey hairs growing on your head,
then, having given the boon of a village to the barber,
having handed over the kingdom properly
to the prince who is your eldest son,
having cut off your hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
you should go forth from home
into homelessness.

This lovely custom
founded by me
you should maintain;
do not you be the last man after me.

Dear Prince, while two persons exist
and there is a breaking of such a lovely custom,

whichever of these (breaks it)
he is the last man.

So I, dear Prince, speak thus to you:

This lovely custom
founded by me
you should maintain;
do not you be the last man after me.'

Then, Ānanda, King Makhādeva's son,
having given the boon of the village to the barber,
having handed over the kingdom properly
to the prince who was his eldest son,
having in this very Makhādeva Mango Grove
cut off his hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
went forth from home
into homelessness.

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of friendliness,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of friendliness
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of compassion,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of compassion
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of sympathetic joy,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of sympathetic joy
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,

without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of equanimity,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of equanimity
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

But, Ānanda, King Makhādeva's son had played at boys' sports
for 84,000 years,
had ruled as a viceroy
for 84,000 years,
and had ruled as a king
for 84,000 years;
for 84,000 years,
gone forth from home into homelessness
in this very Makhādeva Mango Grove,
he fared the Brahma-faring.

He, having developed the four Brahma-abidings, was [270] one who at the breaking up of the body after dying
reached the Brahma-world.

---

And then, Ānanda, King Makhādeva's sons' descendants who succeeded him,
after 84,(KM) years as nobles, having in this very Makhādeva Mango Grove cut off their hair and beards,
having donned saffron garments,
went forth from home into homelessness.

These dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of friendliness,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of friendliness
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

These dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of compassion,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of compassion
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

These dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of sympathetic joy,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of sympathetic joy
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

These dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of equanimity,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of equanimity
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

These, having developed the four Brahma-abidings, were those who at the breaking up of the body after dying reached the Brahma-world.

---

Nimi was the last of these kings,
a dhamma-man,
a king under dhamma,
firm in dhamma,
a great king who fared by dhamma
among brahmans and householders,
townsfolk and countryfolk,
and who observed the Observance

on the fourteenth,
fifteenth
and eighth days of the half-month.

Once upon a time, Ānanda, when the Devas of the Thirty-Three were sitting down gathered together in the Sudhammā debating hall, this chance talk arose:

'Indeed it is a gain for the Videhas<sup>9</sup> indeed it is well gotten by the Videhas
in that their king Nimi is a dhamma-man,
a king under dhamma,
firm in dhamma,
a great king who fares by dhamma
among brahmans and householders,
townsfolk and countryfolk,
and who observes the Observance
on the fourteenth,
fifteenth
and eighth days of the half-month.'

Then, Ānanda,
Sakka, the lord of devas, addressed the Devas of the Thirty-Three:
saying;

'Do you, good sirs,
want to see King Nimi?'

'We, good sir, want to see King Nimi.'

At that time King Nimi, keeping an Observance day, having washed his head on that Observance day - a fifteenth day -

was sitting down on an upper terrace of his palace.

Then, Ānanda,
as a strong man might stretch out his bent arm or might bend back his outstretched arm, so did Sakka, the lord of devas, disappearing from the Devas of the Thirty-Three, appear before King Nimi.

Then, Ānanda, Sakka, the lord of devas,
spoke thus to King Nimi:

'It is a gain for you, sire, it is well gotten by you, sire.

Sire, the Devas of the Thirty-Three are sitting down in the Sudhammā debating hall, praising you and saying:

"Indeed it is a gain for the Videhas
indeed it is well gotten by the Videhas
in that their king Nimi is a dhamma-man,
a king under dhamma,
firm in dhamma,
a great king who fares by dhamma
among brahmans and householders,
townsfolk and countryfolk,
and who observes the Observance
on the fourteenth,
fifteenth
and eighth days of the half-month."

Sire, the Devas of the Thirty-Three
are anxious to see you, so I, sire, will send you a chariot harnessed [271] with a thousand thoroughbreds;

sire, you should mount the deva-like vehicle without hesitation.'

Ānanda, King Nimi consented by becoming silent.

Then, Ānanda, Sakka, the lord of devas,
summoned the charioteer Mātali and said:

'Come you, good Mātali,
having harnessed a chariot with a thousand thoroughbreds,
and having approached King Nimi,
speak thus:

"This chariot,
harnessed with a thousand thoroughbreds,
has been sent to you by Sakka, the lord of devas.

Sire, you should mount the deva-like vehicle without hesitation."

'So be it, your honour.'

And, Ānanda, Mātali the charioteer,
having answered Sakka, the lord of devas, in assent,
having harnessed a chariot with a thousand thoroughbreds
and having approached King Nimi,
spoke thus:

'This chariot, sire,
harnessed with a thousand thoroughbreds,
has been sent to you by Sakka, the lord of devas;
sire, you should mount the deva-like vehicle without hesitation.

And, moreover, sire, by which (route) do I conduct you<sup>10</sup> - that by which evil deeds undergo the ripening of evil deeds or that by which lovely deeds undergo the ripening of lovely deeds?"<sup>11</sup>

'Conduct me by both, Mātali.'

So, Ānanda, the charioteer Mātali brought King Nimi
to the Sudhammā debating hall.

And, Ānanda, Sakka, the lord of devas, saw King Nimi approaching from the distance;
seeing him,
he spoke to King Nimi:

'Come, sire,
you are welcome, sire.

Sire, the Devas of the Thirty-Three are sitting down in the Sudhammā debating hall praising you,
and saying:

"Indeed it is a gain for the Videhas
indeed it is well gotten by the Videhas
in that their king Nimi is a dhamma-man,
a king under dhamma,
firm in dhamma,
a great king who fares by dhamma
among brahmans and householders,
townsfolk and countryfolk,
and who observes the Observance
on the fourteenth,
fifteenth
and eighth days of the half-month."

Sire, the Devas of the Thirty-Three
are anxious to see you.

Rejoice, sire,
among the Devas
with a deva's majesty.'

'Enough, good sir;
let me return to Mithilā itself where I will fare by dhamma
among brahmans and householders,
townsfolk and countryfolk
and will observe the Observance
on the fourteenth,
fifteenth
and eighth days of the half-month.'

Then, Ānanda, Sakka, the lord of devas,
summoned the charioteer Mātali and said:

'Come you, good Mātali, having harnessed a chariot with a thousand thoroughbreds, take King Nimi back to Mithila itself.'

[272] 'So be it, your honour.'<sup>12</sup>

And, Ānanda, Mātali the charioteer,
having answered Sakka, the lord of devas, in assent, harnessed a chariot with a thousand thoroughbreds and took King Nimi back to Mithilā itself.

While he was there, Ānanda,
King Nimi fared by dhamma,
among brahmans and householders,
townsfolk and countryfolk,
and he observed the Observance
on the fourteenth,
fifteenth

and eighth days
of the half-month.

Then, Ānanda, at the end of many years,
many hundreds of years,
many thousands of years,
King Nimi addressed his barber,
saying:

'When, good barber,
you see grey hairs growing on my head,
then you may tell me.'

Ānanda, the barber answered King Nimi in assent,
saying,

'Yes, sire.'

Then, Ānanda, at the end of many years,
many hundreds of years,
many thousands of years,
the barber saw grey hairs growing on King Nimi's head.

Seeing that, Ānanda,
he spoke thus to King King Nimi:

'Death's messengers have appeared to his majesty;
grey hairs are to be seen growing on his head.'

'Well then, good barber,
when you have pulled out those grey hairs properly with the tweezers,
place them on my fingers.'

'Yes, your majesty.'

And when, Ānanda, the barber had answered King Nimi in assent, he pulled out the grey hairs properly with the tweezers and placed them on King Nimi's fingers.

And, Ānanda, King Nimi,
having given the boon of a village to the barber,
had the prince who was his eldest son summoned
and spoke thus:

'Dear Prince,
Death's messengers have appeared to me;
grey hairs are to be seen growing on my head.

Human sense-pleasures have been enjoyed by me;
it is now time to seek deva-like sense-pleasures.

Come you, dear Prince,
rule this kingdom.

For I, having cut off my hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
will go forth from home
into homelessness.

And now, dear Prince,
when you too see grey hairs growing on your head,
then, having given the boon of a village to the barber,
having handed over the kingdom properly
to the prince who is your eldest son,
having cut off your hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
you should go forth from home
into homelessness.

This lovely custom
founded by me

you should maintain;
do not you be the last man after me.

Dear Prince, while two persons exist
and there is a breaking of such a lovely custom, whichever of these (breaks it)
he is the last man.

So I, dear Prince, speak thus to you:

This lovely custom
founded by me
you should maintain;
do not you be the last man after me.'

Then, Ānanda, King Nimi,
having given the boon of the village to the barber,
having handed over the kingdom properly
to the prince who was his eldest son,
having in this very Makhādeva Mango Grove
cut off his hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
went forth from home
into homelessness.

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of friendliness,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of friendliness

that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of compassion,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of compassion
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of sympathetic joy,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,

in every way,
with a mind of sympathetic joy
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of equanimity,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of equanimity
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

But, Ānanda, King Nimi
had played at boys' sports
for 84,000 years,
had ruled as a viceroy
for 84,000 years,
and had ruled as a king
for 84,000 years;

for 84,000 years,
gone forth from home into homelessness
in this very Makhādeva Mango Grove,
he fared the Brahma-faring.

He, having developed the four Brahma-abidings, was one who at the breaking up of the body after dying
reached the Brahma-world.

But, Ānanda, King Nimi's son was called Kaḷārajanaka.

He did not go forth from home
into homelessness.

He broke that lovely custom;
of those (who observed it) he was the last man.

It may be that this occurs to you, Ānanda:

'At that time King Makhādeva by whom that lovely custom was founded
was someone else.'

But this, Ānanda, must not be understood thus.

I, at that time, was King Makhādeva, I founded that lovely custom;
the folk that came after maintained that lovely custom founded by me.

But that lovely custom, Ānanda, did not conduce to turning away from,
nor to dispassion,
stopping,
tranquillity,
super-knowledge,

self-awakening
or nibbāna -
only to reaching the Brahma-world.

But this lovely custom founded by me now, Ānanda, conduces to absolute turning away from,
to dispassion,
stopping,
tranquillity,
super-knowledge,
self-awakening
and nibbāna.

And what, Ānanda,
is the lovely custom founded by me now that conduces to absolute turning away from,
to dispassion,
stopping,
tranquillity,
super-knowledge,
self-awakening
and nibbāna.?

It is this ariyan eightfold Way itself,
that is to say,
perfect view,
perfect thought,
perfect speech,
perfect action,
perfect mode of livelihood, perfect endeavour,
perfect mindfulness,
perfect concentration.

It is this lovely custom founded by me now, Ānanda, that conduces to absolute turning away from away from,

to dispassion,
stopping,
tranquillity,
super-knowledge,
self-awakening
and nibbāna.

I, Ānanda, speak about it thus:

This lovely custom founded by me
you should maintain;
do not you be the last man after me.

Ānanda, while two persons exist
and there is a breaking of such a lovely custom, whichever one of these (breaks it),
he is the last man.

In regard to this, I, Ānanda, speak to you thus:

This lovely custom founded by me
you should maintain;
do not you be the last man after me."

[273] Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the venerable Ānanda rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on Makhādeva:
The Third

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Makhādeva Jātaka, No. 9, and Nimi Jātaka, No. 541.

<sup>2</sup> This Grove was originally planted by Makhādeva, and although other kings replaced trees that had died, the Grove was known by its early name, MA. iii. 309.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. M. Sta. 81.

<sup>4</sup> At Vin. i. 101 it is recorded that wanderers belonging to other sects gathered together on these days so as to speak dhamma. Buddhist monks were then allowed (by the Lord) to do the same, and a new ruling was subsequently introduced allowing them to recite the Pātimokkha, or Observance (recently devised by the Teacher) once in every half-month. Vin. i. 104. (See B.D. iv. 130 ff.).

<sup>5</sup> devadūtā. MA. iii. 310 says "the deva is death (maccu); his messengers are devadūtā." Cf. Devadūtā-Sutta, M. Sta. No. 130; and Devadūtavagga at A. i. 132*ff.*

<sup>6</sup> Chalmers has "he who breaks it is the last of the line."

<sup>7</sup> Cf. with Mahāsudassana at D. ii. 196.

<sup>8</sup> See A. iii. 154 on making vice-royalty one's aim.

<sup>9</sup> Mithilā was the capital of Videha.

<sup>10</sup> katamena taṃ nemi. In the Nimi Jātaka (Jā. vi. 104), where the whole episode is given in much greater detail, the reading is kena taṃ nemi maggena. For the one road goes to Niraya Hell and the other to a deva-world.

<sup>11</sup> Perhaps "doers of evil deeds and doers of lovely deeds" should be understood. In spite of Bu.'s verse in Vism. that the deed exists but not the doer of it, at MA. iii. 316 he says pāpakammantā pāpakānaṃ kammānaṃ vipākaṃ paṭisaṃvediyanti, "doers of evil undergo the ripening of evil deeds."

12 Here: evaṃ bhaddan tava; above evaṃ hotu bhaddan tava. MA. iii. 314 says; evaṃ hotu bhaddakan tava vacanan ti vatvā.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
4. Rāja Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
4. The Royal Division

84. Discourse at Madhura

Madhurā Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the venerable Kaccāna the Great was staying near Madhurā in the Gundā Grove.<sup>1</sup>

Avantiputta,<sup>2</sup> king of Madhurā, heard that the recluse Kaccāna was staying near Madhurā in the Gundā Grove and that of that revered Kaccāna a lovely report had gone forth thus:

'He is clever,
experienced,
wise,
one who has heard much,
a brilliant speaker,
of lovely intelligence, senior

as well as being a perfected one.

Good is the sight of perfected ones like this.'

Then Avantiputta, king of Madhurā, having had many splendid vehicles harnessed, having mounted a splendid vehicle, set out from Madhurā with the many splendid vehicles
and with great royal pomp so as to see the venerable Kaccāna the Great.

He went by vehicle as long as the ground was passable, then, having dismounted from the vehicle, he approached the venerable Kaccāna the Great on foot;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the venerable Kaccāna the Great;
and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Avantiputta, king of Madhurā, spoke thus to the venerable Kaccāna the Great:

"Good Kaccāna,
brahmans speak thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste,
all other castes are low;
only brahmans form the fair caste,
all other casts are dark;
only brahmans are pure,
not non-brahmans;
brahmans are own sons of Brahmā,

born of his mouth,
born of Brahmā, formed by Brahmā, heirs to Brahmā.'<sup>3</sup>

What does the reverend Kaccāna say to this?"

"Sire, this is merely a sound in the world, that:

'Only brahmans [274] form the best caste,
all other castes are low;
only brahmans form the fair caste,
all other casts are dark;
only brahmans are pure,
not non-brahmans;
brahmans are own sons of Brahmā,
born of his mouth,
born of Brahmā, formed by Brahmā, heirs to Brahmā.'

This is a way in which it can be said, sire, that this is merely a sound in the world, that:

'Only brahmans form the best caste,
all other castes are low;
only brahmans form the fair caste,
all other casts are dark;
only brahmans are pure,
not non-brahmans;
brahmans are own sons of Brahmā,
born of his mouth,
born of Brahmā, formed by Brahmā, heirs to Brahmā.'

What do you think about this, sire?

Even if a noble were to thrive in wealth or corn or gold or silver, could he have as his obedient servant another noble to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,

speaking affably,<sup>4</sup>
or could he have a brahman or could he have a merchant
or could he have a worker
to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably?"

"Good Kaccāna, if a noble were to thrive in wealth or corn or gold or silver he could have as his obedient servant a noble to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably,
or he could have a brahman,
or he could have a merchant,
or he could have a worker
to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably."

"What do you think about this, sire?"

Even if a brahman were to thrive in wealth or corn or gold or silver, could he have as his obedient servant another brahman to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably,
or could he have a noble
or could he have a merchant
or could he have a worker
to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,

carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably?"

"Good Kaccāna, if a brahman were to thrive in wealth or corn or gold or silver, he could have as his obedient servant another brahman to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably,
or he could have a noble
or he could have a merchant
or he could have a worker
to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably."

"What do you think about this, sire?"

Even if a merchant were to thrive in wealth or corn or gold or silver, could he have as his obedient servant another merchant to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably,
or could he have a noble
or could he have a brahman
or could he have a worker
to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably?"

"Good Kaccāna, if a merchant were to thrive in wealth or corn or gold or silver, he could have as his obedient servant another merchant to get up earlier than he would,

to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably,
or he could have a noble
or he could have a brahman
or he could have a worker
to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably."

"What do you think about this, sire?"

Even if a worker were to thrive in wealth or corn or gold or silver, could he have as his obedient servant another worker to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably,
or could he have a noble
or could he have a brahman
or could he have a merchant
to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably?"

"Good Kaccāna, if a worker were to thrive in wealth or corn or gold or silver, he could have as his obedient servant another worker to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably,

or he could have a noble
or he could have a brahman
or he could have a merchant
to get up earlier than he would,
to go later to rest,
carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably."

[275] "What do you think about this, sire?"

This being so,
are these four castes exactly the same or not?

Or how does this seem to you?"

"Indeed, good Kaccāna,
this being so,
these four castes are exactly the same;
I do not see any difference between them in this respect."

"This is a way in which it can be said, sire, that this is merely a sound in the world, that:

'Only brahmans form the best caste,
all other castes are low;
only brahmans form the fair caste,
all other casts are dark;
only brahmans are pure,
not non-brahmans;
brahmans are own sons of Brahmā,
born of his mouth,
born of Brahmā, formed by Brahmā, heirs to Brahmā.'

---

What do you think about this, sire?

If a noble made onslaught on creatures here,
took what had not been given,
wrongly enjoyed pleasures of the senses,
were a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
of wrong view -
would he at the breaking up of the body after dying arise in the sorrowful way,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell?

Or not?

Or how does this seem to you?"

"If a noble, good Kaccāna,
made onslaught on creatures,
took what had not been given,
wrongly enjoyed pleasures of the senses,
were a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
of wrong view -
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he would arise in the sorrowful way,
the bad bourn,

the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

This is how it seems to me,
and thus have I heard it from perfected ones."

"It is good,
it is good, sire;
it is good that it seems thus to you, sire,
and it is good that you have heard this from perfected ones.

What do you think about this, sire?

If a brahman made onslaught on creatures here,
took what had not been given,
wrongly enjoyed pleasures of the senses,
were a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
of wrong view -
would he at the breaking up of the body after dying
arise in the sorrowful way,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell?

Or not?

Or how does this seem to you?"

"If a brahman, good Kaccāna,
made onslaught on creatures,
took what had not been given,
wrongly enjoyed pleasures of the senses,

were a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
of wrong view -
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he would arise in the sorrowful way,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

This is how it seems to me,
and thus have I heard it from perfected ones."

"It is good,
it is good, sire;
it is good that it seems thus to you, sire,
and it is good that you have heard this from perfected ones.

What do you think about this, sire?

If a merchant made onslaught on creatures here,
took what had not been given,
wrongly enjoyed pleasures of the senses,
were a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
of wrong view -
would he at the breaking up of the body after dying
arise in the sorrowful way,
the bad bourn,

the Downfall,
Niraya Hell?

Or not?

Or how does this seem to you?"

"If a merchant, good Kaccāna,
made onslaught on creatures,
took what had not been given,
wrongly enjoyed pleasures of the senses,
were a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
of wrong view -
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he would arise in the sorrowful way,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

This is how it seems to me,
and thus have I heard it from perfected ones."

"It is good,
it is good, sire;
it is good that it seems thus to you, sire,
and it is good that you have heard this from perfected ones.

What do you think about this, sire?

If a worker made onslaught on creatures here,
took what had not been given,
wrongly enjoyed pleasures of the senses,

were a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
of wrong view -
would he at the breaking up of the body after dying
arise in the sorrowful way,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell?

Or not?

Or how does this seem to you?"

"If a worker, good Kaccāna,
made onslaught on creatures,
took what had not been given,
wrongly enjoyed pleasures of the senses,
were a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
of wrong view -
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he would arise in the sorrowful way,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

This is how it seems to me,<sup>5</sup>
and thus have I heard it from perfected ones."

"It is good,
it is good, sire;
it is good that it seems thus to you, sire,
and it is good that you have heard this from perfected ones.

"What do you think about this, sire?"

This being so,
are these four castes exactly the same or not?

Or how does this seem to you?"

"Indeed, good Kaccāna,
this being so,
these four castes are exactly the same;
I do not see any difference between them in this respect."

"This is a way in which it can be said, sire, that this is merely a sound in the world, that:

'Only brahmans form the best caste,
all other castes are low;
only brahmans form the fair caste,
all other casts are dark;
only brahmans are pure,
not non-brahmans;
brahmans are own sons of Brahmā,
born of his mouth,
born of Brahmā, formed by Brahmā, heirs to Brahmā.'

What do you think about this, sire?"

If a noble refrained from onslaught on creatures here, from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of the sense-pleasures,
from being a liar,
from slanderous speech,

from harsh speech,
from being a gossip,
were not covetous,
were benevolent in mind
and of right view -
would he at the breaking up of the body after dying
arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world?

Or not?

Or how does this seem to you?"

"If a noble, good Kaccāna, refrained from onslaught of creatures
from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of the sense-pleasures,
from being a liar,
from slanderous speech,
from harsh speech,
from being a gossip,
were not covetous,
were benevolent in mind
and of right view -
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he would arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

This is how it seems to me,
and thus have I heard it from perfected ones."

"It is good,
it is good, sire;
it is good that it seems thus to you, sire,
and it is good that you have heard this from perfected ones.

What do you think about this, sire?

If a brahman refrained from onslaught on creatures here,
from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of the sense-pleasures,
from being a liar,
from slanderous speech,
from harsh speech,
from being a gossip,
were not covetous,
were benevolent in mind
and of right view -
would he at the breaking up of the body after dying
arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world?

Or not?

Or how does this seem to you?"

"If a brahman, good Kaccāna, refrained from onslaught of creatures
from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of the sense-pleasures,
from being a liar,
from slanderous speech,
from harsh speech,
from being a gossip,
were not covetous,
were benevolent in mind
and of right view -
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he would arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

This is how it seems to me,
and thus have I heard it from perfected ones."

"It is good,
it is good, sire;
it is good that it seems thus to you, sire,
and it is good that you have heard this from perfected ones.

What do you think about this, sire?

If a merchant refrained from onslaught on creatures here,
from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of the sense-pleasures,
from being a liar,
from slanderous speech,
from harsh speech,
from being a gossip,
were not covetous,
were benevolent in mind
and of right view -
would he at the breaking up of the body after dying
arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world?

Or not?

Or how does this seem to you?"

"If a merchant, good Kaccāna, refrained from onslaught of creatures
from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of the sense-pleasures,
from being a liar,
from slanderous speech,
from harsh speech,
from being a gossip,
were not covetous,
were benevolent in mind
and of right view -

at the breaking up of the body after dying
he would arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

This is how it seems to me,
and thus have I heard it from perfected ones."

"It is good,
it is good, sire;
it is good that it seems thus to you, sire,
and it is good that you have heard this from perfected ones.

What do you think about this, sire?

If a worker refrained from onslaught on creatures here,
from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of the sense-pleasures,
from being a liar,
from slanderous speech,
from harsh speech,
from being a gossip,
were not covetous,
were benevolent in mind
and of right view -
would he at the breaking up of the body after dying
arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world?

Or not?

Or how does this seem to you?"

"If a worker, good Kaccāna, refrained from onslaught of creatures
from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of the sense-pleasures,
from being a liar,

from slanderous speech,
from harsh speech,
from being a gossip,
were not covetous,
were benevolent in mind
and of right view -
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he would arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

This is how it seems to me,
and thus have I heard it from perfected ones."

"It is good,
it is good, sire;
it is good that it seems thus to you, sire,
and it is good that you have heard this from perfected ones.

"What do you think about this, sire?"

This being so,
are these four castes exactly the same or not?

Or how does this seem to you?"

"Indeed, good Kaccāna,
this being so,
these four castes are exactly the same;
I do not see any difference between them in this respect."

"This is a way in which it can be said, sire, that this is merely a sound in the world, that:

'Only brahmans form the best caste,
all other castes are low;
only brahmans form the fair caste,
all other casts are dark;

only brahmans are pure,
not non-brahmans;
brahmans are own sons of Brahmā,
born of his mouth,
born of Brahmā, formed by Brahmā, heirs to Brahmā.'

What do you think about this, sire?

If a noble were to break into a house,
or carry off loot,
or commit a robbery,
or make an ambush,
or commit adultery,<sup>6</sup>
and if men who had captured him
were to show him to you, and say:

'This, your majesty, is the thief
who is doing evil to you, decree what punishment you like for him' -

what would you do to him?"

"Good Kaccāna, we should kill him or ruin him
or banish him
or deal with him as we liked."<sup>7</sup>

What is the cause of this?

Good Kaccāna, the designation of 'noble' that he once had
has now disappeared for him,
and he is reckoned simply as 'thief.'"

[277] What do you think about this, sire?

If a brahman were to break into a house,
or carry off loot,
or commit a robbery,
or make an ambush,
or commit adultery,
and if men who had captured him
were to show him to you, and say:

'This, your majesty, is the thief
who is doing evil to you,
decree what punishment you like for him' -

what would you do to him?"

"Good Kaccāna, we should kill him
or ruin him
or banish him
or deal with him as we liked.

What is the cause of this?

Good Kaccāna, the designation of 'brahman'
that he once had
has now disappeared for him,
and he is reckoned simply as 'thief.'"

What do you think about this, sire?

If a merchant were to break into a house,
or carry off loot,
or commit a robbery,
or make an ambush,
or commit adultery,
and if men who had captured him
were to show him to you, and say:

'This, your majesty, is the thief
who is doing evil to you,
decree what punishment you like for him' -

what would you do to him?"

"Good Kaccāna, we should kill him
or ruin him
or banish him
or deal with him as we liked.

What is the cause of this?

Good Kaccāna, the designation of 'merchant'
that he once had
has now disappeared for him,
and he is reckoned simply as 'thief.'"

What do you think about this, sire?

If a worker were to break into a house,
or carry off loot,
or commit a robbery,
or make an ambush,
or commit adultery,
and if men who had captured him
were to show him to you, and say:

'This, your majesty, is the thief
who is doing evil to you,
decree what punishment you like for him' -

what would you do to him?"

"Good Kaccāna, we should kill him
or ruin him

or banish him
or deal with him as we liked.

What is the cause of this?

Good Kaccāna, the designation of 'worker'
that he once had
has now disappeared for him,
and he is reckoned simply as 'thief.'"

"What do you think about this, sire?

This being so,
are these four castes exactly the same or not?

Or how does this seem to you?"

"Indeed, good Kaccāna,
this being so,
these four castes are exactly the same;
I do not see any difference between them in this respect."

"This is a way in which it can be said, sire, that this is merely a sound in the world, that:

'Only brahmans form the best caste,
all other castes are low;
only brahmans form the fair caste,
all other casts are dark;
only brahmans are pure,
not non-brahmans;
brahmans are own sons of Brahmā,
born of his mouth,
born of Brahmā, formed by Brahmā, heirs to Brahmā.'

What do you think about this, sire?

If a noble, having cut off his hair and beard here,<sup>8</sup> having donned saffron robes,
should have gone forth from home into homelessness,
and is one that refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from lying speech,
is a one-meal-man,
a Brahma-farer,
virtuous,
of lovely character -
what would you do to him?"

"Good Kaccāna,
we should salute him
or rise up before him
or offer him a seat
or invite him to the requisites of robe-material,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick, or we should have proper watch and ward and guard provided for him.<sup>9</sup>|| ||

What is the cause of this?|| ||

Good Kaccāna,
the designation of 'noble'
that he once had
has now disappeared for him,
and he is reckoned simply as 'recluse.'"

What do you think about this, sire?

If a brahman,
having cut off his hair and beard here,
having donned saffron robes,

should have gone forth from home into homelessness,
and is one that refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from lying speech,
is a one-meal-man,
a Brahma-farer,
virtuous,
of lovely character -
what would you do to him?"

"Good Kaccāna,
we should salute him
or rise up before him
or offer him a seat
or invite him to the requisites of robe-material,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick,
or we should have proper watch and ward and guard provided for him. || ||

What is the cause of this? || ||

Good Kaccāna,
the designation of 'brahman'
that he once had
has now disappeared for him,
and he is reckoned simply as 'recluse.'"

What do you think about this, sire?

If a merchant,
having cut off his hair and beard here,
having donned saffron robes,
should have gone forth from home into homelessness,
and is one that refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,

from lying speech,
is a one-meal-man,
a Brahma-farer,
virtuous,
of lovely character -
what would you do to him?"

"Good Kaccāna,
we should salute him
or rise up before him
or offer him a seat
or invite him to the requisites of robe-material,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick,
or we should have proper watch and ward and guard provided for him. || ||

What is the cause of this? || ||

Good Kaccāna,
the designation of 'merchant'
that he once had
has now disappeared for him,
and he is reckoned simply as 'recluse.'"

What do you think about this, sire?

If a worker,
having cut off his hair and beard here,
having donned saffron robes,
should have gone forth from home into homelessness,
and is one that refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from lying speech,
is a one-meal-man,
a Brahma-farer,

virtuous,
of lovely character -
what would you do to him?"

"Good Kaccāna,
we should salute him
or rise up before him
or offer him a seat
or invite him to the requisites of robe-material,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick,
or we should have proper watch and ward and guard provided for him. || ||

What is the cause of this? || ||

Good Kaccāna,
the designation of 'worker'
that he once had
has now disappeared for him,
and he is reckoned simply as 'recluse.'"

"What do you think about this, sire?"

This being so,
are these four castes exactly the same or not?

Or how does this seem to you?"

"Indeed, good Kaccāna,
this being so,
these four castes are exactly the same;
I do not see any difference between them in this respect."

"This is a way in which it can be said, sire, that this is merely a [278] sound in the world, that:

'Only brahmans form the best caste,
all other castes are low;
only brahmans form the fair caste,
all other casts are dark;
only brahmans are pure,
not non-brahmans;
brahmans are own sons of Brahmā,
born of his mouth,
born of Brahmā, formed by Brahmā, heirs to Brahmā.'

When this had been said, Avantiputta, king of Madhurā, spoke thus to the venerable Kaccāna the Great:

"Excellent, good Kaccāna,
excellent, good Kaccāna.

It is as if one might set upright what had been upset,<sup>10</sup>
or might disclose what was covered,
or show the way to one who had gone astray,
or bring an oil-lamp into the darkness
so that those with vision might see material shapes - even so in many a figure has dhamma been made clear by the good Kaccāna.

Thus I am going to the revered Kaccāna for refuge
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the revered Kaccāna accept me as a lay-disciple going for refuge from today forth
for as long as life lasts."

"But do not you, sire, go for refuge to me.

You must go for refuge only to that Lord to whom I have gone for refuge."

"But where, good Kaccāna, is this Lord staying now,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One?"

"Sire, this Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
has now attained final nibbāna."

"Good Kaccāna, if we should hear that that Lord were ten ... twenty thirty ... forty ... fifty yojana distant we should go the fifty yojana so as to see that Lord.

And, good Kaccāna,
even if we heard that the Lord were a hundred yojana distant,
we should go the hundred yojana
so as to see that Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

But, good Kaccāna,
since the Lord has attained final nibbāna, we are going for refuge to that Lord who has attained final nibbana
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the revered Kaccāna accept me as a lay-disciple
going for refuge from today forth
for as long as life lasts."

Discourse at Madhurā: The Fourth

---

<sup>1</sup> As at A. i. 67. This Madhurā Is on the Jumna.

<sup>2</sup> MA. iii. 319: the son of the daughter of the king of Avanti.

<sup>3</sup> As at M. ii. 148; D. iii. 81.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. D. i. 60; A. iii. 37.

<sup>5</sup> Omitted in the text, in error judging from the king's response.

<sup>6</sup> As at M. i. 87.

<sup>7</sup> Various punishments are named at M. i. 87.

<sup>8</sup> The following passage down to "guard provided for him" also occurs at M. ii. 101.

<sup>9</sup> Cf. D. i. 61. "Proper" or "legitimate," dhammika, here seems to mean "recognised or understood as being customary." MA. iii. 321 says the arrangement would be like that (traditional one) where gatherers of sticks and leaves do not enter the vihara of a Naked Ascetic, or where hunters and trappers do not catch animals or fish within the boundary of a vihāra.

<sup>10</sup> From here to the end of this Discourse, compare with M. ii. 162-163.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
4. Rāja Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
4. The Royal Division

85. Discourse to Prince Bodhi

Bodhi-Rāja-Kumāra Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying among the Bhaggas in Suṁsumāragira in Bhesakaḷā Grove
in the deer-park.

At that time Prince Bodhi had a palace named Kokanada;<sup>1</sup> it had not long been built and had had not (yet) been inhabited by a recluse or brahman
or by any human being.

Then Prince Bodhi addressed the brahman youth Sañjikā's son,
saying:

"Come you, good Sañjikā's son,
approach the Lord;
having approached,
in my name salute the Lord's feet with your head,
and ask whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort,
and say:

'Lord, Prince Bodhi salutes the Lord's feet with his head and asks whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort.'

And speak thus to him:

'Revered sir, may the Lord,
together with the Order of monks,
consent to (accept) a meal on the morrow
with Prince Bodhi.'

"Yes, sir,"
and the brahman youth Sañjikā's son, having answered Prince Bodhi in assent,
approached the Lord;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the Lord,
and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the brahman youth Sañjikā's son

spoke thus to the Lord:

"Good Gotama,
Prince Bodhi salutes with his head
the good Gotama's feet
and asks whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort.

And he speaks thus:

'May the revered Gotama,
together with the Order of monks,
consent to (accept) a meal on the morrow
with Prince Bodhi.'

The Lord consented by becoming silent.

Then the brahman youth Sañjikā's son, having understood the Lord's consent,
rising from his seat
approached Prince Bodhi;
having approached,
he spoke thus to Prince Bodhi:

"I spoke in your name, good sir, to the Lord Gotama,
saying:

"Good Gotama,
Prince Bodhi salutes with his head
the good Gotama's feet
and asks whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,

strong,
abiding in comfort.

And he speaks thus:

'May the revered Gotama,
together with the Order of monks,
consent to (accept) a meal on the morrow
with [280] Prince Bodhi.'

And the recluse Gotama consented."

Then, after Prince Bodhi had had sumptuous foods,
solid and soft,
prepared in his own dwelling
towards the end of that night, and had had the Kokanada palace spread with white cloths as far as the last<sup>2</sup> flight of stairs, he addressed the brahman youth Sañjikā's son,
saying:

"Come you, good Sañjikā's son,
approach the Lord;
having approached,
announce the time to the Lord,
saying:

'It is time, revered sir,
the meal is ready.'

"Yes, good sir,"
and the brahman youth Sañjikā's son,
having answered Prince Bodhi in assent,
approached the Lord;
having approached,

he announced the time to the Lord,
saying:

"It is time, revered sir,
the meal is ready."

Then the Lord, dressing in the morning and taking his bowl and robe, approached Prince Bodhi's dwelling.

At that time Prince Bodhi, while he was waiting for the Lord, was standing at the porch of the outside gateway.

And Prince Bodhi saw the Lord coming in the distance;
having seen him
and gone to meet him, he greeted and honoured the Lord and approached the Kokanada palace.

Then the Lord stood leaning against the last flight of stairs.

And Prince Bodhi spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, let the Lord step on the cloths, let the Well-farer step on the cloths
so that for a long time
it may be for my welfare and happiness."

When this had been said,
the Lord was silent.

And a second time Prince Bodhi spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, let the Lord step on the cloths,
let the Well-farer step on the cloths
so that for a long time
it may be for my welfare and happiness."

When this had been said,
the Lord was silent.

And a third time Prince Bodhi spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, let the Lord step on the cloths,
let the Well-farer step on the cloths
so that for a long time
it may be for my welfare and happiness."

Then the Lord looked towards the venerable Ānanda.

And the venerable Ānanda spoke thus to Prince Bodhi:

"Prince, have the cloths packed away.

The Lord will not tread upon a cloth carpeting; the Tathāgata looks towards<sup>3</sup> the folk that come after."

Then Prince Bodhi had the cloths packed away, and had a seat made ready upstairs in the Kokanada palace.

Then the Lord
having ascended the Kokanada palace, sat down on the seat made ready
together with the Order of monks.

Then Prince Bodhi
with his own hand
served and satisfied the Order of monks with the Lord at its head

with sumptuous foods,
solid and soft.

Then when the Lord had eaten and had withdrawn his hand from his bowl, Prince Bodhi, having taken a lower seat,
sat down at a respectful distance.

[281] As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Prince Bodhi Spoke thus to the Lord:

"Lord, it has occurred to me thus:

Happiness is not to be achieved through happiness;
happiness is to be achieved through suffering."<sup>4</sup>

"To me too, Prince,
before my Awakening,
while I was still the bodhisatta,
not fully awakened,
it occurred:

Happiness is not to be achieved through happiness;
happiness is to be achieved through suffering."

Then I, Prince, after a time, being young, my hair coal-black, possessed of radiant youth,
in the prime of my life — although my unwilling parents wept and wailed — having cut off my hair and beard, having put on yellow robes,
went forth from home
into homelessness.

I, being gone forth thus,
a quester for whatever is good,
searching for the incomparable,

matchless path to peace,
approached Āḷāra the Kālāma;
having approached,
I spoke thus to Āḷāra the Kālāma:

'I, reverend Kālāma, want to fare the Brahmā-faring
in this dhamma and discipline.'

This said, Prince, Āḷāra the Kālāma spoke thus to me:

'Let the venerable one proceed;
this dhamma is such that an intelligent man,
having soon realised super-knowledge for himself (as learnt from) his own teacher, may enter on and abide in it.'

So I, Prince, very soon,
very quickly,
mastered that dhamma.

I, Prince, as far as mere lip service,
mere repetition
were concerned,
spoke the doctrine of knowledge,
and the doctrine of the elders,
and I claimed —
I as well as others —
that 'I know, I see.'

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'But Āḷāra the Kālāma does not merely proclaim this dhamma simply out of faith:
Having realised super-knowledge for myself,
entering on it,
I am abiding therein.'

For surely Āḷāra the Kālāma proceeds knowing, seeing this dhamma.'

Then did I, Prince,
approach Āḷāra the Kālāma;
having approached,
I spoke thus to Āḷāra the Kālāma:

'To what extent do you, reverend Kālāma, having realised super-knowledge for yourself,
entering thereon,
proclaim this dhamma?'

When this had been said, Prince, Āḷāra the Kālāma proclaimed the plane of no-thing.

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'It is not only Āḷāra the Kālāma who has faith,
I too have faith.

It is not only Āḷāra the Kālāma who has energy,
I too have energy.

It is not only Āḷāra the Kālāma who has mindfulness,
I too have mindfulness.

It is not only Āḷāra the Kālāma who has concentration,
I too have concentration.

It is not only Āḷāra the Kālāma who has intuitive wisdom,
I too have intuitive wisdom.

Suppose now that I should strive for the realisation of that dhamma which Āḷāra the Kālāma proclaims:
'Having realised super-knowledge for myself,

entering on it
I am abiding therein?'

So I, Prince, very soon,
very quickly,
having realised super-knowledge for myself,
entering on that dhamma,
abided therein.

Then I, Prince,
approached Āḷāra the Kālāma;
having approached,
I spoke thus to Āḷāra the Kālāma:

'Is it to this extent
that you, reverend Kalama,
proclaim this dhamma,
entering on it,
having realised it by your own super-knowledge?'

'It is to this extent
that I, your reverence,
proclaim this dhamma,
entering on it,
having realised it by my own super-knowledge.'

'I too, your reverence, having realised this dhamma
by my own super-knowledge,
entering on it
am abiding in it.'

'It is profitable for us,
it is well gotten for us, your reverence,
that we see a fellow Brahmā-farer
such as the venerable one.

This dhamma that I, entering on,
proclaim,
having realised it by my own super-knowledge,
is the dhamma that you,
entering on,
are abiding in,
having realised it by your own super-knowledge;
the dhamma that you,
entering on,
are abiding in,
having realised it by your own super-knowledge,
is the dhamma that I,
entering on,
proclaim,
having realised it by my own super-knowledge.

The dhamma that I know,
this is the dhamma that you know.

The dhamma that you know, this is the dhamma that I know.

As I am,
so are you;
as you are,
so am I.

Come now, your reverence,
being just the two of us,
let us look after this group.'

In this way, Prince,
did Āḷāra the Kālāma,
being my teacher,
set me — the pupil —

on the same level as himself
and honoured me with the highest honour.

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'This dhamma does not conduce to disregard nor to dispassion
nor to stopping
nor to tranquillity
nor to super-knowledge
nor to awakening
nor to Nibbāna,
but only as far as reaching the plane of no-thing.'

So I, Prince,
not getting enough from this dhamma, disregarded and turned away from this dhamma.

---

Then I, Prince,
a quester for whatever is good,
searching for the incomparable,
matchless path to peace,
approached Uddaka, Rāma's son;
having approached,
I spoke thus to Uddaka, Rāma's son:

'I, your reverence,
want to fare the Brahmā-faring
in this dhamma and discipline.'

This said, Prince, Uddaka, Rāma's son, spoke thus to me:

'Let the venerable one proceed;
this dhamma is such
that an intelligent man,
having soon realised super-knowledge for himself, (as learnt from) his own teacher,
may enter on and abide in it.'

So I, Prince, very soon,
very quickly,
mastered that dhamma.

I, Prince, as far as mere lip service,
mere repetition were concerned,
spoke the doctrine of knowledge
and the doctrine of the elders,
and I claimed —
I as well as others —
that 'I know, I see.'

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'But Uddahka, Rāma's son, does not merely proclaim this dhamma simply out of faith:
Having realised super-knowledge for myself,
entering on it,
I am abiding in it.

For surely Uddaka, Rāma's son,
proceeds knowing and seeing this dhamma.'

Then did I, Prince,
approach Uddaka, Rāma's;
having approached,
I spoke thus to Uddaka, Rāma's son:

'To what extent do you, reverend Rāma,
having realised super-knowledge for yourself,

entering thereon
proclaim this dhamma?'

When this had been said, Prince, Uddahka, Rāma's son, proclaimed the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'It is not only Rāma who has faith,
I too have faith.

It is not only Rāma who has energy,
I too have energy.

It is not only Rāma who has mindfulness,
I too have mindfulness.

It is not only Rāma who has concentration,
I too have concentration.

It is not only Rāma who has intuitive wisdom,
I too have intuitive wisdom.

Suppose now that I should strive for the realisation of that dhamma which Rāma proclaims:

'Having realised super-knowledge for myself,
entering on it
I am abiding in it?'

So I, Prince, very soon,
very quickly,
having realised super-knowledge for myself,
entering on that dhamma,
abided therein.

Then I, Prince,
approached Uddaka, Rāma's son;

having approached,
I spoke thus to Uddaka, Rāma's son:

'Is it to this extent
that you, reverend Rāma,
proclaim this dhamma,
entering on it,
having realised it by your own super-knowledge?'

'It is to this extent
that I, your reverence,
proclaim this dhamma,
entering on it,
having realised it by my own super-knowledge.'

'I too, your reverence,
having realised this dhamma by my own super-knowledge,
entering on it
am abiding in it.'

'It is profitable for us,
it is well gotten by us,
your reverence,
that we see a fellow-Brahmā-farer such as the venerable one.'

This dhamma that I,
entering on,
proclaim,
having realised it by my own super-knowledge,
is the dhamma that you,
entering on,
are abiding in,
having realised it by your own super-knowledge;
the dhamma that you,
entering on,
are abiding in,

having realised it by your own super-knowledge,
is the dhamma that I,
entering on,
proclaim,
having realised it by my own super-knowledge.

The dhamma that I know,
this is the dhamma that you know.

That dhamma that you know,
this is the dhamma that I know.

As I am,
so are you;
as you are,
so am I.

Come now, your reverence,
being just the two of us,
let us look after this group.

In this way, Prince, did Uddaka, Rāma's son,
being my teacher,
set me — the pupil —
on the same level as himself
and honoured me with the highest honour.

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'This dhamma does not conduce to disregard nor to dispassion
nor to stopping
nor to tranquillity
nor to super-knowledge
nor to awakening
nor to Nibbāna,

but only as far as reaching the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.'

So I, Prince, not getting enough from this dhamma, disregarded and turned away from this dhamma.

---

Then I, monks, a quester for whatever is good,
searching for the incomparable,
matchless path to peace,
walking on tour through Magadha
in due course arrived at Uruvela, the camp township.

There I saw a delightful stretch of land
and a lovely woodland grove,
and a clear flowing river
with a delightful ford,
and a village for support nearby.

It occurred to me, Prince:

'Indeed it it is a delightful stretch of land, and the woodland grove is lovely,
and the river flows clear
with a delightful ford,
and there is a village for support nearby.

Indeed this does well
for the striving
of a young man set on striving.'

Moreover, Prince,
three similes occurred to me spontaneously,
never heard before:

It is as if there were a wet sappy stick placed in water;
then a man might come along
bringing an upper piece of fire-stick,
and thinking:

'I will light a fire,
I will get heat.'

What do you think about this, Prince?

Could that man, bringing an upper piece of fire-stick,
and rubbing that wet sappy stick
that had been placed in water (with it),
light a fire,
could he get heat?"

"No, good Gotama.

What is the cause of this?

It is, good Gotama,
that such a stick is wet and sappy
and that it was placed in water.

That man would only get fatigue and distress."

"In like manner, Prince,
whatever recluses or brahmans dwell not aloof
from pleasures of the senses that are bodily,
then if that which is for them,
among the sense-pleasures,
desire for sense-pleasure,
affection for sense-pleasure,

infatuation with sense-pleasure,
thirst for sense-pleasure,
fever for sense-pleasure -
if that is not properly got rid of subjectively
nor properly allayed, whether these worthy recluses and brahmans experience feelings which are
acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe,
they could not become those for knowledge,
for vision,
for the incomparable Self-awakening;
and whether these worthy recluses and brahmans do not experience feelings which are acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe,
they could not become those for knowledge,
for vision,
for the incomparable Self-awakening.

This, Prince, was the first parable that occurred to me spontaneously, never heard before.

■

Then, Prince, a second parable occurred to me spontaneously,
never heard before.

It is as if, Prince, a wet, sappy stick were placed on dry ground,
far from water.

Then a man might come along
bringing an upper piece of fire-stick,
and thinking:

'I will light a fire,
I will get heat.'

What do you think about this, Prince?

Could that man,
bringing an upper piece of fire-stick,
and rubbing that wet sappy stick
that had been placed on the dry ground,
far from water,
light a fire,
could he get heat?"|| ||

"No, good Gotama.

What is the cause of this?

It is, good Gotama, that that stick is wet and sappy although it had been placed on dry ground,
far from water.

So that man would only get fatigue and distress."

"In like manner, Prince,
whatever recluses or brahmans dwell not aloof
from pleasures of the senses that are bodily,
then if that which is for them,
among the sense-pleasures,
desire for sense-pleasure,
affection for sense-pleasure,
infatuation with sense-pleasure,
thirst for sense-pleasure,
fever for sense-pleasure -

if that is not properly got rid of subjectively
nor properly allayed,
whether these worthy recluses and brahmans experience feelings which are
acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe,
they could not become those for knowledge,
for vision,
for the incomparable Self-awakening;
and whether these worthy recluses and brahmans do not experience feelings
which are acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe,
they could not become those for knowledge,
for vision,
for the incomparable Self-awakening.

This, Prince, was the second parable
that occurred to me spontaneously, never heard before.

■

Then, Prince, a third parable
occurred to me spontaneously,
never heard before.

It is as if, Prince, a dry sapless stick were placed on the dry ground, far from water.

Then a man might come along
bringing an upper piece of fire-stick,
and thinking:

'I will light a fire,
I will get heat.'

What do you think about this, Prince?

Could that man, bringing an upper piece of fire-stick, and rubbing that dry sapless stick that had been placed on dry ground,
far from water,
light a fire,
could he get heat?"

"Yes, good Gotama.

What is the cause of this?

It is, good Gotama,
that that stick was dry and sapless and had been placed on dry ground
far from water."

"In like manner, Prince,
whatever recluses or brahmans dwell aloof
from pleasures of the senses that are bodily,
then if that which is for them,
among the sense-pleasures,
desire for sense-pleasure,
affection for sense-pleasure,
infatuation with sense-pleasure,
thirst for sense-pleasure,
fever for sense-pleasure -
if this is well got rid of subjectively,
well allayed,
then whether these worthy recluses and brahmans experience feelings that are acute,
painful,
sharp,

severe,
indeed they become those for knowledge,
for vision,
for the incomparable Self-awakening;
and whether these worthy recluses and brahmans do not experience feelings that are acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe,
indeed they become those for knowledge,
for vision,
for the incomparable Self-awakening.

This, Prince, was the third parable
that occurred to me spontaneously,
never heard before.

These, Prince, were the three parables
that occurred to me spontaneously, never heard before.

---

It occurred to me, Prince:

'Suppose now that I,
with my teeth clenched,
with my tongue pressed against the palate,
by mind should subdue,
restrain and dominate my mind?'

So I, Prince, with my teeth clenched,
with my tongue pressed against the palate,
by mind subdued,

restrained
and dominated my mind.

While I was subduing,
restraining
and dominating my mind,
with the teeth clenched,
the tongue pressed against the palate,
sweat poured from my armpits.

It is as if, Prince,
a strong man,
having taken hold of a weaker man
by his head or shoulders, would subdue,
restrain
and dominate him.

Even so, while I, Prince,
was subduing,
restraining
and dominating my mind by mind,
with my teeth clenched,
with my tongue pressed against the palate,
sweat poured from my armpits.

Although, Prince, unsluggish energy came to be stirred up in me,
unmuddled mindfulness set up,
yet my body was turbulent,
not calmed,
because I was harassed in striving
by striving against that very pain.

But yet, Prince,
that painful feeling,

arising in me,
persisted without impinging on my mind. || ||

It occurred to me, Prince:

'Suppose now that I should meditate
the non-breathing meditation?

So I, Prince,
stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose.

When I, Prince,
had stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose,
there came to be an exceedingly loud noise
of winds escaping by the auditory passages.

As there comes to be an exceedingly loud noise
from the roaring of a smith's bellows, even so when I, Prince, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose,
there came to be an exceedingly loud noise
of wind escaping by the auditory passages.

Although, Prince, unsluggish energy came to be stirred up in me,
unmuddled mindfulness set up,
yet my body was turbulent,
not calmed,
because I was harassed in striving
by striving against that very pain.

It was even in this wise, Prince, that a painful feeling that had arisen in me

persisted without impinging on my mind.

It occurred to me, Prince:

'Suppose now that I should still meditate
the non-breathing meditation?'

So I, Prince, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears.

When I, Prince, had stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
exceedingly loud winds rent my head.

As, Prince, a strong man might cleave one's head
with a sharp-edged sword,
even so when I, Prince, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
exceedingly loud winds rent my head.

Although, Prince, unsluggish energy came to be stirred up in me,
unmuddled mindfulness set up,
yet my body was turbulent,
not calmed,
because I was harassed in striving
by striving against that very pain.

But yet, Prince, that painful feeling,
arising in me,
persisted without impinging on my mind.

It occurred to me, Prince:

'Suppose that I should still meditate
the non-breathing meditation?'

So I, Prince, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears.

When I, Prince, had stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
I came to have very bad headaches.

As, Prince, a strong man might clamp a turban on one's head
with a tight leather strap, even so when I, Prince, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
did I come to have very bad headaches.

Although, Prince, unsluggish energy came to be stirred up in me,
unmuddled mindfulness set up,
yet my body was turbulent,
not calmed,
because I was harassed in striving
by striving against that very pain.

But yet, Prince, that painful feeling,
arising in me,
persisted without impinging on my mind.

It occurred to me, Prince:

'Suppose now that I should still meditate
the non-breathing meditation?'

So I, Prince, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears.

When I, Prince, had stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
very strong winds cut through my stomach.

As, Prince, a skilled cattle-butcher or his apprentice
might cut through the stomach
with a sharp butcher's knife, even so, Prince, did very strong winds cut through my stomach.

Although, Prince, unsluggish energy came to be stirred up in me,
unmuddled mindfulness set up,
yet my body was turbulent,
not calmed,
because I was harassed in striving
by striving against that very pain.

But yet, Prince, that painful feeling,
arising in me,
persisted without impinging on my mind.

It occurred to me, Prince:

'Suppose now that I should still meditate
the non-breathing meditation?'

So I, Prince, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears.

When I, Prince, had stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
there came to be a fierce heat in my body.

As, Prince, two strong men, having taken hold of a weaker man by his limbs,
might set fire to him,
might make him sizzle up
over a charcoal pit,
even so, Prince,
when I had stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
did there come to be a fierce heat in my body.

Although, Prince, unsluggish energy came to be stirred up in me,
unmuddled mindfulness set up,
yet my body was turbulent,
not calmed,
because I was harassed in striving
by striving against that very pain.

But yet, Prince, that painful feeling,
arising in me,
persisted without impinging on my mind.

In addition to this, Prince,
devatās, having seen me, spoke thus:

'The recluse Gotama has passed away.'

Other devatās spoke thus;

'The recluse Gotama has not passed away,
but he is passing away.'

Other devatās spoke thus:

'The recluse Gotama has not passed away,
nor is he passing away;
the recluse Gotama is a perfected one,
the mode of living of a perfected one is just like this.'

It occurred to me, Prince:

'Suppose now that I should take the line of desisting from all food?'

Then, Prince, devatās,
having approached me,
spoke thus:

'Do not, good sir,
take the line of desisting from all food.'

If you, good sir,
take the line of desisting from all food,
then we will give you deva-like essences
to take in through the pores of the skin;
you will keep going by means of them.'

Then, Prince, it occurred to me:

'Suppose that I should take the line
of not eating anything,

and these devatās were to give me deva-like essences
to take in through the pores of the skin,
and that I should keep going by means of them,
that would be an imposture in me.'

So I, Prince, rejected those devatās
I said,
'Enough.'

It occurred to me, Prince:

'Suppose now that I were to take food
little by little,
drop by drop,
such as bean-soup
or vetoh-soup
or chick-pea-soup
or pea-soup?

So I, Prince, took food
little by little,
drop by drop,
such as bean-soup
or veteh-soup
or chick-pea-soup
or pea-soup.

While I, Prince, was taking food
little by little,
drop by drop,
such as bean-soup
or vetch-soup
or chick-pea-soup
or pea-soup,
my body became exceedingly emaciated.

Because I ate so little,
all my limbs became like the joints of withered creepers;
because I ate so little,
my buttocks became like a bullock's hoof;
because I ate so little,
my protruding backbone
became like a string of balls;
because I ate so little,
my gaunt ribs
became like the crazy rafters
of a tumble-down shed;
because I ate so little,
the pupils of my eyes
appeared lying low and deep;
because I ate so little,
my scalp became shrivelled and shrunk
as a bitter white gourd
cut before it is ripe
becomes shrivelled and shrunk by a hot wind.

If I, Prince, thought:

'I will touch the skin of my belly,' it was my backbone that I took hold of.

If I thought:

'I will touch my backbone,'
it was the skin of my belly that I took hold of.

For because I ate so little,
the skin of my belly, Prince,
came to be cleaving to my backbone.

If I, Prince, thought:

'I will obey the calls of nature,'
I fell down on my face then and there,
because I ate so little.

If I, Prince, soothing my body, stroked my limbs with my hand,
the hairs,
rotted at the roots,
fell away from my body
as I stroked my limbs with my hand,
because I ate so little.

And further, Prince, men,
having seen me,
spoke thus:

'The recluse Gotama is black.'

Other men spoke thus:

'The recluse Gotama is not black,
the recluse Gotama is deep brown.'

Some men spoke thus:

'The recluse Gotama is not black,
he is not even deep brown,
the recluse Gotama is of a sallow colour.'

To such an extent, Prince, was my clear pure complexion spoilt because I ate so little.

This, Prince, occurred to me:

'Some recluses and brahmans
in the past

have experienced feelings that were acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe;
but this is paramount,
nor is there worse than this.

And some recluses and brahmans
in the future
will experience feelings that are acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe;
but this is paramount,
nor is there worse than this.

And some recluses and brahmans
are now
experiencing feelings that are acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe;
but this is paramount,
nor is there worse than this.

But I,
by this severe austerity,
do not reach states of further-men,
the excellent knowledge and vision
befitting the ariyans.

Could there be another way to awakening?

This, Prince, occurred to me:

'I know that while my father, the Sakyan,
was ploughing,

and I was sitting in the cool shade of a rose-apple tree,
aloof from pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
entering on the first meditation,
which is accompanied by initial thought
and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness,
and is rapturous and joyful,
and while abiding therein,
I thought:

'Now could this be a way to awakening?'

Then, following on my mindfulness, Prince,
there was the consciousness:

'This is itself the Way to awakening.'

This occurred to me, Prince:

'Now, am I afraid of that happiness
which is happiness
apart from sense-pleasures,
apart from unskilled states of mind?'

This occurred to me, Prince:

'I am not afraid of that happiness
which is happiness
apart from sense-pleasures,
apart from unskilled states of mind.'

This occurred to me, Prince:

'Now it is not easy to reach that happiness
by thus subjecting the body to extreme emaciation.'

Suppose I were to take material nourishment -
boiled rice
and sour milk?'

So I, Prince, took material nourishment - boiled rice
and sour milk.

Now at that time, Prince,
five monks were attending me
and (they thought):

'When the recluse Gotama wins dhamma
he will announce it to us.'

But when I, Prince, took material nourishment - boiled rice
and sour milk -
then these five monks turned on me in disgust,
saying:

'The recluse Gotama lives in abundance,
he is wavering in his striving,
he has reverted to a life of abundance.'

But when I, Prince, had taken some material nourishment, having picked up strength,
aloof from pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
I entered on
and abided in
the first meditation
which is accompanied by initial thought
and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness,
and is rapturous and joyful.

But yet, Prince, the pleasurable feeling, arising in me,
persisted without impinging on my mind.

By allaying initial thought
and discursive thought,
with the mind subjectively tranquillised
and fixed on one point, I entered on
and abided in
the second meditation
which is devoid of initial and discursive thought,
is born of concentration,
and is rapturous and joyful.

But yet, Prince, the pleasurable feeling, arising in me,
persisted without impinging on my mind.

By the fading out of rapture
I dwelt with equanimity,
attentive and clearly conscious,
and I experienced in my person
that joy of which the ariyans say:
'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,'
and I entered on
and abided in
the third meditation.

But yet, Prince, the pleasurable feeling, arising in me,
persisted without impinging on my mind.

By getting rid of joy
and by getting rid of anguish,
by the going down of former pleasures and sorrows,
I entered into
and abided in
the fourth meditation

which has neither anguish nor joy
and which is entirely purified
by equanimity and mindfulness.

But yet, Prince, the pleasurable feeling, arising in me,
persisted without impinging on my mind.

---

With the mind composed thus,
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
fixed,
immovable,
I directed my mind
to the knowledge and recollection
of former habitations:

I remembered a variety of former habitations, thus:
one birth,
two births,
three births,
four births,
five births,
ten births,
twenty births,
thirty births,
forty births,
fifty births,
a hundred births,

a thousand births,
a hundred thousand births,
and many an eon of integration
and many an eon of disintegration
and many an eon of integration-disintegration;
such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I came to be in another state
where such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I arose here.

Thus I remember divers former habitations
in all their modes and detail.

This, Prince,
was the first knowledge attained by me in the first watch of the night;
ignorance was dispelled,
knowledge arose,
darkness was dispelled,
light arose,
even as I abided diligent,

ardent,
self-resolute.

■

Then with the mind composed,
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
fixed,
immovable,
I directed my mind
to the knowledge of the passing hence
and the arising of beings.

With the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
I see beings as they pass hence
or come to be;
I comprehend that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going,
according to the consequences of their deeds,
and I think:

Indeed these worthy beings
who were possessed of wrong conduct in body,
who were possessed of wrong conduct of speech,
who were possessed of wrong conduct of thought,
scoffers at the ariyans,
holding a wrong view,

incurring deeds consequent on a wrong view -
these, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a sorrowful state,
a bad bourn,
the abyss,
Niraya Hell.

But these worthy beings
who were possessed of good conduct in body,
who were possessed of good conduct in speech,
who were possessed of good conduct in thought,
who did not scoff at the ariyans,
holding a right view,
incurring deeds consequent on a right view -
these, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

Thus with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
do I see beings as they pass hence,
as they arise;
I comprehend that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going
according to the consequences of their deeds.

This, Prince,
was the second knowledge attained by me in the middle watch of the night;
ignorance was dispelled,
knowledge arose,
darkness was dispelled,

light arose,
even as I abided diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute.<sup>5</sup>

■

Then Prince, it occurred to me:

'This dhamma, won to by me is deep,
difficult to see,
difficult to understand,
tranquil,
excellent,
beyond dialectic,
subtle,
intelligible to the learned.

But this is a creation
delighting in sensual pleasure,
delighted by sensual pleasure,
rejoicing in sensual pleasure.

So that for a creation
delighting in sensual pleasure,
delighted by sensual pleasure,
rejoicing in sensual pleasure,
this were a matter difficult to see,
that is to say
causal uprising by way of condition.

This too were a matter difficult to see,
that is to say
the tranquillising of all the activities, the renunciation of all attachment, the destruction of craving, dispassion,

stopping,
Nibbāna.

But if I were to teach dhamma and others were not to understand me, that would be a weariness to me, that would be a vexation to me.

Moreover, Prince, these verses not heard before in the past spontaneously occurred to me:

This that through many toils I've won — Enough! why should I make it known?
By folk with lust and hate consumed
This dhamma is not understood.

Leading on against the stream,
Deep, subtle, difficult to see, delicate,
Unseen 'twill be by passion's slaves Cloaked in the murk of ignorance.

In such wise, as I was pondering, Prince, my mind inclined to little effort and not teaching dhamma.

Then, Prince, it occurred to Brahmā Sahampati who knew with his mind
the reasoning in my mind:

'Alas, the world is lost, alas, the world is destroyed, inasmuch as the mind of the Tathāgata,
the perfected one,
the fully awakened one,

inclines to little effort and not to teaching dhamma.'

Then, Prince,
as a strong man might stretch out his bent arm,
or might bend back his outstretched arm,
even so did Brahmā Sahampati, vanishing from the Brahmā-world, become manifest before me.

Then, Prince, Brahmā Sahampati,
having arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, having saluted me with joined palms,
spoke thus to me:

'Lord, let the Lord teach dhamma, let the well-farer teach dhamma; there are beings with little dust in their eyes who;
not hearing dhamma,
are decaying, (but if) they are learners of dhamma they will grow.'

Thus spoke Brahmā Sahampati to me, Prince;
having said this,
he further spoke thus:

'There has appeared in Magadha before thee
An unclean dhamma by (minds) with stains devised.
Open this door of deathlessness; let them hear Dhamma awakened to by the stainless one.

As on a crag on crest of mountain standing
A man might watch the people all around,
E'en so do thou, O Wisdom fair, ascending, O Seer of all, the terraced heights of truth,

Look down, from grief released, upon the peoples Sunken in grief, oppressed with birth and age.

Arise, thou hero! Conqueror in the battle!
Thou leader of the caravan, without a debt!
Walk in the world. Let the Blessed One Teach dhamma; they who learn will grow.'

And then I, Prince, having understood Brahmā's entreaty,
out of compassion
surveyed the world with the eye of an Awakened One.

As I, Prince, was surveying the world with the eye of an Awakened One, I saw beings with little dust in their eyes,
with much dust in their eyes,
with acute faculties
with dull faculties,
of good dispositions,
of bad dispositions,
docile,
indocile,
few seeing from fear
sins and the world beyond.

Even as in a pond of blue lotuses or in a pond of red lotuses or in a pond of white lotuses, a few red lotuses,
a few blue lotuses,
a few white lotuses
are born in the water,
grow in the water,
do not rise above the water but thrive while altogether immersed;
a few blue lotuses,

a few red lotuses,
a few white lotuses
are born in the water,
grow in the water
and reach the surface of the water
a few blue lotuses,
a few red lotuses,
a few white lotuses
are born in the water,
grow in the water
and stand rising out of the water, undefiled by the water;
even so did I, Prince, surveying the world with the eye of an Awakened One, see beings with little dust in their eyes,
with much dust in their eyes,
with acute faculties,
with dull faculties,
of good dispositions,
of bad dispositions,
docile,
indocile,
few seeing from fear
sins and the world beyond.

Then I, Prince, addressed Brahmā Sahampati in verses:

Opened for those who hear are the doors of the Deathless, Brahmā, Let them give forth their faith;
Thinking of useless fatigue, Brahmā, I have not preached dhamma Sublime and excellent for men.

Then, Prince, Brahmā Sahampati, thinking:

'The opportunity was made by me for the Lord to teach dhamma.'

having greeted me,
keeping his right side towards me,
vanished then and there.

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'Now, to whom should I first teach this dhamma?

Who will understand this dhamma quickly?'

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'Indeed this Āḷāra the Kālāma is learned,
experienced,
wise,
and for a long time has had little dust in his eyes.

Suppose that I were to teach dhamma first to Āḷāra the Kālāma he will understand this dhamma quickly.

Then devatās having approached me,
spoke thus:

Lord, Āḷāra the Kālāma passed away seven days ago.'

So knowledge and vision arose in me that Āḷāra the Kālāma had passed away seven days ago.

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'Āḷāra the Kālāma has suffered a great loss.

For if he had heard this dhamma,
he would have understood it quickly.'

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'Now, to whom could I first teach this dhamma?'

Who will understand this dhamma quickly?

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'This Uddaka, Rāma's son, is learned,
experienced,
wise,
and for a long time has had little dust in his eyes.

Suppose that I were to teach dhamma first to Uddaka, Rāma's son?

He will understand this dhamma quickly.'

Then, Prince, devatās, having approached me,
spoke thus:

'Lord, Uddaka, Rāma's son, passed away last night.'

So knowledge and vision arose in me that Uddaka, Rāma's son, had passed away last night.

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'Uddaka, Rāma's son, has suffered a great loss.

For if he had heard this dhamma,
he would have understood it quickly.

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'Now to whom could I first teach this dhamma?

Who will understand this dhamma quickly?

Then it occurred to me, Prince:

'This group of five monks who waited on me when I was self-resolute in striving, were very helpful.

Suppose that I were to teach dhamma first to this group of five monks?

Then it occurred to me, monks:

'But where is the group of five monks staying at present?

Then, monks I saw with deva-vision, purified
and surpassing that of men, the group of five monks staying near Benares at Isipatana
in the deer-park.

Then I, monks, having stayed at Uruvelā for as long as I found suiting, set out on tour for Benares.

Then, monks, Upaka,
the Naked Ascetic, saw me as I was going along the high road between Gayā and the (Tree of) Awakening;
having seen me,
he spoke thus:

'Your reverence,
your faculties are quite pure, your complexion is very bright,
very clear.

On account of whom have you, your reverence, gone forth, or who is your teacher, or whose dhamma do you profess?'

When this had been said,
I, monks, addressed Upaka, the Naked Ascetic, in verses:

'Victorious over all, omniscient am I,
Among all things undefiled,
Leaving all, through death of craving freed, By knowing for myself, whom should I point to?

For me there is no teacher,
One like me does not exist,
In the world with its devas
No one equals me.

For I am perfected in the world,
A teacher supreme am I,
I alone am all-awakened, Become cool am I, Nibbāna-attained.

To turn the dhamma-wheel
I go to Kasi's city,
Beating the drum of deathlessness
In a world that's blind become.'

'According to what you claim, your reverence, you ought to be victor of the unending.'

'Like me, they are victors indeed
Who have won destruction of the cankers;
Vanquished by me are evil things, Therefore am I, Upaka, a victor.'

When this had been said, Prince,
Upaka the Naked Ascetic, having said:

'May it be (so), your reverence" having shaken his head, went off having taken a different road.

Then I, Prince, walking on tour, in due course arrived at Benares, Isipatana,
the deer-park
and the group of five monks.

Prince, the group of five monks saw me coming in the distance, and seeing me
they agreed among themselves, saying:

'Your reverences, this recluse Gotama is coming,
he lives in abundance,
he is wavering in his striving,
he has reverted to a life of abundance.

He should be neither greeted,
nor stood up for,
nor should his bowl and robe be received;
all the same
a seat may be put out, he can sit down if he wants to.'

But as I, Prince, gradually approached this group of five monks, so this group of five monks were not able to adhere to their own agreement;
having approached me
some received my bowl and robe, some made a seat ready,
some brought water for washing the feet, and they addressed me by my name and with the epithet 'your reverence.'

When this had been said,
I, Prince, spoke thus to the group of five monks:

'Do not, monks, address a Tathāgata by his name or by the epithet 'your reverence.'

Monks, the Tathāgata is one perfected, a fully Self-awakened One.

Give ear, monks, the deathless is found,
I instruct, I teach dhamma.

Going along in accordance with what is enjoined,
having soon realised here and now
by your own super-knowledge that supreme goal of the Brahmā-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home
into homelessness,
you will abide in it.'

When this had been said, Prince,
the group of five monks addressed me thus:

'But you, reverend Gotama,
did not come to a state of further-men,
to knowledge and vision befitting the Ariyans
by this conduct,
by this course,
by this practice of austerities.

So how can you now
come to a state of further-men,
to knowledge and vision befitting the Ariyans
when you live in abundance and, wavering in your striving,
revert to a life of abundance?'

When this had been said, Prince, I spoke to the group of five monks thus:

'A Tathāgata, monks,
does not live in abundance
nor, wavering in striving,
does he revert to a life of abundance.

The Tathāgata, monks,
is one perfected,
a fully Self-awakened One.

Give ear, monks,
the deathless is found,
I instruct,
I teach dhamma.

Going along in accordance with what is enjoined,
having soon realised here and now
by your own super-knowledge
that supreme goal of the Brahmā-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home
into homelessness,
you will abide in it.'

And a second time, Prince, the group of five monks spoke to me thus:

'But you, reverend Gotama,
did not come to a state of further-men,
to knowledge and vision befitting the Ariyans
by this conduct,
by this course,
by this practice of austerities.

So how can you now
come to a state of further-men,
to knowledge and vision befitting the Ariyans

when you live in abundance
and, wavering in your striving,
revert to a life of abundance?'

When this had been said, Prince, I spoke to the group of five monks thus:

'A Tathāgata, monks,
does not live in abundance
nor, wavering in striving,
does he revert to a life of abundance.

The Tathāgata, monks,
is one perfected,
a fully Self-awakened One.

Give ear, monks,
the deathless is found,
I instruct,
I teach dhamma.

Going along in accordance with what is enjoined,
having soon realised here and now
by your own super-knowledge
that supreme goal of the Brahmā-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home
into homelessness,
you will abide in it.'

And a third time, monks, the group of five monks spoke to me thus:

'But you, reverend Gotama,
did not come to a state of further-men,
to knowledge and vision befitting the Ariyans
by this conduct,
by this course,
by this practice of austerities.

So how can you now
come to a state of further-men,
to knowledge and vision befitting the Ariyans
when you live in abundance
and, wavering in your striving,
revert to a life of abundance?'

When this had been said,
I, Prince, spoke thus to the group of five monks:

'Do you allow, monks,
that I have ever spoken to you like this before?'

'You have not, Lord.'

The Tathāgata, monks,
is one perfected,
a fully Self-awakened One.

Give ear, monks,
the deathless is found,
I instruct,
I teach dhamma.

Going along in accordance with what is enjoined,
having soon realised here and now
by your own super-knowledge
that supreme goal of the Brahmā-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home
into homelessness,
you will abide in it.'

And I, Prince, was able to convince the group of five monks.

Prince, I now exhorted two monks;
three monks walked for almsfood.

Whatever the three monks who had walked for alms- food brought back, that the group of six lived on.

And then, Prince, I exhorted three monks;
two monks walked for almsfood.

Whatever the two monks who had walked for almsfood brought back,
that the group of six lived on.

Then, Prince, the group of five monks, being thus exhorted,
thus instructed by me,
soon realising here and now by their own super-knowledge
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness, entering on it abided in it."

When this had been said,
Prince Bodhi spoke thus to the Lord:

"After how long, revered sir, does a monk
taking the Tathāgata as a leader, and having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness, entering on it, abide in it?"

"Well then, Prince,
I will ask you a question about this in return.

As it may please you,
so should you answer it.

What do you think about this, Prince?

Are you skilled in elephant-riding, in the art of handling a goad?"

"Yes, I, revered sir, am skilled in elephant-riding, in the art of handling a goad."

"What do you think about this, Prince?

A man might come along here, and think:

'Prince Bodhi knows how to ride elephants and the art of handling the goad.

I will train myself in elephant-riding and the art of handling the goad under him.'

But had he no faith
he could not attain whatever is to be won by faith;
and had he [282] poor health
he could not attain whatever is to be won by good health;
and if he were fraudulent and deceitful
he could not attain whatever is to be won by honesty
and the absence of deceit;
and if he were lazy
he could not attain whatever is to be won by the output of energy; and if he were poor in wisdom
he could not attain whatever is to be won by one of wisdom.

What do you think about this, Prince?

Could that man train himself in elephant-riding and the art of handling the goad under you?"

"Assuredly, revered sir,
if that man were possessed of (such) qualities, he could not train himself in elephant-riding and the art of handling the goad under me.

But who speaks of five qualities?"

"What do you think about this, Prince?"

A man might come along here, and think:

'Prince Bodhi knows how to ride elephants
and the art of handling the goad.

I will train myself in elephant-riding
and the art of handling the goad under him.'

And if he had faith
he could attain whatever is to be won by faith;
and if he had good health
he could attain
whatever is to be won by good health;
and if he were not fraudulent or deceitful
he could attain whatever is to be won by honesty
and the absence of deceit;
and if he had an output of energy
he could attain whatever is to be won by output of energy; and if he were one of wisdom
he could attain
whatever is to be won by one of wisdom.

What do you think about this, Prince?

Could that man train himself in elephant-riding and in the art of handling the goad under you?"

"Assuredly, revered sir,
if that man were possessed of (such) qualities, he could train himself in elephant-riding
and the art of handling the goad under me.

But who speaks of five qualities?"

"Even so, Prince,
are these five qualities for striving.<sup>6</sup>

What five?

As to this, Prince,
a monk has faith;
he has faith in the awakening of the Tathāgata, and thinks:

'Indeed this is the Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
endowed with knowledge and (right) conduct,
Well-farer,
knower of the worlds,
incomparable charioteer of men to be tamed,
teacher of devas and men,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.'

He is well,
in good health,
endowed with a good digestion,
not over-cool,
not over-hot,

but of a middle kind
suitable for striving.

He is not fraudulent,
not deceitful,
but shows himself as he really is to the Teacher
or the learned
among his fellow Brahma-farers.

He dwells with energy stirred up<sup>7</sup> for getting rid of unskilled states, for arousing skilled states,
steadfast,
firm in advance,
persevering amid skilled states.

He is one of wisdom
endowed with wisdom<sup>7</sup> leading to (the cutting off of) rise and fall, with ariyan<sup>8</sup> [283] discrimination leading to the complete destruction of anguish.

These, Prince, are the five qualities for striving.

If, Prince, a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it within seven years.

Let be the seven years, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in six years.

Let be the six years, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in five years.

Let be the five years, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in four years.

Let be the four years, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in three years.

Let be the three years, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in two years.

Let be the two years, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in one year.

Let be one year, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in seven months.

Let be seven months, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in six months.

Let be six months, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in five months.

Let be five months, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in four months.

Let be four months, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in three months.

Let be three months, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in two months.

Let be two months, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in one month.

Let be one month, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in half a month.

Let be half a month, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in seven days and nights.

Let be seven days and nights, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in six days and nights.

Let be six days and nights, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in five days and nights.

Let be five days and nights, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in four days and nights.

Let be four days and nights, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in three days and nights.

Let be three days and nights, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in two days days and nights.

Let be two days and nights, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata for leader,
having by his own super-knowledge
realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it he may abide in it in it in one day and night.

Let be the one day and night, Prince.

If a monk is possessed of these five qualities for striving,
taking the Tathāgata as leader, if he is instructed in the evening he will attain eminence in the morning;
if he is instructed in the morning he will attain eminence in the evening."

When this had been said, Prince Bodhi spoke thus to the Lord:

"O what an Awakened One,<sup>9</sup>
O what a dhamma,
O what a good teaching of dhamma in that if one is instructed in the evening he will attain eminence in the morning, if instructed in the morning
he will attain eminence in the evening."

When this had been said,
the brahman youth Sañjikā's son,
spoke thus to Prince Bodhi:

"So this revered Bodhi speaks thus:

'O what an Awakened One,
O what a dhamma,
O what a good teaching of dhamma,'

but then he does not say:

'I am going to that revered Gotama for refuge
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.'"

"Do not, good Sañjikā's son, speak thus;
do not, good Sañjikā's son, speak thus.

Face to face with my mother,
good Sañjikā's son,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt it.

There was a time, good Sañjikā's son, when this Lord was staying at Kosambī in Ghosita's monastery.

Then my mother, who was with child, [284] approached the Lord;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
she sat down at a respectful distance.

As she was sitting down at a respectful distance my mother spoke thus to the Lord:

'Revered sir, my unborn child, whether a boy or a girl, is going to the Lord for refuge
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the Lord accept this layfollower
who is going for refuge
from this day forth
for as long as life lasts.'

There was the time,
good Sañjikā's son,
when the Lord was staying here itself among the Bhaggas in Sumsumāragira in Bhesakaḷā Grove
in the deer-park.

Then my nurse,
carrying me on her hip,
approached the Lord;
having approached
and having greeted the Lord,
she stood at a respectful distance.

As she was standing at a respectful distance, my nurse spoke thus to the Lord:

'This, revered sir,
is Prince Bodhi
who is going for refuge to the Lord
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the Lord accept this layfollower
who is going for refuge
from this day forth
for as long as life lasts.'

Now I, good Sañjikā's son, am going for the third time to the Lord for refuge
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks,
thinking:

'May the Lord accept me
as a layfollower
going for refuge from this day forth
for as long as life lasts.'

Discourse to Prince Bodhi:
The Fifth

---

<sup>1</sup> As far as p. 280 below; "Prince Bodhi ... sat down at a respectful distance," occurs also at Vin. ii. 127 f. For notes see B.D. v. 176 ff. See also opening of M. Sta. No. 53.

<sup>2</sup> Or, western.

<sup>3</sup> apaloketi, but Vin. ii. 128 reads anukampati.

<sup>4</sup> As at M. i. 93 (M.L.S. I 123).

<sup>5</sup> I.e. read as far as the second occurrence of this phrase on p. 303 of vol. i. The sentence, "the pleasurable feeling, arising in me, persisted without impinging on my mind," found in vol. i, does not occur in Discourse No. 85.

<sup>6</sup> As at M. ii. 128; A. iii. 65; D. iii. 237.

<sup>7</sup> As at M. i. 356.

<sup>8</sup> MA. iii. 326 explains as "pure," suddha.

<sup>9</sup> aho buddho, etc.; cf. Thag. 201, where aho is translated as "All hail."

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
4. Rāja Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
4. The Royal Division

86. Discourse with Aṅgulimāla

Aṅgulimāla Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

Sāvattḥī, at Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Now at that time, in the realm of King Pasenadi of Kosaia<sup>1</sup> there was a robber named Aṅgulimāla,<sup>2</sup>
a hunter,
bloody-handed,
bent on death and destruction,
merciless to living creatures.

Through him villages were depopulated<sup>3</sup> and market towns were depopulated and country [285] districts were depopulated.

From his constant killing of people he wore a garland of fingers.

Then the Lord, having dressed in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe,
entered Sāvattthī for almsfood;
having walked for alms in Sāvattthī, returning from the almsgathering after the meal,
having packed away his lodging,
taking his bowl and robe,
he set out along a highway towards the robber Aṅgulimāla.

Cowherds,
goatherds,
yeomen farmers
and travellers
saw the Lord as he was setting out along the highway towards the robber Aṅgulimāla.

Having seen the Lord,
they spoke thus to him:

"Do not, recluse,
set out along this road.

There is a robber on this road
called Aṅgulimāla,
a hunter,
bloody-handed,
bent on death and destruction,
merciless to living creatures.

Through him villages are depopulated
and market towns are depopulated
and country districts are depopulated.

From his constant killing of people
he wares a garland of fingers.

This is a road, recluse, along which ten or twenty or thirty
or forty men
set out only after they have collected together,
and even they are at the mercy
of the robber Aṅgulimāla."

When this had been said, the Lord, having become silent,
went on.

And a second time,
the cowherds,
goatherds,
yeomen farmers
and travellers
spoke thus to the Lord:

"Do not, recluse,
set out along this road.

There is a robber on this road
called Aṅgulimāla,
a hunter,
bloody-handed,
bent on death and destruction,
merciless to living creatures.

Through him villages are depopulated
and market towns are depopulated
and country districts are depopulated.

From his constant killing of people
he wares a garland of fingers.

This is a road, recluse,
along which ten
or twenty
or thirty
or forty men
set out only after they have collected together,
and even they are at the mercy
of the robber Aṅgulimāla."

And a second time,
when this had been said, the Lord,
having become silent,
went on.

And a third time,
the cowherds,
goatherds,
yeomen farmers
and travellers
spoke thus to the Lord:

"Do not, recluse,
set out along this road.

There is a robber on this road
called Aṅgulimāla,
a hunter,
bloody-handed,
bent on death and destruction,
merciless to living creatures.

Through him villages are depopulated
and market towns are depopulated
and country districts are depopulated.

From his constant killing of people
he wares a garland of fingers.

This is a road, recluse,
along which ten
or twenty
or thirty
or forty men
set out only after they have collected together,
and even they are at the mercy
of the robber Aṅgulimāla."

And a third time,
when this had been said, the Lord,
having become silent,
went on.

The robber Aṅgulimāla saw the Lord coming in the distance;
on seeing him,
it occurred to him:

"Indeed it is wonderful,
indeed it is marvellous.

This is a road,
along which ten
or twenty
or thirty
or forty men
set out only after they have collected together, and even they are at my mercy.

And now this recluse is coming along alone, without a companion,
it seems from choice.<sup>4</sup>

Suppose I were to deprive this recluse of life?"

Then the robber Aṅgulimāla, having grasped his sword and shield, having armed himself with bow and quiver, followed close after the Lord.

Then the Lord performed such a wonder of psychic power that the robber Aṅgulimāla, although walking with all his strength, was not able to catch up with the Lord who was walking at an ordinary pace.

Then it occurred to the robber Aṅgulimāla:

'Indeed [286] it is wonderful,
indeed it is marvellous.

Although formerly I could attack and seize a running elephant,
I could attack and seize a running horse,
I could attack and seize a running chariot,
I could attack and seize a running deer, now I,
although walking with all my strength, am not able to catch up with this recluse who is walking at an ordinary pace.

Standing still,
he said to the Lord:

"Stand still, recluse,
stand still, recluse."

"I am standing still, Aṅgulimāla, you too stand still."

Then it occurred to the robber Aṅgulimāla:

"These recluses,
sons of the Sakyans,
are truth-speakers,
approving of truth.

But yet this recluse,
while he is walking,
says:

'I am standing still, Aṅgulimāla,
you too stand still.'

Suppose I were to question this recluse?"

Then the robber Aṅgulimāla spoke out to the Lord in verses:<sup>5</sup>

"While you are walking, recluse, you say:
'I am standing still,'
and you tell me, who am standing still,
that I am not standing still.

I ask you, recluse, about this matter:
How is it that you are standing still,
yet I am not standing still?"

"I, Aṅgulimāla, am standing still, having for all beings everywhere laid aside the stick,
But you are unrestrained regarding creatures;
therefore I am standing still,
you are not standing still."

"Long it is since a great sage was honoured by me, yet this recluse is penetrating the Great Grove.
I will soon get rid of evil, hearing dhamma in a verse of yours."

When the robber had spoken thus,
he hurled his sword and weapons down a cliff, into a pit, a chasm.

The robber honoured the Well-farer's feet;
there he asked for the going forth.

The Awakened One and compassionate great sage who is the Teacher of the world with its devas, Thereupon said to him:
"Come, monk." This itself was monk's status for him.

Then the Lord set out on tour for Sāvattthī with the venerable Āṅgulimāla as his attendant.

In due course,
walking on tour,
he [287] arrived at Sāvattthī.

While he was there
the Lord stayed near Sāvattthī,
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Now at that time, a great concourse of people, having gathered together at the gate of King Pasenadi's palace, were making a loud noise,
a great noise,
saying:

"There is a robber in your realm, sire, called Āṅgulimāla,
a hunter,
bloody-handed,
bent on death and destruction,
merciless to living creatures.

Through him villages are depopulated
and market towns are depopulated

and country districts are depopulated.

From his constant killing of people he wears a garland of fingers.

Let the king drive him out."

Then King Pasenadi,
with as many as five hundred horses, left Sāvattthī early in the morning and started for the monastery.

Having gone by vehicle as far as the ground permitted, he dismounted from his vehicle and approached the Lord on foot;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

The Lord spoke thus to King Pasenadi
as he was sitting down at a respectful distance:

"What is it, sire?

Is King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha angry with you,
or the Lichavis of Vesālī, or some hostile king?"

"Revered sir,
it is not that King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha is angry with me,
or the Lichavis of Vesālī,
or any hostile king.

There is a robber in my realm, revered sir, named Aṅgulimāla,
a hunter,
bloody-handed,

bent on death and destruction,
merciless to living creatures.

Through him villages are depopulated
and market towns are depopulated
and country districts are depopulated.

From his constant killing of people
he wares a garland of fingers.

I, revered sir,
shall never drive him out."

"But<sup>6</sup> if you, sire, were to see the robber Aṅgulimāla, having had his hair and beard cut off,
having donned saffron robes,
having gone forth from home into homelessness, refraining from onslaught on creatures,
refraining from taking what has not been given,
refraining from lying speech,
a one-meal-man,
a Brahma-farer,
virtuous,
of lovely character -
what would you do to him?"

"Revered sir,
we would salute him
or rise up before him
or offer him a seat
or invite him to the requisites of robe-material,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick, or we would have a proper watch and ward and guard provided for him.

But whence could there be, revered sir, such control in moral habit for one of bad morality, of evil character?"

Now at that time
the venerable Āṅgulimāla was sitting near the Lord.

Then the Lord,
stretching out his right arm,
spoke thus to King Pasenadi:

"This, sire,
is Āṅgulimāla."

Then King Pasenadi was afraid, alarmed
and his hair stood on end.

[288] Then the Lord,
knowing King Pasenadi's terror and agitation and that his hair was standing on end, spoke thus to King Pasenadi:

"Do not be afraid, sire,
do not be afraid, sire;
you have no cause for fear here."

Then King Pasenadi's fear and alarm and the standing of his hair on end all abated.

Then King Pasenadi approached the venerable Āṅgulimāla;
having approached,

he spoke thus to the venerable Aṅgulimāla:

"Revered sir,
is the master really Aṅgulimāla?"

"Yes, sire."

"Of what clan was the master's father?"

Of what clan his mother?"

"Gagga was my father, sire, Mantāni my mother."

"Revered sir, let the master, the son of Gagga and Mantāni, be of good cheer.

I will make an effort in the matter of the requisites of robe-material,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick, or we would have a proper watch and ward and guard provided for the master, the son of Gagga and Mantāni."

Now at that time the venerable Aṅgulimāla was a forest-dweller, an almsman,
a rag-robe wearer,
one who wore the three robes.

So the venerable Aṅgulimāla spoke thus to King Pasenadi:

"No, sire,
I am complete as to the three robes."

Then King Pasenadi approached the Lord;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance,
King Pasenadi spoke thus to the Lord:

"It is wonderful, revered sir,
it is marvellous, revered sir, how this Lord, revered sir, tames the untamed,
calms the uncalmed,
helps to quell completely those that are not completely quelled.<sup>7</sup>

Him, revered sir, that I was unable to tame with stick and sword, the Lord has tamed
without stick or sword.

Well, I am going now, revered sir,
I am very busy,
there is much to be done."

"You do now, sire,
that for which you deem it the right time."

Then King Pasenadi,
rising from his seat,
having greeted the Lord,
departed keeping his right side towards him.

Then the venerable Aṅgulimāla,
having dressed in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe,
entered Sāvattḥī for almsfood.

And as the venerable Aṅgulimāla was walking in Sāvattḥī on an uninterrupted round for almsfood, he saw a woman in difficult and dangerous labour.

On seeing her, it occurred to him:

"Beings are indeed impure,
beings are indeed impure."

Then the venerable Aṅgulimāla, having walked in Sāvattḥī for [289] almsfood, on returning from the almsgathering after the meal,
approached the Lord;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the venerable Aṅgulimāla spoke thus to the Lord:

"Now, I, revered sir,
having dressed in the morning was walking in Sāvattḥī
on an uninterrupted round for almsfood, and saw a woman in difficult and dangerous labour.

On seeing her, it occurred to me:

"Beings are indeed impure,
beings are indeed impure."

"Well then, do you, Aṅgulimāla, approach Sāvattḥī;
having approached,
speak thus to that woman:

'I, sister,
am not aware of having intentionally deprived any living thing of life since I was born.

By this truth
may there be well-being for you,
well-being for the unborn child."

"But would not this be deliberate lying on my part, revered sir?

For, revered sir, many living things have been intentionally deprived of life by me."

"Well then,
do you, Aṅgulimāla,
approach Sāvattḥī;
having approached,
speak thus to that woman:

'I, sister,
am not aware of having intentionally deprived any living thing of life since I was born of the ariyan birth.

By this truth
may there be well-being for you,
well-being for the unborn child."

"Yes, revered sir,"
and the venerable Aṅgulimāla, having answered the Lord in assent, approached Sāvattḥī;

having approached,
he spoke thus to that woman:

"I, sister,
am not aware of having intentionally deprived any living thing of life since I was born of the ariyan birth.

By this truth
may there be well-being for you,
well-being for the unborn child."

Then the venerable Aṅgulimāla,
living alone,
aloof,
diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
having soon realised here and now
by his own super-knowledge
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which
young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it,
abided in it.

And he knew:

Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.

And so the venerable Angulimāla
was one of the perfected ones.

Then the venerable Aṅgulimāla,
having dressed in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe,
entered Sāvattḥī for almsfood.

Now at that time
a clod of earth thrown by one man fell on the venerable Aṅgulimāla, also a stick thrown by another and gravel thrown by a third.<sup>8</sup>

Then the venerable Aṅgulimāla, with a broken head [290] streaming with blood, his bowl smashed,
and his outer cloak in tatters,
approached the Lord.

The Lord saw the venerable Aṅgulimāla coming in the distance;
seeing him,
he spoke thus to the venerable Aṅgulimāla:

"Do you endure it, brahman<sup>9</sup> do you endure it, brahman.

You are experiencing here and now the ripening of that kamma through the ripening of which you would (otherwise) boil in Niraya Hell for many years,
many hundreds of years,
many thousands of years."

Then the venerable Aṅgulimāla, as he was meditating in private, experienced the bliss of freedom,<sup>10</sup>

and at that time
uttered this solemn utterance:

"He<sup>11</sup> who formerly was slothful but afterwards is diligent Illumes this world like the moon when freed from a cloud.

He whose evilly done kamma is closed by what is skilled Illumes this world like the moon when freed from a cloud.

Indeed, he who, a young monk, cleaves to the Awakened One's Dispensation
Illumines this world like the moon when freed from a cloud.

Let my foes but hear talk on dhamma, let my foes but cleave to the Awakened One's Dispensation,

Let those men, my foes, but follow dhamma - and, calmed, only it will they accept.

Let my foes, from speakers on forbearance and commenders of gentleness Hear dhamma from time to time and act in conformity with it.

Such a one would not harm me nor yet any other at all - He would attain the uttermost peace and guard those who have craving and those who have none.<sup>12</sup>

As<sup>13</sup> ditchers lead the water, as fletchers shape the shaft,
As joiners shape the timber, so do the wise tame themselves.

Some<sup>14</sup> are tamed by the stick, goads or whips;
I, without stick, without weapon, was tamed by Him who is 'Such.'

[291] My name is 'Harmless,'<sup>15</sup> though once I harmful was.
Today I am truly named,<sup>16</sup> for I harm no thing at all.

Once I was the notorious robber Aṅgulimāla; Being swept away by the great flood, I came to the Awakened One for refuge.

Once I was the notorious bloody-handed Aṅgulimāla - O see my going for refuge, becoming's cord<sup>17</sup> removed!

Me who had wrought such kamma as leads to many a woeful bourn, When touched by the ripening of kamma,<sup>18</sup> debtless I enjoy an owner's state.<sup>19</sup>

Fools,<sup>20</sup> folk poor in wisdom, pursue slothfulness;
A wise man guards diligence as wealth supreme.

Pursue<sup>21</sup> not slothfulness, be not acquainted with sensual delights - Meditating with diligence one attains abundant joy.

Well<sup>22</sup> was (my) coming,<sup>23</sup> there is no departing, nor was I ill-advised -

Among various truths<sup>24</sup> that which I follow is supreme.

[292] Well was (my) coming, there is no departing, nor was I ill-advised - Won is the threefold knowledge, done is the teaching of the Awakened
One."

Discourse with Aṅgulimāla:
The Sixth

---

<sup>1</sup> As this king is frequently mentioned in Suttas 86-90, I have almost always abbreviated his designation to; King Pasendi.

<sup>2</sup> Meaning "Garland of Fingers." The Sutasoma-Jātaka (No. 537) was preached concerning him.

<sup>3</sup> gāmā pi agāmā, katā, villages were rendered not-villages.

<sup>4</sup> pamyha. As this usually means "by force, forcibly," there may be in the word some allusion here to the Teacher's refusal to listen to all the pleadings and warnings which he encountered. The meaning here may however be that Angulimala thinks: it seems that by using force (pamyha maḥine) suppose I were to deprive him of life. But the syntax is against this. CPI. s.v. appawyha gives "irresistible," cf. Monier-Williams, who for praḍahya gives 1. to be resisted, conquered or defeated; 2. having withstood, overpowered or conquered; forcibly, violently, by force.

<sup>5</sup> The verses ascribed to Aṅgulimāla are at Thag. 806 ff.

<sup>6</sup> For this paragraph and the next, see also M. ii. 89.

<sup>7</sup> Or, "is a helper to final nibbāna (parinibbāpetā) of those who have not reached final nibbāna." Cf. M. i. 235; D. iii. 54.

<sup>8</sup> MA. iii. 338 explains that these were thrown at marauding crows, dogs and pigs, but fell on the Elder.

<sup>9</sup> MA. iii. 339 says he was so called because his āsavas were destroyed.

<sup>10</sup> As Gotama is recorded to have done at Vin. i. 1, etc.

<sup>11</sup> The verses ascribed to Aṅgulimāla continue at Thag. 871 ff. The first two are also found at Dhp. 172, 173.

<sup>12</sup> tasathāvara. MA. iii. 341 and ThagA. say that tasā means those with craving (sataṅhā) while thāvarā means those without (nittaṅhā). The word also occurs at Khp. IX. 4 (KhpA. 245 giving a slightly fuller explanation than MA. or ThagA.) and at Sn. 146.

<sup>13</sup> This verse also at Dhp. 80, 145.

<sup>14</sup> With this verse cf. Vin. ii. 196.

<sup>15</sup> According to MA, iii. 329 Ahimsaka was his name while he was a student. ThagA. on the other hand says that Himsaka was his original name. See Pss. Breath., p. 323, n. 3.

<sup>16</sup> saccanāmo'mhi, Although Saccanāma, as "He whose name is Truth," is among the epithets of the Buddha, it is not being used as an epithet here as is clear from the context.

<sup>17</sup> bhavanetti, explained at MA. iii. 342 as bhavarajju, the cord, called tanhā (craving): "Creatures are bound in their hearts like cattle with a cord tied to their necks, and are led on (nīyanti) to this or that becoming." Bhavanetti is therefore the cord, lead or conduit tying to or leading to "becoming."

<sup>18</sup> kammavipāka is called maggacetanā, determination in or will for the Way. Inasmuch as kamma is boiled and destroyed by this means, this means is therefore called kammavipāka.

<sup>19</sup> bhuñjāmi bhojanam. Also at Thag. 789. MA. iii. 343, Vism. 43, Jā. v. 253 distinguish four kinds of paribhoga, enjoyment, use. Here sāmparibhoga is meant: that of a master or owner, one whose āsavas are destroyed. Bhojana might therefore be translated here as "usage," "status" or even "privilege," "right."

<sup>20</sup> Verse also at Dhp. 26, S. i. 26.

<sup>21</sup> Verse also at Dhp. 27 (reading vipulam sukham, "abundant joy," as M. above), and Thag. 884 and S. i. 25 (both reading paramam sukham).

<sup>22</sup> This verse also at Thag. 9.

<sup>23</sup> ThagA. i. 66 says svāgatam means either: this coming of mine was beautiful; or, well was the coming on my part, i.e. to the Buddha's presence.

<sup>24</sup> dhamma could mean either "truths, teachings," as it appears to do at ThagA. i. 55; or "states of mind" which, as nibbāna, it appears to mean at

MA. iii. 343. There are a number of variant readings for the preceding and qualifying word; in the M. text it is paṭibhattesu.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
4. Rāja Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
4. The Royal Division

87. Discourse on "Born of Affection"

Piya-Jātika Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattthī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Now at that time
the dear and beloved little only son of a certain householder had passed away.

After he had passed away he (the father) had no inclination for work or for food.

Going constantly to the cemetery,
he wailed:

"Where are you, little only son?"

Where are you, little only son?"

Then that householder approached the Lord;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

The Lord spoke thus to that householder
as he was sitting down at a respectful distance:

"Have not you, householder, controlling faculties for stilling your own mind?

There is a change in your faculties."

"But how could there be no change in my faculties, Lord?

For, Lord, my dear and beloved little only son has passed away.

Since he passed away
I have no inclination for work or food.

Going constantly to the cemetery,
I wail:
'Where are you, little only son?
Where are you, little only son?'"

"That is just it, householder.

For, householder, grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair

are born of affection,
originate in affection."

"But for whom, Lord,
could this hold good in this way:

'Grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection?'

For, Lord, bliss and happiness
are born of affection,
originate in affection."

[293] Then the householder, not rejoicing in what the Lord had said, repudiating it,
rising from his seat,
departed.

Now at that time
a number of gamblers were playing dice not far from the Lord.

Then that householder approached these gamblers;
having approached,
he spoke thus to these gamblers:

"Now, I, sirs, approached the recluse Gotama;
having approached,
having greeted the recluse Gotama,
I sat down at a respectful distance.

Then, sirs, the recluse Gotama spoke thus to me as I was sitting down at a respectful distance:

'Have not you, householder, controlling faculties
for stilling your own mind?

There is a change in your faculties.'

'But how could there be no change in my faculties, Lord?

For, Lord, my dear and beloved little only son
has passed away.

Since he passed away
I have no inclination for work
or food.

Going constantly to the cemetery,
I wail:

"Where are you, little only son?
Where are you, little only son?"

'That is just it, householder.

For, householder, grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection.'

'But for whom, Lord,
could this hold good in this way:

"Grief,
sorrow,

suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection?"

For, Lord, bliss and happiness
are born of affection,
originate in affection.'

Then I, sirs, not rejoicing in what the Lord had said, repudiating it,
rising from my seat,
departed."

"That is just it, householder,
that is just it, householder;
for, householder,
bliss and happiness are born of affection,
originate in affection."

Then the householder, thinking:

"There is agreement between me and the gamblers,"
departed.

Then this subject of conversation<sup>1</sup> gradually penetrated the royal palace.

And King Pasenadi of Kosala spoke thus to Queen Mallikā:

"This was said to these, Mallikā, by the recluse Gotama:

'Grief,
sorrow,

suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection."

"If this, sire, was said by the Lord, it is so."

"As the recluse Gotama speaks so does Mallikā
because she is much delighted with him:

'If this, sire, was said by the Lord,
it is so.'

It is just as when a teacher speaks to his pupil and the pupil is so much delighted with him that he says
'It is just so, teacher,
it is just so, teacher.'

Even so do you, Mallikā, because you are so much delighted with what the recluse Gotama says, say:
'If this, sire, was said by the Lord,
it is so.'

Be off, Mallikā, go away."

Then Queen Mallikā summoned the brahman Nālijaṅgha,
and said:

"Come you, brahman,
approach the Lord;

having approached,
in my name salute the Lord's feet with your head
and ask whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort;
and say:

'Lord, Queen Mallika salutes the Lord's feet with her head,
and asks whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort.'

and then say:

'Revered sir,
were these words spoken by the Lord:

Grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection?'

And when you have mastered well what the Lord [294] explains to you, you must tell me.

For Tathāgatas do not speak against the truth."<sup>2</sup>

"Yes, madam,"
and the brahman Nālijaṅgha, having answered Queen Mallikā in assent,

approached the Lord;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the Lord;
having conversed in a courteous and friendly way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the brahman Nālijaṅgha, spoke thus to the Lord;

"Good Gotama, Queen Mallikā with her head salutes the good Gotama's feet
and asks whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort.

And she speaks thus:

'Revered sir, were these words spoken by the Lord:

Grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection?'

"It is just so, brahman,
it is just so, brahman.

For, brahman, grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation

and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection.

And this is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattḥī
a certain woman's mother had passed away.

Since her passing away,
she (the daughter), unbalanced and unhinged,
went from street to street,
from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my mother?

Have you not seen my mother?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattḥī
a certain woman's father had passed away.

Since his passing away,
she, unbalanced and unhinged,
went from street to street,
from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my father?

Have you not seen my father?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattḥī
a certain woman's brother had passed away.

Since his passing away,
she, unbalanced and unhinged,
went from street to street,
from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my brother?

Have you not seen my brother?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattḥī
a certain woman's sister had passed away.

Since her passing away,
she, unbalanced and unhinged,
went from street to street,
from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my sister?

Have you not seen my sister?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattḥī
a certain woman's son had passed away.

Since his passing away,
she, unbalanced and unhinged,
went from street to street,
from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my son?

Have you not seen my son?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattḥī
a certain woman's daughter had passed away.

Since her passing away,
she, unbalanced and unhinged,
went from street to street,
from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my daughter?

Have you not seen my daughter?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,

sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattthī
a certain woman's husband had passed away.

Since his passing away,
she, unbalanced and unhinged,
went from street to street,
from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my husband?

Have you not seen my husband?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

■

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattthī
a certain man's mother had passed away.

Since her passing away,
he, unbalanced and unhinged,
went from street to street,
from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my mother?

Have you not seen my mother?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattḥī
a certain man's father had passed away.

Since his passing away,
he, unbalanced and unhinged,
went from street to street,
from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my father?

Have you not seen my father?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,

sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattthī
a certain man's brother had passed away.

Since his passing away,
he, unbalanced and unhinged,
went from street to street,
from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my brother?

Have you not seen my brother?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattthī
a certain man's sister had passed away.

Since her passing away,
he, unbalanced and unhinged,

went from street to street,
from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my sister?

Have you not seen my sister?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattḥī
a certain man's son had passed away.

Since his passing away,
he, unbalanced and unhinged,
went from street to street,
from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my son?

Have you not seen my son?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,

lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattḥī
a certain man's daughter had passed away.

Since her passing away,
he, unbalanced and unhinged,
went from street to street,
from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my daughter?

Have you not seen my daughter?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattḥī
a certain man's wife had passed away.

Since her passing away,
he, unbalanced and unhinged,
went from street to street,

from cross-road to cross-road,
saying:

'Have you not seen my wife?

Have you not seen my wife?'

This too is a way, brahman,
in which it can be said
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection:

Once upon a time, brahman,
in this very Sāvattḥī,
a certain woman went to her relation's family.

Those relations of hers, having forcibly taken her from her husband, desired to give her to another, but she did not want him.

Then that woman spoke thus to her husband:

'These relations of mine, master, having forcibly taken me from you, want to give me to [295] another, but I do not want him.'

Then that man,
having cut that woman in two,
destroyed himself,
thinking:

'We will both come to be hereafter.'

This too is a way, brahman, in which grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection,"

Then the brahman Nāḷijaṅgha, having rejoiced in what the Lord had said,
having given thanks,
rising from his seat
approached Queen Mallikā;
having approached,
he recounted to her
the whole of the conversation he had had with the Lord.

Then Queen Mallikā approached King Pasenadi;
having approached,
she spoke thus to King Pasenadi:

"What do you think about this, sire?

Is your daughter Vajīrī dear to you?"

"Yes, Mallikā.

My daughter Vajīrī is dear to me."

"What do you think about this, sire?

From an alteration
and otherness
in your daughter Vajīrī would there arise in you grief,

sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair?"

"From an alteration
and otherness, Mallikā, in my daughter Vajīrī
there would be a change for me,
even for life.

How should there not arise in me grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair?"

"It was in reference to this, sire, that it was said by the Lord,
who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One:

'Grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection.'

■

What do you think about this, sire?

Is the noble lady Vāsabhā<sup>3</sup> dear to you?"

"Yes, Mallikā, the noble lady Vāsabhā is dear to me."

"What do you think about this, sire?"

From an alteration
and otherness
in the noble lady Vāsabhā
would there arise in you grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair?"

"From an alteration
and otherness, Mallikā,
in the noble lady Vāsabhā
there would be a change for me,
even for life.

How should there not arise in me grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair?"

"It was in reference to this, sire,
that it was said by the Lord,
who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One:

'Grief,
sorrow,
suffering,

lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection.'

■

What do you think about this, sire?

Is the General Viḍūḍabha<sup>4</sup> dear to you?"

"Yes, Mallikā, the General Viḍūḍabha is dear to me."

"What do you think about this, sire?

From an alteration
and otherness
in the General Viḍūḍabha
would there arise in you grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair?"

"From an alteration
and otherness, Mallikā,
in the General Viḍūḍabha
there would be a change for me,
even for life.

How should there not arise in me grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair?"

"It was in reference to this, sire,
that it was said by the Lord,
who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One:

'Grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection.'

■

What do you think about this, sire?

Am I dear to you?"<sup>5</sup>

"Yes, Mallikā, you are dear to me."

"What do you think about this, sire?

From an alteration
and otherness in me
would there arise in you grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair?"

"From an alteration
and otherness in you, Mallikā, there would be a change for me,
even for life.

How should there not arise in me grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair?"

"It was in reference to this, sire,
that it was said by the Lord,
who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One:

'Grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection.'

■

What do you think about this, sire?

Are the peoples of Kāsi and Kosala dear to you?"

"Yes, Mallikā, the peoples of Kāsi and Kosala are dear to me.

Because of their might we obtain sandal wood from the country of Kāsi and use sweet-smelling garlands and perfumes."

"What do you think about this, sire?

From an alteration
and [296] otherness

in the peoples of Kāsi and Kosala would there arise in you grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair?"

"From an alteration
and otherness, Mallikā,
in the peoples of Kāsi and Kosala
there would be a change for me,
even for life.

How should there not arise in me grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair?"

"It was in reference to this, sire,
that it was said by the Lord,
who knows,
who sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One:

'Grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are born of affection,
originate in affection.'

It is wonderful, Mallikā, it is marvellous, Mallikā, how much the Lord,

penetrating through wisdom, sees by means of wisdom.<sup>6</sup>

Come, Mallikā,
let me wash (ceremonially).<sup>7</sup>

Then King Pasenadi,
rising from his seat,
having arranged his upper garment over one shoulder,
having saluted the Lord with joined palms,
three times uttered this solemn utterance:

"Praise to the Lord,
the perfected one,
the fully Self-Awakened One.

"Praise to the Lord,
the perfected one,
the fully Self-Awakened One.

"Praise to the Lord,
the perfected one,
the fully Self-Awakened One."

Discourse on "Born of Affection":
The Seventh

---

<sup>1</sup> kathāvalthu, matter, topic of talk, as at M. ii. 127, 132. Also the name of one of the Abhidhamma books.

<sup>2</sup> vitatham, as at D. ii. 73.

<sup>3</sup> According to MA. iii. 345 she was one of the King's consorts.

<sup>4</sup> Son of Pasenadi and Vāsabhā.

<sup>5</sup> The text repeats in full the whole conversation as in the case of Vajīrī

<sup>6</sup> Cf. M. i. 480, ii. 173; A. ii. 115-116.

<sup>7</sup> ācātmehi. The commentarial ācamehi is to be preferred, unless ācāmehi is a causative form; at Jā. vi. 8 we get ācamāpeti, which the sense of MA. iii. 346 seems to suggest, for it implies that although Pasenadi, and not Mallikā, was to perform the ceremonial ablution, she was enjoined to make this possible for her husband by providing him with rinsing water. His ablution would then consist in rinsing ceremonially, ācamitva, washing his hands and feet and rinsing out his mouth before he paid his respects to the Teacher.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
4. Rāja Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
4. The Royal Division

88. Discourse on the Foreign Cloth

Bāhitika Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Then the venerable Ānanda,
having dressed in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe
entered Sāvattḥī for almsfood.

When he had walked for almsfood in Sāvattḥī, returning from the alms-gathering after the meal, he approached the palace of Migāra's mother and the Eastern [297] monastery
for the day-sojourn.

At that time King Pasenadi of Kosala, having mounted the bull-elephant Ekapuṇḍarika (One-Lotus),
set forth from Sāvattihī in the early morning.

King Pasenadi saw the venerable Ānanda coming in the distance;
seeing him,
he addressed the chief minister, Sirivaḍḍha, saying:

"Dear Sirivaḍḍha, is not this the venerable Ānanda?"

"Yes, sire, this is the venerable Ānanda."

Then King Pasenadi addressed another man, saying:

"Come you, my good man,
approach the venerable Ānanda;
in my name salute the venerable Ānanda's feet with your head,
saying:

'Revered sir, King Pasenadi salutes the venerable Ānanda's feet with his head,'

and then say:

'If, revered sir,
there is really nothing urgent to be done
by the venerable Ānanda,
please, revered sir,
let the venerable Ānanda wait for a moment
out of compassion.'

"Yes, sire,"
and this man having answered King Pasenadi in assent, approached the venerable Ānanda;

having approached
and having greeted the venerable Ānanda,
he stood at a respectful distance.

As this man was standing at a respectful distance, he spoke thus to the venerable Ānanda:

"Revered sir,
King Pasenadi of Kosala salutes the venerable Ānanda's feet with his head, and speaks thus:

'If, revered sir,
there is really nothing urgent to be done
by the venerable Ānanda,
please, revered sir,
let the venerable Ānanda wait for a moment
out of compassion.'

The venerable Ānanda consented
by becoming silent.

Then King Pasenadi,
having gone by the bull-elephant as far as the ground was possible for the elephant, having dismounted,
approached the venerable Ānanda on foot;
having approached,
having greeted the venerable Ānanda,
he stood at a respectful distance.

As he was standing at a respectful distance,
King Pasenadi spoke thus to the venerable Ānanda:

"If, revered sir,
there is nothing urgent to be done
by the venerable Ānanda,
it were good, revered sir,

that the venerable Ānanda should approach the bank of the river Aciravatī
out of compassion."

And the venerable Ānanda consented by becoming silent.

Then the venerable Ānanda approached the bank of the river Aciravatī;
having approached,
he sat down on a seat made ready
at the root of a tree.

Then King Pasenadi,
having gone by bull-elephant
as far as the ground was possible for the elephant,
having dismounted,
approached the venerable Ānanda on foot;
having approached,
having greeted the venerable Ānanda,
he stood at a respectful distance.

As he was standing at a respectful distance,
King Pasenadi spoke thus to the venerable Ānanda:

"Now, revered sir,
let the venerable Ānanda sit down on this elephant-rug."<sup>1</sup> [298] "No, sire; you sit down,

I am sitting on a seat of my own."

King Pasenadi sat down on the prepared seat.

As King Pasenadi was sitting down,
he spoke thus to the venerable Ānanda:

"Revered Ānanda,
would the Lord engage not in such bodily conduct<sup>2</sup> as was offensive to<sup>3</sup> intelligent recluses and brahmans?"

"No, sire,
the Lord would not engage in such bodily conduct as was offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans."

"But, revered Ānanda,
would the Lord engage not in such conduct of speech as was offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans."

"No, sire,
the Lord would not engage in such conduct of speech as was offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans."

"But, revered Ānanda,
would the Lord engage not in such conduct of thought as was offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans."

"No, sire,
the Lord would not engage in such conduct of thought as was offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans."

"It is wonderful, reverend sir, it is marvellous, reverend sir - what I was not able to convey fully in a question has been, reverend sir, fully conveyed by the venerable Ānanda in answer to the question.

Reverend sir, when those who are ignorant and inexperienced speak in praise or dispraise of others without test or scrutiny,<sup>4</sup> we do not fall back on that as the pith (of the matter).

But, revered sir,
when those who are wise,
experienced,
clever,
speak in praise or dispraise of others after test and scrutiny, we fall back on that
as the pith (of the matter).

But what, revered Ānanda, is the bodily conduct that is offensive
to intelligent recluses and brahmans?"

"Whatever the bodily conduct, sire, that is unskilled."

"But what, revered sir, is unskilled bodily conduct?"

"Whatever the bodily conduct, sire, that has a blemish."

"But what, revered sir, is the bodily conduct that has a blemish?"

"Whatever the bodily conduct, sire,
that is injurious."

"And what, revered sir, is the bodily conduct that is injurious?"

"Whatever the bodily conduct, sire,
that is ill in result."

"And what, revered sir, is the bodily conduct that is ill in result?"

"Whatever bodily conduct, sire, conduces to torment of self and conduces to torment of others
and conduces to torment of both,
and of which the unskilled states increase much,
the skilled states dwindle away -
bodily conduct such as this, sire, is offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans."

■

But what, revered Ānanda, is the conduct of speech
that is offensive
to intelligent recluses and brahmans?"

"Whatever conduct of speech, sire,
that is unskilled."

"But what, revered sir, is unskilled conduct of speech?"

"Whatever conduct of speech, sire,
that has a blemish."

"But what, revered sir, is conduct of speech that has a blemish?"

"Whatever conduct of speech, sire,
that is injurious."

"And what, revered sir, is conduct of speech that is injurious?"

"Whatever conduct of speech, sire,
that is ill in result."

"And what, revered sir, is conduct of speech that is ill in result?"

"Whatever conduct of speech, sire, conduces to torment of self
and conduces to torment of others
and conduces to torment of both,
and of which the unskilled states increase much,
the skilled states dwindle away -
conduct of speech such as this, sire,
is offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans."

■

But what, revered Ānanda, is the conduct of thought
that is offensive
to intelligent recluses and brahmans?"

"Whatever conduct of thought, sire,
that is unskilled."

"But what, revered sir, is unskilled conduct of thought?"

"Whatever conduct of thought, sire,
that has a blemish."

"But what, revered sir, is conduct of thought that has a blemish?"

"Whatever conduct of thought, sire,
that is injurious."

"And what, revered sir, is conduct of thought that is injurious?"

"Whatever conduct of thought, sire,
that is ill in result."

"And what, revered sir, is conduct of thought that is ill in result?"

"Whatever conduct of thought, sire, conduces to torment of self
and conduces to torment of others
and conduces to torment of both,
and of which the unskilled states increase much,
the skilled states dwindle away -
conduct of thought such as this, sire,
is offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans."

"Revered Ānanda, does not the Lord praise the getting rid of precisely all unskilled states?"

"The Tathāgata, sire,
has got rid of all unskilled states and is endowed with skilled states."<sup>5</sup>

---

"But which, revered Ānanda, is the bodily conduct
that is not offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans?"

"Whatever the bodily conduct, sire, that is skilled."

"But what, revered sir, is skilled bodily conduct?"

"Whatever the bodily conduct, sire, that has no blemish."

"But what, revered sir, is the bodily conduct that has no blemish?"

"Whatever the bodily conduct, sire,
that is non-injurious."

"And what, revered sir, is the bodily conduct that is non-injurious?"

"Whatever the bodily conduct, sire,
that is joyous in result."

"And what, revered sir, is the bodily conduct that is joyous in result?"

"Whatever bodily conduct, sire, does not conduce to the torment of self and does not conduce to the torment of others
and does not conduce to the torment of both,
and of which the unskilled states dwindle away,
the skilled states increase much -
bodily conduct such as this, sire, is not offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans."

■

"But which, revered Ānanda, is the conduct of speech
that is not offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans?"

"Whatever conduct of speech, sire,
that is skilled."

"But what, revered sir, is skilled conduct of speech?"

"Whatever conduct of speech, sire,
that has no blemish."

"But what, revered sir, is conduct of speech that has no blemish?"

"Whatever conduct of speech, sire,
that is non-injurious."

"And what, revered sir, is conduct of speech that is non-injurious?"

"Whatever conduct of speech, sire,
that is joyous in result."

"And what, revered sir, is conduct of speech that is joyous in result?"

"Whatever conduct of speech, sire,
does not conduce to the torment of self
and does not conduce to the torment of others
and does not conduce to the torment of both,
and of which the unskilled states dwindle away,
the skilled states increase much -
conduct of speech such as this, sire,
is not offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans."

■

"But which, revered Ānanda, is the conduct of thought

that is not offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans?"

"Whatever conduct of thought, sire,
that is skilled."

"But what, revered sir, is skilled conduct of thought?"

"Whatever conduct of thought, sire,
that has no blemish."

"But what, revered sir, is conduct of thought that has no blemish?"

"Whatever conduct of thought, sire,
that is non-injurious."

"And what, revered sir, is conduct of thought that is non-injurious?"

"Whatever conduct of thought, sire,
that is joyous in result."

"And what, revered sir, is conduct of thought that is joyous in result?"

"Whatever conduct of thought, sire,
does not conduce to the torment of self
and does not conduce to the torment of others
and does not conduce to the torment of both,
and of which the unskilled states dwindle away,
the skilled states increase much -
conduct of thought such as this, sire,
is not offensive to intelligent recluses and brahmans."

"But, revered Ānanda, does the Lord praise the acquiring of precisely all skilled states?"

"The Tathāgata, sire,
has got rid of all unskilled states
and is endowed with skilled states."

"It is wonderful, revered sir,
it is marvellous, revered sir, how well spoken is this, revered sir,
by the venerable Ānanda;
and we, revered sir,
are delighted and satisfied with the venerable Ānanda's well spoken words.

Being thus delighted and satisfied, revered sir, with the venerable Ānanda's well spoken words, we would give a [300] valuable elephant to the venerable Ānanda
if this, revered sir, were allowable
to the venerable Ānanda,
we would give a valuable horse
if this, revered sir, were allowable
to the venerable Ānanda,
we would give the boon of a village
if this, revered sir, were allowable
to the venerable Ānanda.

But then we know this, revered sir:

This is not allowable
to the venerable Ānanda.

This piece of foreign cloth,<sup>6</sup> revered sir, inserted into the shaft of a sunshade, has been sent to me by King Ajātasattu of Magadha, the son of (the lady) Videhī in length it is equal to sixteen (hands<sup>7</sup>), in breadth to eight (hands).

Revered sir,
let the venerable Ānanda accept it
out of compassion."

"No, sire,
I am complete as to the three robes."

"Revered sir, after a great storm has rained down on the high mountain slopes, both you and I have seen how at such a time the river Aciravati rushes along overflowing both its banks<sup>8</sup> - even so, revered sir, the venerable Ānanda can make a set of three robes for himself from this piece of foreign cloth; and the venerable Ānanda can distribute his old set of three robes
among his fellow Brahma-farers.

So will this gift of faith of ours go on with an overflow, methinks.

Revered sir, let the venerable Ānanda accept this piece of foreign doth."

And the venerable Ānanda accepted the piece of foreign cloth.

Then King Pasenadi spoke thus to the venerable Ānanda:

"If it please you,
we are going now, revered sir,

we are very busy,
there is much to be done."

"You must do now, sire,
that for which you deem it the right time."

Then King Pasenadi,
having rejoiced in what the venerable Ānanda had said,
giving thanks,
rising from his seat
and greeting the venerable Ānanda,
departed
keeping his right side towards him.

Then not long after King Pasenadi had departed, the venerable Ānanda approached the Lord;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance the venerable Ānanda told the Lord the whole of the conversation he had had with King Pasenadi, and he handed that piece of foreign cloth to the Lord.

Then the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks, it is a gain for King Pasenadi, [301] it is well gotten by King Pasenadi that he achieved a sight of Ānanda, that he achieved a paying of homage to him."

Thus spoke the Lord;
delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on the Foreign Cloth: The Eighth

---

<sup>1</sup> See above, p. 259, n. 3.

<sup>2</sup> As at Vin. ii. 248.

<sup>3</sup> Or, a slur on, opārambha. MA. iii. 346, explaining as uparambham dosam āropanaraho, refers to the story of the murderous wanderers at Ud. IV. 8.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. A. i. 89, ii. 3, 84.

<sup>5</sup> A reference is intended here to: yathākāri tathāvādi, as he does so he speaks (D. iii. 135).

<sup>6</sup> bāhitikā. MA. iii. 347 says it is the name of a cloth or garment, vattha, produced outside the kingdom.

<sup>7</sup> So MA. iii. 347 and cf. Miln. 317. Hattha is more correctly hand and forearm.

<sup>8</sup> Cf. Miln. 36.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
4. Rāja Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
4. The Royal Division

89. Discourse on Testimonies to Dhamma

Dhamma-Cetiya Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying among the Sakyans.

Medaḷumpa<sup>1</sup> was the name of the market town belonging to the Sakyans.

At that time King Pasenadi of Kosala had arrived at Naṅgaraka<sup>2</sup> on some business or other.

Then King Pasenadi addressed Dīgha Kārāyana,<sup>3</sup> saying:

"Good Kārāyana, harness some lovely vehicles; we are going to the garden of the pleasure to see its beauties."

"Yes, sire," and Dīgha Kārāyana,
having answered King Pasenadi in assent,

having had many lovely vehicles harnessed,
announced to King Pasenadi:

"Many lovely vehicles are harnessed for you, sire.

You may deem it is now the right time for that."

Then King Pasenadi, having mounted one of the lovely vehicles, set forth from Naṅgaraka
with the many lovely vehicles
and with great royal pomp,
and drew near the park.

When he had gone by vehicle as far as the ground was possible, dismounting from the vehicle,
he entered the park on foot.

As King Pasenadi was pacing up and down in the park and roaming about on foot he saw charming and attractive roots of trees, quiet and silent,
without folk's breath,
far from the haunts of men, suitable for solitary meditation.<sup>4</sup>

Seeing them,
he began to remember the Lord,
thinking:

"It is at these charming and attractive roots of trees,
quiet and silent,
without folk's breath,
far from the haunts of men,
suitable for solitary meditation,
that we [302] can pay homage to that Lord,

perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One."

Then King Pasenadi addressed Dīgha Kārāyana, saying:

"It is, good Kārāyana,
at these charming and attractive roots of trees,
quiet and silent,
without folk's breath,
far from the haunts of men,
suitable for solitary meditation,
that we can pay homage to this Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

Where, good Kārāyana, is this Lord staying at present,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One?"

"Sire, there is a market town of the Sakyans called Medaḷumpa.

The Lord, perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
is staying there at present."

"Now, how far, good Kārāyana, is Medaḷumpa, the market town of the Sakyans, from Naṅgaraka?"

"It is not far, sire;
it is three yojams.

It is possible to get to it in what remains of the day."

"Well then, good Kārāyana, harness many lovely vehicles, we will go to see this Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One."

"Yes, sire," and Dīgha Kārāyana,
having answered King Pasenadi in assent,
having had many lovely vehicles harnessed,
announced to King Pasenadi:

"Many lovely vehicles are harnessed for you, sire.

You may deem it is now the right time for that."

Then King Pasenadi, having mounted one of the lovely vehicles, set forth from Naṅgaraka
with the many lovely vehicles and drew near Medaḷumpa,
the market town of the Sakyans,
arriving there in what remained of that day, and approached the park.<sup>5</sup>

When he had gone by vehicle as far as the ground was possible, dismounting from the vehicle,
he entered the park on foot.

Now at that time several monks were pacing up and down in the open air.

Then King Pasenadi approached these monks;
having approached,
he spoke thus to these monks;

"Where, revered sirs, is the Lord staying at present,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One?"

We are anxious to see the Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One."

"Sire, this is the dwelling-place; the door is closed.

Having approached quietly, having entered the verandah
(but) not crossing it,
having coughed,
tap on the door-bolt.

The Lord will open the door to you."<sup>6</sup>

Then King Pasenadi immediately handed his sword and turban<sup>7</sup> to Dīgha Kārāyana,.

Then it occurred to Dīgha Kārāyana,:

"The King wants to be alone now; must I now remain just where I am?"

Then King Pasenadi having quietly approached [303] that dwelling-place with its closed door,
having entered the verandah
(but) not crossing it, coughed
and tapped on the door-bolt.

The Lord opened the door.

Then King Pasenadi, having entered the dwelling-place,<sup>8</sup> having inclined his head to the Lord's feet, kissed the Lord's feet on all sides with his mouth and stroked them on all sides with his hands, and he made known his (own) name;

"I, revered sir, am King Pasenadi of Kosala;

I, revered sir, am King Pasenadi of Kosala."

"But for what special reason do you, sire, pay such deep respect to this body<sup>9</sup> and display such tokens of friendship?"

"Revered sir, for me there is a logical consequence<sup>10</sup> of the Lord's dhamma:

'The fully Self-Awakened One is the Lord,
well taught is dhamma by the Lord,
the Lord's Order of disciples fares along well.'

I, revered sir, see some recluses and brahmans here, faring a restricted Brahma-faring for ten, twenty,
thirty
and forty years.

After a time
these,
well washed,<sup>11</sup> well anointed,
with their hair and beards trimmed, parade about in the full possession and enjoyment of the five strands of sense-pleasures.

On the other hand I, revered sir, see monks here
faring a perfectly fulfilled, perfectly purified Brahma-faring all their lives long until their last breath.

And outside this, revered sir,
I behold no other Brahma-faring so perfectly fulfilled and perfectly purified.

This, revered sir, is a logical consequence of the Lord's dhamma:

'The fully Self-Awakened One is the Lord,
well taught is dhamma by the Lord,
the Lord's Order of disciples fares along well.'

And again, revered sir,
kings quarrel with kings, and nobles quarrel with nobles, and brahmans quarrel with brahmans, and householders quarrel with householders, and a mother quarrels with a child, and a child quarrels with the mother, and a father quarrels with a child, and a child quarrels with the father, and a brother quarrels with a brother, and a brother quarrels with a sister, and a sister quarrels with a brother, and friend quarrels with friend.

But I, revered sir,
see monks here living on friendly terms and harmonious,
not quarrelling,
like milk and water blending, regarding one another with the eye of affection.

But outside this, revered sir, I [304] behold no other such harmonious company.

And this too, revered sir, is for me a logical consequence of Lord's dhamma.

'The fully Self-Awakened One is the Lord,
well taught is dhamma by the Lord,
the Lord's Order of disciples fares along well.'

And again, I, revered sir, pace up and down and roam about
from one park to another, from one pleasaunce to another.

And there I see some recluses and brahmans who are thin,
wretched,
their colour bad,
yellowish,
their veins standing out on their limbs,
methinks not at all pleasing to behold.

So it occurs to me thus, revered sir:

Undoubtedly these venerable ones are faring the Brahma-faring displeased, or there is some evil kamma done by them and concealed<sup>12</sup> and that is why these venerable ones are thin, wretched, their colour bad,
yellowish,
their veins standing out on their limbs,
methinks not at all pleasing to behold.

So, approaching these venerable ones, I speak thus:

'How is it that you, venerable ones, are thin,
wretched,
their colour bad,
yellowish,
their veins standing out on their limbs, methinks not at all pleasing to behold?'

They say:

'It is an illness that runs in our families,<sup>13</sup> sire.'

On the other hand I, revered sir, see monks here who are very joyful,
very exultant,
looking contented and cheerful,
living unconcerned,
unruffled,
dependent on others,<sup>14</sup>
with a mind become as a wild creature's.

So it occurs to me, revered sir:

Undoubtedly these venerable ones recognise a high excellence in the Lord's teaching, a gradual accomplishing,<sup>15</sup> and that is why these venerable ones are very joyful,
very exultant,
looking contented and cheerful,
living unconcerned,
unruffled,
dependent on others,
with a mind become as a wild creature's.

And this too is for me, revered sir, a logical consequence of the Lord's
dhamma:

'The fully Self-Awakened One is the Lord,
well taught is dhamma by the Lord,
the Lord's Order of disciples fares along well.'

And again, revered sir, I, a noble anointed king,
am able to execute one deserving execution, to fine one deserving to be fined,

to banish one deserving banishment.

But when I am sitting on a case, people sometimes speak interrupting (me).

And I get no chance to say:

'While I am sitting on the case do not, good sirs, speak interrupting (me).

Let the good sirs wait until I have finished speaking.'

But I, revered sir,
see monks here
at a time when the Lord is teaching dhamma
to various assemblies,
and at that time
there is no sound of expectorating among the Lord's disciples, no [305] sound of coughing.<sup>16</sup>

Once upon a time, revered sir, when the Lord was teaching dhamma
to various assemblies
a certain disciple of the Lord coughed; one of his fellow Brahma-farers tapped his knee and said:

'Let the venerable one be quiet,
let the venerable one make no noise;
the Lord, our Teacher, is teaching dhamma'<sup>16</sup>

In connection with this it occurred to me, revered sir:

'Indeed, it is wonderful,
indeed it is marvellous;

assuredly, how well trained - without stick,<sup>17</sup> without sword -
must be such an assembly.'

And outside this, revered sir,
I see no other assembly well trained thus.

And this too is for me, revered sir,
a logical consequence of the Lord's dhamma:

'The fully Self-Awakened One is the Lord,
well taught is dhamma by the Lord,
the Lord's Order of disciples fares along well.'

And again, revered sir,
I see here some clever nobles,<sup>18</sup>
subtle,
practised in disputing with others,
skilled in hair-splitting,
who go about, methinks,
breaking to pieces
in their wisdom
the views (of others).

These hear:

'Undoubtedly the recluse Gotama will visit a certain village or market town.'

They construct a question, thinking:

'Having approached the recluse Gotama,
we will ask him this question of ours.'

If, on being asked by us thus,
he answers thus,

we will refute him thus;
and if,
on being asked by us thus,
he answers thus,
we will refute him thus.'

These hear:

'It is certain that the recluse Gotama is visiting a certain village or market town.'

So they approach the Lord.

The Lord gladdens,
rouses,
incites,
delights them
with talk on dhamma.

These, gladdened,
roused,
incited,
delighted by the Lord
with talk on dhamma,
do not ask the Lord the question at all - whence can they refute him?

On the contrary, they become the Lord's disciples.

This too is for me, revered sir,
a logical consequence of the Lord's dhamma:

'The fully Self-Awakened One is the Lord,
well taught is dhamma by the Lord,
the Lord's Order of disciples fares along well.'

And again, revered sir,
I see here some clever brahmans<sup>19</sup>subtle,
practised in disputing with others,
skilled in hair-splitting,
who go about, methinks,
breaking to pieces
in their wisdom
the views (of others).

These hear:

'Undoubtedly the recluse Gotama will visit a certain village or market town.'

They construct a question, thinking:

'Having approached the recluse Gotama,
we will ask him this question of ours.

If, on being asked by us thus,
he answers thus,
we will refute him thus;
and if,
on being asked by us thus,
he answers thus,
we will refute him thus.'

These hear:

'It is certain that the recluse Gotama is visiting a certain village or market town.'

So they approach the Lord.

The Lord gladdens,
rouses,
incites,

delights them
with talk on dhamma.

These, gladdened,
roused,
incited,
delighted by the Lord
with talk on dhamma,
do not ask the Lord the question at all -
whence can they refute him?

On the contrary, they become the Lord's disciples.

This too is for me, revered sir,
a logical consequence of the Lord's dhamma:

'The fully Self-Awakened One is the Lord,
well taught is dhamma by the Lord,
the Lord's Order of disciples fares along well.'

And again, revered sir,
I see here some clever householders
subtle,
practised in disputing with others,
skilled in hair-splitting,
who go about, methinks,
breaking to pieces
in their wisdom
the views (of others).

These hear:

'Undoubtedly the recluse Gotama will visit a certain village or market town.'

They construct a question, thinking:

'Having approached the recluse Gotama,
we will ask him this question of ours.

If, on being asked by us thus,
he answers thus,
we will refute him thus;
and if,
on being asked by us thus,
he answers thus,
we will refute him thus.'

These hear:

'It is certain that the recluse Gotama is visiting a certain village or market town.'

So they approach the Lord.

The Lord gladdens,
rouses,
incites,
delights them
with talk on dhamma.

These, gladdened,
roused,
incited,
delighted by the Lord
with talk on dhamma,
do not ask the Lord the question at all - whence can they refute him?

On the contrary,
they ask leave of the Lord himself
for the going forth from home into homelessness.

The Lord lets them go forth.

These, gone forth like this,
living alone,
aloof,
diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
having by their own super-knowledge
soon realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness, entering on it, abide in it.

This too is for me, revered sir,
a logical consequence of the Lord's dhamma:

'The fully Self-Awakened One is the Lord,
well taught is dhamma by the Lord,
the Lord's Order of disciples fares along well.'

And again, revered sir,
I see here some clever recluses
subtle,
practised in disputing with others,
skilled in hair-splitting,
who go about, methinks,
breaking to pieces
in their wisdom
the views (of others).

These hear:

'Undoubtedly the recluse Gotama will visit a certain village or market town.'

They construct a question, thinking:

'Having approached the recluse Gotama,
we will ask him this question of ours.

If, on being asked by us thus,
he answers thus,
we will refute him thus;
and if,
on being asked by us thus,
he answers thus,
we will refute him thus.'

These hear:

'It is certain that the recluse Gotama is visiting a certain village or market town.'

So they approach the Lord.

The Lord gladdens,
rouses,
incites,
delights them
with talk on dhamma.

These, gladdened,
roused,
incited,
delighted by the Lord
with talk on dhamma,
do not ask the Lord the question at all - whence can they refute him?

On the contrary,
they ask leave of the Lord himself
for the going forth from home into homelessness.

The Lord lets them go forth.

These, gone forth like this,
living alone,
aloof,
[306] diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
having by their own super-knowledge
soon realised here and now
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness, entering on it, abide in it.

These speak thus:

'Indeed we were nearly lost,
indeed we were nearly lost,
for while we were formerly not (true) recluses, we claimed that we were,
saying:

We are recluses.

Not being (true) brahmans, we claimed that we were
saying;

We are brahmans.

Not being (true) perfected ones, we claimed that we were saying:

We are perfected ones.

But now we really are recluses, now we really are brahmans, now we really are perfected ones.'

This too is for me, revered sir,
a logical consequence of the Lord's dhamma:

'The fully Self-Awakened One is the Lord,
well taught is dhamma by the Lord,
the Lord's Order of disciples fares along well.'

And again, revered sir,
I see here the equerries<sup>20</sup> Isīdatta and Purāṇa<sup>21</sup> whose food is mine,
whose vehicles are mine,<sup>22</sup> for whom I provide a livelihood
and to whom I bring fame.

But yet they do not pay me respect as they do the Lord.

Once upon a time, revered sir,
while marching against an army, in order to test these same equerries, Isīdatta and Purāṇa, I took up my quarters in some cramped habitation.

Then, revered sir, these equerries, Isīdatta and Purāṇa, having passed the greater part of the night in talk on dhamma, lay down with their heads directed towards where they had heard that the Lord was, their feet towards me.

In connection with this, revered sir,
it occurred to me:

'Indeed it is wonderful,
indeed it is marvellous.

These equerries, Isīdatta and Purāṇa,
whose food is mine,

whose vehicles are mine,
for whom I provide a livelihood
and to whom I bring fame, yet do not pay me respect
as they do the Lord.

Undoubtedly these venerable ones recognise a high excellence in this Lord's teaching, a gradual accomplishing.'

And this too is for me, revered sir,
a logical consequence of the Lord's teaching:

'The fully Self-Awakened One is the Lord,
well taught is dhamma by the Lord,
the Lord's Order of disciples fares along well.'

And again, revered sir,
the Lord is a noble,
I too am a noble;
the Lord is a Kosalan,
I too am a Kosalan;
the Lord is round about eighty years of age,
I too am round about eighty years of age.

It is because the Lord is a noble and I am a noble, because the Lord is a Kosalan and I am a Kosalan, because the Lord is round about eighty years of age and I am round about eighty years of age that I am disposed, revered sir, to pay deep respect to the Lord and display tokens of friendship.

Please, revered sir,
I must be going now,
I am very busy,
there is much to be done."

"Do now, sire,
that for which you deem it to be the right time."

Then King Pasenadi, rising from his seat,
having greeted the Lord,
departed
keeping his right side towards him.

Soon after King Pasenadi had departed,
the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks, that is King Pasenadi of Kosala who, having spoken testimonies to dhamma,<sup>23</sup>
rising from his seat,
is departing.

Learn, monks, the testimonies to dhamma;
master, monks, the testimonies to dhamma;
remember, monks, the testimonies to dhamma.

Connected with the goal, monks, are the testimonies to dhamma, fundamental to the Brahma-faring."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on Testimonies to Dhamma:
The Ninth

---

<sup>1</sup> MA. iii. 348: Medataḷumpa; DhA. i. 356 = Jā. iv. 151: Uḷumpa.

<sup>2</sup> According to M. iii. 104 and MA. iii. 348 this was a market-town, nigama, of the Sakyans.

<sup>3</sup> Nephew of Bandhula, the commander-in-chief of the Mallas, MA. iii. 349.

<sup>4</sup> As at Vin. i. 39, ii. 158, etc.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. A. v. 65-66, several of the details of which vary however from the M. account.

<sup>6</sup> As at Vin. i. 248. See B.D. iv. 342 for notes.

<sup>7</sup> Two of the five emblems of royalty, see e.g. Jā. v. 264.

<sup>8</sup> It was at this juncture that Dīgha Kārāyana, made Viḍūḍabha king instead of Pasenadi, MA. iii. 352, Jā. iv. 151-152, DhA. i. 356.

<sup>9</sup> Cf. S. iii. 120, "What is there in seeing this vile body of mine?"

<sup>10</sup> dhammanvaya, as at M. i. 69. The A. account breaks off here, and Pasenadi gives, as recorded there, quite different reasons for his deep respect.

<sup>11</sup> Sunhāta. This and the next two words also at S. i. 79, iv. 343, and cf. D. i. 104. Sunhāta probably refers to ceremonial washing rather than to the bathing at fortnightly intervals allowed to monks at Vin. iv. 117.

<sup>12</sup> Cf. Vin. ii. 40 ff., where an offence that has not been confessed is still 'concealed,' hidden or covered, paṭicchanna.

<sup>13</sup> bandhukaroga. Bandhu is of course kinsman, and although a v.l. is paṇḍuka- (jaundice), MA. iii. 353 explains by kularogo amhākaṃ, a family illness of ours, of hereditary nature.

<sup>14</sup> paradavutta, see B.D. v. 259, n. 2.

<sup>15</sup> pubbenāpara visesa, from kaṣiṇa-meditation through vipassanā (insight, a higher form of meditation) to arahantship, MA. iii. 353.

<sup>16</sup> Cf. M. ii. 4-5.

<sup>17</sup> daṇḍa here possibly means more specifically "punishment," to balance the punishments meted out by the king, above; but we have not infrequently had the pair: (without) stick and (without) sword.

<sup>18</sup> Cf. following passage with M. i. 176 f.

<sup>19</sup> At M. i. 176 the brahmins are like the nobles who "on the contrary, become the Lord's disciples." Thus a pair is formed to balance the other pair - householders and recluses - who ask for the going forth. The reading at M. i. 176 is to be preferred.

<sup>20</sup> A translation of thapatayo suggested at K.S. v. 303, n. 1.

<sup>21</sup> For the two see S. v. 348ff., A. iii. 348, 351, 451, v. 139, 143, and DPPN.

<sup>22</sup> mama bhaddā mama yānā. MA. iii. 354 says mama santakam bhaddam (... yānam ...) etesam, their food (vehicles) is due to me. There is little support for Chalmers' "who make my carriages."

<sup>23</sup> MA. iii. 355 explains dhammacetiyanī as "words of respect for the dhamma. To whichever one of the Three Jewels respect is paid, it is paid to all. Therefore, if paid to the Lord, it is paid to dhamma, and so the Lord spoke of 'testimonies to dhamma.' "Cetiya usually means a (sepulchral) monument, from a root meaning to pile up, and in this Discourse Chalmers renders by "monuments" and Neumann by "Denkmale." The memorial monuments of India are, however, also in the nature of testimony to the virtues, etc. of the deceased person in whose honour they are erected. I hope the use of this word here does not take us too far from the meaning intended. "Attestations" might also have been chosen.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
4. Rāja Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
4. The Royal Division

90. Discourse at Kaṇṇakatthala

Kaṇṇakatthala Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Ujuññā<sup>1</sup> in the deer-park at Kaṇṇakatthala.

At that time King Pasenadi [308] of Kosala had arrived at Ujuññā on some business or other.

Then King Pasenadi addressed a certain man,
saying;

"Come you, my good man,
approach the Lord;
having approached,
in my name salute the Lord's feet with your head
and ask whether he is well,
not indisposed,

of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort,
and say:

'Revered sir, King Pasenadi salutes the Lord's feet with his head,
and asks whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort';
and then speak thus:
'Revered sir, today after the meal
when he has had breakfast,
King Pasenadi is expecting to come to see the Lord.'

"Yes, sire,"
and that man,
having answered King Pasenadi in assent,
approached the Lord;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance,
that man spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, King Pasenadi salutes the Lord's feet with his head,
and asks whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort.

And he speaks thus:

'Revered sir, today after the meal
when he has had breakfast,
King Pasenadi is expecting to come to see the Lord.'

The sisters Somā and Sakulā<sup>2</sup> heard:

'Today after the meal
when he has had breakfast,
King Pasenadi is expecting to go to see the Lord.'

Then the sisters Somā and Sakulā, having approached the place where King Pasenadi was eating,<sup>3</sup>
spoke thus:

"Well then, sire,
in our names salute the Lord's feet with your head
and ask whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort,
saying:

'Revered sir, the sisters Somā and Sakulā salute the Lord's feet with their heads
and ask whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort.'

Then after the meal
when King Pasenadi had eaten his breakfast, he approached the Lord;
having approached,

having greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance,
King Pasenadi spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, the sisters Somā and Sakulā with their heads salute the Lord's feet
and ask whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort."

"But how is it, sire, that the sisters Somā and Sakulā were not able to send another messenger?"

"Revered sir, the sisters Somā and Sakulā heard:
'Today after the meal
when he has had breakfast,
King Pasenadi is expecting to go to see the Lord.'

Then, revered sir, the sisters Somā and Sakulā having approached me in the place where I was eating,
spoke thus:

[309] 'Well then, sire,
in our names salute the Lord's feet with your head
and ask whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort,
saying:

'Revered sir, the sisters Somā and Sakulā salute the Lord's feet with their heads and ask whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort.'

"May the sisters Somā and Sakulā be happy, sire."

Then King Pasenadi spoke thus to the Lord:

"I have heard this about you, revered sir:

'The recluse Gotama speaks thus:

"There is neither a recluse nor a brahman who, all-knowing, all-seeing,
can claim all-embracing knowledge-and-vision -
this situation does not exist."

Revered sir, those who speak thus:

'The recluse Gotama speaks thus:

"There is neither a recluse nor a brahman
who, all-knowing, all-seeing,
can claim all-embracing knowledge-and-vision -
this situation does not exist."

I hope that these, revered sir, speak what was spoken by the Lord, that they do not misrepresent the Lord by what is not fact, that they explain dhamma
according to dhamma,

and that no reasoned thesis gives occasion for contempt?<sup>4</sup>

"Those, sire, who speak thus:

'The recluse Gotama speaks thus:

"There is neither a recluse nor a brahman
who, all-knowing, all-seeing,
can claim all-embracing knowledge-and-vision -
this situation does not exist."

these do not speak as I spoke but are misrepresenting me with what is not true,
with what is not fact."

Then King Pasenadi addressed the commander-in-chief, Viḍūḍabha,
saying:

"Now, who was it, commander-in-chief,
that brought this subject of conversation into the palace?"

"The brahman Sañjaya of the Ākāsa clan, sire."

Then King Pasenadi summoned a man and said:

"Come you, my good man, in my name summon the brahman Sañjaya of the Ākāsa clan,
saying:

'King Pasenadi, revered sir, is summoning you.'

"Yes, your majesty,"
and when this man had answered King Pasenadi in assent he approached the brahman Sañjaya of the Ākāsa clan;

and having approached,
he spoke thus to the brahman Sañjaya:

"King Pasenadi is summoning you, revered sir."

Then King Pasenadi spoke thus to the Lord:

"Could it be, revered sir, that people might have transferred to quite another topic something (originally) said by the Lord in reference to something else?"

In regard to what, revered sir, does the Lord claim to have spoken the words?"

"I, sire, claim to have spoken the words thus:

"There is neither a [310] recluse nor a brahman who at one and the same time<sup>5</sup> can know all,
can see all -
this situation does not exist."

"Revered sir, the Lord speaks causally,<sup>6</sup> and it is in reference to cause,<sup>6</sup> revered sir, that the Lord says:

"There is neither a recluse nor a brahman who at one and the same time
can know all,
can see all -
this situation does not exist."

These, revered sir, are the four castes:
nobles,
brahmans,

merchants
and workers.

Now, revered sir,
could there be any distinction,
any difference,
between these four castes?"

"These are, sire, the four castes: nobles,
brahmans,
merchants
and workers.

Among these four castes, sire, two are pointed to as chief:
the nobles and the brahmans, that is to say in the way of addressing them, rising up from one's seat for them, saluting them with joined palms and rendering them service."

"I, revered sir, am not asking the Lord about the here and now; revered sir, I am asking the Lord about a future state.

These, revered sir, are the four castes:
nobles,
brahmans,
merchants
and workers.

Now, revered sir, could there be any distinction,
any difference
between these four castes?"

"Sire, there are these five qualities for striving.<sup>7</sup>

What five?

As to this, sire,
a monk has faith;
he has faith in the awakening of the Tathāgata, and thinks:

'Indeed this is the Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
endowed with knowledge and (right) conduct,
Well-farer,
knower of the worlds,
incomparable charioteer of men to be tamed,
teacher of devas and men,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.'

He is well,
in good health,
endowed with a good digestion,
not over-cool,
not over-hot,
but of a middle kind
suitable for striving.

He is not fraudulent,
not deceitful,
but shows himself as he really is
to the Teacher
or the learned
among his fellow Brahma-farers.

He dwells with energy stirred up for getting rid of unskilled states, for arousing skilled states,
steadfast,

firm in advance,
persevering amid skilled states.

He is one of wisdom
endowed with wisdom
leading to (the cutting off of) rise and fall, with ariyan discrimination
leading to the complete destruction of anguish.

These, sire, are the five qualities for striving.

These, sire, are the four castes: nobles,
brahmans,
merchants
and workers.

These might be possessed of these five qualities for striving.

For a long time
that would be for their welfare and happiness."

"These, revered sir, are the four castes:
nobles,
brahmans,
merchants
and workers;
and these might be possessed of the five qualities for striving.

But, revered sir, might there be among them here any distinction,
any difference?"

"I, sire, here speak of a divergence in striving.

It is as if<sup>8</sup> there might be, sire, among elephants

or horses
or oxen to be tamed
two elephants,
two horses
or two oxen
that were well tamed,
well trained
and two that were not tamed, not trained.

What do you think about [311] this, sire?

Would those two elephants or horses
or oxen
that were to be tamed
and that were well tamed, well trained -
would these,
on being tamed,
reach tamed capacity,
would they,
being tamed,
attain tamed rank?"

"Yes, revered sir."

"But those two elephants
or horses
or oxen
that were to be tamed
but that were neither tamed nor trained -
would these,
not being tamed,
reach tamed capacity,

and would they,
not being tamed,
attain tamed rank
as do the two elephants or horses
or oxen
to be tamed
that were well tamed,
well trained?"

"No, revered sir."

"Even so, sire,
that which may be achieved by faith, by good health,
by honesty
and absence of deceit, by output of energy,
by wisdom -
that one of no faith,
of poor health,
fraudulent and deceitful, lazy,
weak in wisdom
could attain it -
this situation does not exist."

"Revered sir, the Lord speaks causally, and it is in reference to cause,
revered sir,
that the Lord speaks.

These, revered sir,
are the four castes:
nobles,
brahmans,

merchants
and workers.

These might be possessed of the five qualities for striving, and if they made the proper efforts would there be between them, revered sir,
any distinction,
any difference?"

"I, sire, here speak of no difference,
that is to say
in freedom as against freedom.

It is as though a man, sire, bringing dry sticks from a teak tree<sup>9</sup> were to produce a fire
and heat were to result.

Then another man,
bringing dry sticks from a sāl-tree
were to produce a fire
and heat were to result.

Then another man,
bringing dry sticks from a mango-tree
were to produce a fire
and heat were to result.

Then another man,
bringing dry sticks from a fig tree
were to produce a fire
and heat were to result.

What do you think about this, sire?

Because of the different woods used for the fires, would there be any difference in what is produced, in flame as against flame, in hue as against hue,
in brilliance as against brilliance?"

"No, revered sir."

"Even so it is, sire,
with heat created by energy, produced by striving.

I do not speak of any difference there, that is in freedom as against freedom."

"Revered sir, the Lord speaks causally,
and it is in reference to cause
that the Lord speaks.

But, honoured sir, are there devas? "10

[312] "How can you, sire, speak thus:

'But, revered sir, are there devas?'"

"Be it that these devas, revered sir, are returners
to a state of being such or so, 11
or be it
that they are not returners
to a state of being such or so?"

"Sire, whatever devas have been malevolent are returners to a state of being such or so; whatever devas have not been malevolent are not returners to a state of being such or so."

When this had been said,
the commander-in-chief, Viḍūḍabha,
spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, can those devas that are malevolent and are returners
to a state of being such or so drive away
or banish from that place those devas that have not been malevolent and are not returners
to a state of being such or so?"

Then it occurred to the venerable Ānanda:

"This Viḍūḍabha, the commander-in-chief, is a son of King Pasenadi;
I am the Lord's son.

This is a time when son might confer with son."

So the venerable Ānanda addressed Viḍūḍabha, the commander-in-chief,
saying:

"Well now, commander-in-chief,
on this point
I will ask you something in return.

Answer exactly as it seems right to you.

What do you think about this, commander-in-chief?

As far as the realm of King Pasenadi (extends),
and there where King Pasenadi holds dominion and sway, is King Pasenadi able to drive away
or banish from that place

a recluse or a brahman
whether he is meritorious
or not meritorious,
whether he is a Brahma-farer
or not a Brahma-farer?"

"Good sir, as far as the realm of King Pasenadi (extends)
and there where King Pasenadi holds dominion and sway, King Pasenadi is able to drive away
or banish from that place
a recluse or a brahman
whether he is meritorious or not
or not meritorious,
whether he is a Brahma-farer
or not a Brahma-farer."

"What do you think about this, commander-in-chief?"

As far as the realm of King Pasenadi does not (extend),
and there where King Pasenadi holds no dominion or sway,
is King Pasenadi able to drive away
or banish from that place
a recluse or a brahman
whether he is meritorious
or not meritorious,
whether he is a Brahma-farer
or not a Brahma-farer?"

"Good sir, as far as the realm of King Pasenadi does not (extend),
and there where King Pasenadi holds no dominion or sway, King Pasenadi is not able to drive away
or banish from that place
a recluse or a brahman
whether he is meritorious
or not meritorious,

whether he is a Brahma-farer
or not a Brahma-farer."

"What do you think about, this, commander-in-chief?

Have you heard of the devas of the Thirty-Three?"

[313] "Yes, good sir, I have heard of the devas of the Thirty-Three and the good King Pasenadi has also heard of the devas of the Thirty-Three."

"What do you think about this, commander-in-chief?

Is King Pasenadi able to drive away
or banish from that place the devas of the Thirty-Three?"

"Good sir, King Pasenadi is not even able to see the devas of the Thirty-Three.

How then could he drive them away or banish them from that place?"

"Even so, commander-in-chief, those devas that have been malevolent
and are returners
to a state of being such or so are not even able to see those devas that have not been malevolent
and are not returners
to a state of being such or so.

So how could they drive them away or banish them from that place?"

Then King Pasenadi spoke thus to the Lord:

"What, revered sir, is this monk's name?"

"His name is Ānanda, sire."

"Bliss<sup>12</sup> indeed, indeed blissful!<sup>12</sup>

Revered sir, the venerable Ānanda speaks causally
and it is in reference to cause, revered sir, that the venerable Ānanda speaks.

But now, revered sir, is there a Brahmā?"

"How can you, sire, speak thus:

'Is there a Brahmā?'"

"Be it that this Brahmā, revered sir, is a returner to the state of being such or so, or be it that he is not a returner
to a state of being such or so?"

"Sire, whatever Brahmā has been malevolent is a returner to a state of being such or so; but whatever Brahmā has not been malevolent is not a returner to a state of being such or so."

Then a certain man spoke thus to King Pasenadi:

"The brahman Sañjaya of the Ākāsa clan has arrived, sire."

Then King Pasenadi spoke thus to the brahman Sañjaya of the Ākāsa clan:

"Now, who was it, brahman,
that brought this subject of conversation into the palace?"

"Viḍūḍabha, sire, the commander-in-chief."

"The commander-in-chief, Viḍūḍabha, speaks thus:

'The brahman Sañjaya, sire, of the Ākāsa clan.'

Then a certain man spoke thus to King Pasenadi:

"It is time for the vehicle, sire."

Then King Pasenadi spoke thus to the Lord:

"We, revered sir, questioned the Lord about omniscience; the Lord [314] explained omniscience, and because it was pleasing to us
and approved
we are delighted.

Revered sir, we questioned the Lord about the purity of the four castes; the Lord explained the purity of the four castes,
and because it was pleasing to us
and approved
we are delighted.

Revered sir, we questioned the Lord about the devas;
the Lord explained the devas,
and because it was pleasing to us
and approved
we are delighted.

Revered sir, we questioned the Lord about Brahmā;
the Lord explained about Brahmā,
and because it was pleasing to us
and approved
we are delighted.

And, revered sir, whatever it was we questioned the Lord about, that very thing the Lord explained,
and because it was pleasing to us

and approved
we are delighted.

And now, if it please you, revered sir, we are going;
we are very busy
and there is much to be done."

"You must do now, sire,
that for which you deem it the right time."

Then King Pasenadi of Kosala, delighted at what the Lord had said,
having given thanks,
rising from his seat,
having greeted the Lord,
departed keeping his right side towards him.

Discourse at Kaṇṇakatthala:
The Tenth

---

<sup>1</sup> Mentioned at D. i. 161. According to MA. iii. 356 it was both a district and a town; here the town is meant.

<sup>2</sup> MA. iii. 356 says that these two sisters were wives of Pasenadi.

<sup>3</sup> bhattābhihāre, as at S. i. 82. "The place where the rice (food) was brought," MA. iii. 356.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. M. i. 368, ii. 77, 222, 243.

<sup>5</sup> sakideva. MA. iii. 357 says "who, with one 'adverting' (of the mind), one thought, one 'impulsion,' can know and see the whole past, future and present."

<sup>6</sup> heturūpaṃ ... saheturūpaṃ.

<sup>7</sup> As at M. ii. 95; see above, p. 282, and fill up the omission in this paragraph from there. [Ed.: done for this edition.]

<sup>8</sup> Cf. M. iii. 130.

<sup>9</sup> sāka is probably teak, Tectonia grandis. Cf. four (or five) fires at M. ii. 152, and M. ii. 183.

<sup>10</sup> Cf. M. ii. 212. MA. iii. 359 quotes a passage giving a list of devas - see A. i. 210, iii. 287, 313, 316, v. 331, 334.

<sup>11</sup> itthatta, being such and such; such or so.

<sup>12</sup> ānanda ... ānandarūpaṃ.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
5. Brāhmaṇa Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
5. The Division on Brahmins

91. Discourse with Brahmāyu

Brahmāyu Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was walking on tour in Videha together with a large Order of monks, with as many as five hundred monks.

Now at that time the brahman Brahmāyu was living in Mithilā.

He was worn,
old,
full of years,
he had lived his span
and was at the close of his life,
a hundred and twenty years of age;
he was master<sup>1</sup> of the three Vedas,<sup>2</sup> versed in the vocabularies and rituals together with the phonology and exegesis<sup>3</sup>

and the legendary tradition as the fifth;
he was learned in idioms,
a grammarian,
proficient in popular philosophy and the marks of a Great Man.<sup>4</sup>

The brahman Brahmāyu heard:

"Verily the recluse Gotama,<sup>5</sup>
son of the Sakyans,
having gone forth from the Sakyan clan,
is walking on tour in Videha
together with a large Order of monks,
with as many as five hundred monks.

The most lovely report has gone abroad thus concerning this revered<sup>6</sup> Gotama:

'He is indeed Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
endowed with knowledge and (right) conduct,
Well-farer,
knower of the worlds,
the matchless charioteer of men to be tamed,
teacher of devas and mankind,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.

Having realised through his own super-knowledge,
he makes known this world
together with devas
including the Māras and the Brahmās;
creatures
together with recluses and brahmans,
with devas and mankind.

He teaches [318] dhamma
that is lovely at the beginning,
lovely in the middle
and lovely at the ending;
he explains with the spirit and the letter
the Brahma-faring
completely fulfilled
and wholly purified.

Good indeed is the sight of perfected ones such as this."

Now at that time
the brahman Brahmāyu had the brahman youth Uttara as pupil;
he was master of the three Vedas,
versed in the vocabularies and rituals together with the phonology and exegesis
and the legendary tradition as the fifth;
he was learned in idioms,
a grammarian,
proficient in popular philosophy
and the marks of a Great Man.

Then the brahman Brahmāyu addressed the brahman youth Uttara,
saying:

"Dear Uttara, this recluse Gotama,
son of the Sakyans,
having gone forth from the Sakyan clan,
is walking on tour in Videha
together with a large Order of monks,
with as many as five hundred monks.

The most lovely report has gone abroad thus concerning this revered Gotama:

'He is indeed Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
endowed with knowledge and (right) conduct,
Well-farer,
knower of the worlds,
the matchless charioteer of men to be tamed,
teacher of devas and mankind,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.

Having realised through his own super-knowledge,
he makes known this world
together with devas
including the Māras and the Brahmās;
creatures
together with recluses and brahmans,
with devas and mankind.

He teaches dhamma
that is lovely at the beginning,
lovely in the middle
and lovely at the ending;
he explains with the spirit and the letter
the Brahma-faring
completely fulfilled
and wholly purified.

Good indeed is the sight
of perfected ones such as this."

Come you, dear Uttara, approach the recluse Gotama;
having approached,
find out whether the recluse Gotama is in fact that revered Gotama of whom the report has gone abroad

or whether he is not,
and whether the revered Gotama is such a one or not such a one.

Through you will we know that revered Gotama.

So will I,
in virtue of what you say, find out whether that revered Gotama is in fact the revered Gotama of whom the report has gone abroad
or whether he is not,
and whether the revered Gotama is such a one
or not such a one.

Dear Uttara, in our mantras<sup>7</sup> the thirty-two marks of the Great Man are traditional.<sup>8</sup>

For a Great Man
possessed of these only two courses<sup>9</sup> are open,
not another:
If he settles in the household state he becomes a king<sup>10</sup> who is a wheel-turner,<sup>11</sup> a dhamma-man,<sup>12</sup> a king under dhamma,<sup>13</sup>
the ruler of the whole world,
one who [319] brings stability to his realm;
and he is possessed of the seven Treasures.

These seven Treasures of his are
the wheel-treasure,
the elephant-treasure,
the horse-treasure,
the jewel-treasure,

the woman-treasure,
the householder-treasure,
the adviser-treasure as the seventh.

He will have more than a thousand sons,
valiant,
built on heroic lines,<sup>14</sup>
able to crush opposing armies.

He dwells conquering this sea-girt land by dhamma,<sup>15</sup> not by stick,
not by sword.

But, if he goes forth from home
into homelessness
he becomes a perfected one,
a fully Self-Awakened One,
a lifter of the world's veil.<sup>16</sup>

Now I, dear Uttara, am an imparter<sup>17</sup> of mantras, you are a recipient<sup>17</sup> of mantras."

"Very well, sir,"
and the brahman youth Uttara, having answered the brahman Brahmāyu in assent,
rising from his seat,
having greeted the brahman Brahmāyu,
keeping his right side towards him,
set out on tour (to find) the Lord in Videha.

Walking on tour,
he gradually approached the Lord;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the Lord;

having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance
the brahman youth Uttara looked for the thirty-two marks of a Great Man on the Lord's body.

And the brahman youth Uttara saw all the thirty-two marks of a Great Man on the Lord's body
except two.

About these two marks of a great man
he was in doubt,
perplexed,
uncertain,
not satisfied -
whether what was cloth-hid was sheath-cased
and whether the tongue was large.

Then it occurred to the Lord:

"This brahman youth Uttara sees on me all the thirty-two marks of a Great Man
except two.

About these two marks of a Great Man he is in doubt,
perplexed,
uncertain,
not satisfied:
whether what is cloth-hid is sheath-cased [320] and whether my tongue is large."

Then the Lord contrived such a contrivance of psychic power<sup>18</sup> that the brahman youth Uttara saw that that which the Lord had cloth-hid was sheath-cased.

Then the Lord,
having put out his tongue,
stroked it backwards and forwards
over both his ears
and he stroked it backwards and forwards
over both his nostrils
and he covered the whole dome of his forehead with his tongue.<sup>19</sup>

Then it occurred to the brahman youth Uttara:

"The recluse Gotama is possessed of the thirty-two marks of a Great Man.

Suppose I were to follow the recluse Gotama closely so as to watch his conduct?"

Then for seven months the brahman youth Uttara, like a constant shadow,<sup>20</sup> followed the Lord closely.

After the lapse of the seven months the brahman youth Uttara set out on tour for Mithilā in Videha;
walking on tour
he gradually approached Mithilā and the brahman Brahmāyu;
having approached
and having greeted the brahman Brahmāyu,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

Brahmāyu the brahman spoke thus to the brahman youth Uttara
as he was sitting down at a respectful distance:

"I suppose, dear Uttara, that the report spread abroad about the revered Gotama was truly so

and not otherwise?

I suppose that the revered Gotama is such a one
and not of another kind?"

"Sir, the report spread abroad about the revered Gotama was truly so
and not otherwise;
this revered Gotama is such a one
and not of another kind.

And this revered Gotama is possessed of the thirty-two marks of a Great Man:<sup>21</sup>

The revered Gotama has feet with a level tread<sup>22</sup> -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

On the soles of the good Gotama's feet wheels appear
with a thousand spokes, with rims and hubs,
in every way complete -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

[321] The revered Gotama has projecting heels -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has long fingers (and toes)<sup>23</sup> -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has soft and tender hands and feet -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has (the fingers and toes) of his hands and feet evenly spaced<sup>24</sup> -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has ankles that are midway in the leg<sup>25</sup> -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has legs like (those of) antelopes<sup>26</sup> -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama, while standing erect and not bending,
can stroke and rub his knees with the palms of both hands -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has sheath-cased what is cloth-hid -

the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama is the colour of gold<sup>27</sup> -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has a golden<sup>28</sup> coloured skin, a smooth complexion -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

Because of his smooth complexion no dust or dirt adheres to his body -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has hairs that are separate -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The separate hairs grow (one) to each pore -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has hairs that grow upward -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The upward growing hairs are dark blue, the colour of collyrium, curling in rings,
curling to the right -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has a divinely straight body<sup>29</sup> -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has the seven convex surfaces<sup>30</sup> -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

[322] The revered Gotama has a body the front part of which is like a lion's<sup>31</sup> -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has no hollow between his shoulders<sup>32</sup> -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has the symmetrical proportions of a banyan tree - as is the height of his body so is the length of his arms when stretched out; as is the length of his arms when stretched out so is the height of his body -
the good Gotama,

a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has a bust that is evenly rounded -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has an exquisite sense of taste -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has jaws like a lion's -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has forty teeth.<sup>33</sup>

The revered Gotama has even teeth -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has teeth without spaces between them -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has very lustrous eye-teeth -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has a long tongue -
the good Gotama,

a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has a voice like Brahmā's;<sup>34</sup> he speaks like a karamka bird<sup>35</sup> -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has eyes of an intense blue -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has eyelashes like a cow's -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The hair that the revered Gotama has growing between the eyebrows is white and soft like cotton-down -
the good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has this mark of a Great Man.

The revered Gotama has a head shaped like a (royal) turban.<sup>36</sup>

The good Gotama,
a Great Man,
has also this mark of a Great Man.<sup>37</sup>

The revered Gotama is possessed of these thirty-two marks of a Great Man.

If the revered Gotama is walking he leads off with his right foot;
he does not put the foot too far (forward), he does not place the foot too short;

he does not walk too quickly;
he does not walk too slowly;
he does not walk knocking knee against knee or ankle against ankle;
[323] while he is walking he does not bend his thighs up, he does not bend his thighs down, he does not bend his thighs in,
he does not bend his thighs out.<sup>38</sup>

As the revered Gotama walks he moves only with the lower part of his body and does not walk with his (full) bodily strength.<sup>39</sup>

When he is looking around, the revered Gotama looks round with his whole body,<sup>40</sup> he does not look up,
he does not look down,
and he does not walk without observing,<sup>41</sup> for he looks (ahead) a plough's length;<sup>42</sup> further than that his knowledge and insight become unobstructed.<sup>43</sup>

On entering into a house<sup>44</sup> he does not bend his body up, he does not bend his body down, he does not bend his body in,
he does not bend his body out.

He turns round
not too far from his seat, not too near it,
and he does not sit down on the seat clutching hold of it with his hand, nor does he fling his body

(in a slovenly way<sup>45</sup>) on to the seat.<sup>46</sup>

When he is seated in a house he does not fall into unseemly behaviour with his hands,<sup>47</sup> he does not fall into unseemly [324] behaviour with his feet;<sup>48</sup> he does not sit down crossing knee over knee or ankle over ankle, nor does he sit down
holding his jaw in his hand.

When he is seated in a house
he is not afraid,
does not tremble,
shake or quiver -
and so is the revered Gotama when he is sitting in a house unafraid,
untrembling,
not shaking,
not quivering,
unruffled,
intent on aloofness.

When he is receiving water for the bowl
he does not turn the bowl up,
he does not turn the bowl down,
he does not turn the bowl inwards,
he does not turn the bowl outwards;
he receives neither too little
nor too much water for the bowl.

He washes the bowl
without making it clatter,<sup>49</sup>

he washes the bowl without twirling it round;
not until he has put the bowl down on the ground
does he wash his hands;
by the time the hands are washed
the bowl is washed;
by the time the bowl is washed
the hands are washed.

He throws away the water for the bowl
not too far,
not too near,
and without scattering it.

When he is receiving boiled rice,
he does not turn the bowl up,
he does not turn the bowl down,
he does not turn the bowl inwards,
he does not turn the bowl outwards;
he receives neither too little nor too much boiled rice.

The revered Gotama eats the proper proportion of curry (to rice<sup>50</sup>) and he does not neglect (the rice) with each mouthful of curry.

The revered Gotama swallows each mouthful only after having turned it round two or three times in his mouth; there is not a single grain of boiled rice that enters his body without having been broken up, and not a single grain of boiled rice remains in his mouth before he proceeds to the (next) mouthful.

The revered Gotama eats food experiencing its flavour but not experiencing greed for the flavour.

The revered Gotama eats food that is possessed of the eight characteristics<sup>51</sup> but not for fun
or indulgence
or personal charm
or beautification, but just enough for the support of his body and keeping it going,
for keeping it unharmed, for furthering the Brahma-faring,
thinking:

'Thus will I crush out an old feeling and not allow a new feeling to arise, and then there will be subsistence for me and blamelessness
and abiding in comfort.'<sup>52</sup> || ||

When he has eaten
and is accepting water for the bowl,
he does not [325] , turn the bowl up,
he does not turn the bowl down,
he does not turn the bowl inwards,
he does not turn the bowl outwards.

He receives neither too little
nor too much water for the bowl.

He washes the bowl
without making it clatter,
he washes the bowl without twirling it round;
not until he has put the bowl down on the ground

does he wash his hands;
by the time the hands are washed
the bowl is washed;
by the time the bowl is washed
the hands are washed.

He throws away the water for the bowl
not too far,
not too near,
and without scattering it.

When he has eaten,
he places the bowl on the ground,
not too far,
not too near,
for he is not without concern for the bowl<sup>53</sup> yet he is not over-protective of the bowl.

When he has eaten,
he sits silent for a moment, but he does not let pass the time for giving thanks.

When he has eaten,
he gives thanks.

He does not decry that meal, he does not hope for another meal;
on the contrary he delights,
rouses,
inspires,
gladdens that assembly
with talk on dhamma.

When he has delighted,
roused,

inspired,
gladdened that assembly
with talk on dhamma,
rising from his seat,
he departs.

He does not walk too quickly,
he does not walk too slowly, he does not walk (as if) anxious to get free (of that assembly).<sup>54</sup>

The revered Gotama's robe is not pulled up too high on his body, it is not pulled down too low;<sup>55</sup> and neither does it stick to his body,<sup>56</sup> nor is it drawn away from his body,<sup>57</sup> and neither does the wind blow the revered Gotama's robe about on his body,<sup>58</sup> nor do dust and dirt cling to the revered Gotama's body.

When he has gone to a monastery he sits down on an appointed seat and while sitting down he cleanses his feet<sup>59</sup> - but the revered Gotama does not live intent on the practice of beautifying his feet.

When he has cleansed his feet he sits down cross-legged, holding the body erect
and arousing mindfulness in front of him.

He does not strive after hurt of self,
he does not strive after hurt of others, he does not strive after hurt of both.<sup>60</sup>

The revered Gotama sits down striving only after weal of self, weal of others,
weal of both,
weal of the whole world.

When, in a monastery, he is teaching dhamma in an assembly, he does not exalt that assembly, he does not disparage that assembly;
on the contrary he delights,
rouses,
inspires, [326] gladdens that assembly
with talk on dhamma.

The sound that issues from the revered Gotama's mouth<sup>61</sup> is possessed of eight characteristics: it is distinct and intelligible
and sweet and audible
and fluent<sup>62</sup> and clear and deep and resonant.

Wherefore when the revered Gotama instructs an assembly by voice the sound does not carry beyond that assembly.

These, after being delighted,
roused,
inspired,
gladdened by the revered Gotama
with talk on dhamma,
rising from their seats,

depart reluctantly,
keeping their gaze on him.

We, sir, have seen that revered Gotama walking, we have seen him standing still,
we have seen him sitting silent within a house, we have seen him eating in a house, we have seen him sitting silent after he has eaten, we have seen him giving thanks after he has eaten, we have seen him going to a monastery, we have seen him sitting silent in a monastery, we have seen him in a monastery teaching dhamma in an assembly.

This revered Gotama is like this and like that and even more so."63

When this had been said, Brahmāyu the brahman,
rising from his seat,
having arranged his upper robe over one shoulder,
having saluted the Lord with joined palms,
three times uttered this solemn utterance:

"Praise to that Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

"Praise to that Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

"Praise to that Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

Perhaps somewhere, sometime
we might meet this revered Gotama, perhaps there might be some conversation between us."

Then the Lord, walking on tour in Videha, in due course arrived at Mithilā.

While he was there
the Lord stayed near Mithilā in Makhādeva's Mango Grove.

Brahmans and householders of Mithilā heard:

"Verily the recluse Gotama,
son of the Sakyans,
having gone forth from the Sakyan clan,
is walking on tour in Videha
together with a large Order of monks,
with as many as five hundred monks.

The most lovely report has gone abroad thus concerning the revered Gotama:

'He is indeed Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
endowed with knowledge and (right) conduct,
Well-farer,
knower of the worlds,
the matchless charioteer of men to be tamed,
teacher of devas and mankind,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.

Having realised through his own super-knowledge,
he makes known this world
together with devas

including the Māras and the Brahmās;
creatures
together with recluses and brahmans,
with devas and mankind.

He teaches dhamma
that is lovely at the beginning,
lovely in the middle
and lovely at the ending;
he explains with the spirit and the letter
the Brahma-faring
completely fulfilled
and wholly purified.

Good indeed is the sight
of perfected ones such as this."

Then the brahmans and householders of Mithilā
approached the Lord:
some, having approached
and having greeted the Lord,
sat down at a respectful distance;
some, after they had exchanged greetings with the Lord and had conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
sat down at a [327] respectful distance;
some, after saluting the Lord with joined palms,
sat down at a respectful distance;
some, having made known to the Lord the name of their clan,
sat down at a respectful distance;
some, becoming silent,
sat down at a respectful distance.

The brahman Brahmāyu heard:

"Verily the recluse Gotama,
son of the Sakyans,

gone forth from the Sakyan clan, has arrived at Mithilā and is staying near Mithilā in Makhadeva's Mango Grove."

Then Brahmāyu the brahman together with a number of brahman youths approached Makhādeva's Mango Grove.

When Brahmāyu the brahman was near the Mango Grove
it occurred to him:

"It is not suitable in me that I should approach to see the recluse Gotama without being announced first."

So Brahmāyu the brahman addressed a certain brahman youth,
saying:

"Come you, brahman youth,
approach the recluse Gotama;
having approached,
in my name ask the recluse Gotama whether he is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort,
saying:

'Good Gotama, Brahmāyu the brahman is asking whether the revered Gotama is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort';
and then speak thus:

"Good Gotama, Brahmāyu the brahman is worn,
old,
full of years,
he has lived his span
and is at the close of his life,
a hundred and twenty years of age;
he was master of the three Vedas,
versed in the vocabularies and rituals
together with the phonology and exegesis
and the legendary tradition as the fifth;
he was learned in idioms,
a grammarian,
proficient in popular philosophy
and the marks of a Great Man.

Of all the brahmans and householders, sir,
who live in Mithilā, Brahmāyu the brahman is pointed to
as chief in respect of wealth, Brahmāyu the brahman is pointed to
as chief in respect of mantras, Brahmāyu the brahman is pointed to
as chief in respect of longevity
as well as of renown.

He is anxious to see the good Gotama."

"Very well, sir,"
and the brahman youth, having answered the brahman Brahmāyu in assent, approached the Lord;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the Lord,
and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he stood at a respectful distance.

As he was standing at a respectful distance,
the brahman youth spoke thus to the Lord:

"Good Gotama, the brahman Brahmāyu is asking whether the revered Gotama is well,
not indisposed,
of bodily vigour,
strong,
abiding in comfort.

The brahman Brahmāyu, good Gotama, is worn, old,
full of years,
he has lived his span
and is at the close of his life,
a hundred and twenty years of age;
he was master of the three Vedas,
versed in the vocabularies and rituals
together with the phonology and exegesis
and the legendary tradition as the fifth;
he was learned in idioms,
a grammarian,
proficient in popular philosophy
and the marks of a Great Man.

Of all the brahmans and householders, sir,
who live in Mithilā,
Brahmāyu the [328] brahman is pointed to
as chief in respect of wealth, Brahmāyu the brahman is pointed to
as chief in respect of mantras, Brahmāyu the brahman is pointed to
as chief in respect of longevity
as well as of renown.

He is anxious to see the good Gotama."

"Brahmāyu the brahman must now do that for which he deems it the right time, brahman youth."

Then that brahman youth approached Brahmāyu the brahman;
having approached,
he spoke thus to Brahmāyu the brahman:

"Permission has been given<sup>64</sup> revered sir, by the recluse Gotama.

Revered sir, you may now do that for which you deem it the right time."

Then Brahmāyu the brahman approached the Lord.

His assembly saw the brahman Brahmāyu coming in the distance.

Having seen him,
they, standing each at his own side,<sup>65</sup> made room for him because he was well known and renowned.

Then Brahmāyu the brahman spoke thus to that assembly:

"No, good sirs,
you sit down each on your own seat, I will sit here
near the recluse Gotama."

Then Brahmāyu the brahman approached the Lord;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the Lord;
having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Brahmāyu the brahman looked for the thirty-two marks of a Great Man on the Lord's body.

And Brahmāyu the brahman saw all the thirty-two marks of a Great Man on the Lord's body
except two.

About these two marks of a Great Man
he was in doubt,
perplexed,
uncertain,
not satisfied -
whether what was cloth-hid was sheath-cased
and whether the tongue was large.

Then Brahmāyu the brahman addressed the Lord in verses:

"Of these thirty-two marks of a Great Man of which I have heard
There are two that I do not see on your body, Gotama.
I wonder whether what is cloth-hid is sheath-cased, Supreme of men?
Or is it female? I wonder whether the tongue is not short?
I wonder whether you have a long tongue. So that I might know this,
Put forth this tongue, dispel our doubt, Seer.
For welfare here and now, and for bliss in a future state
We ask for permission (to see) that which we long (to know)."

[329] Then it occurred to the Lord:

"This brahman Brahmāyu sees on me all the thirty-two marks of a Great Man except two.

About these two marks of a Great Man
he is in doubt,
perplexed,

uncertain,
not satisfied -
whether what is cloth-hid is sheath-cased
and whether my tongue is large."

Then the Lord contrived such a contrivance of psychic power that the brahman Brahmāyu saw that that which the Lord had cloth-hid was sheath-cased.

Then the Lord, having put out his tongue, stroked it backwards and forwards
over both his ears
and he stroked it backwards and forwards
over both his nostrils
and he covered the whole dome of his forehead
with his tongue.

Then the Lord responded in verses
to the brahman Brahmāyu:

"Those thirty-two marks of a Great Man of which you have heard
Are all on my body. Do not you doubt them, brahman.
What<sup>66</sup> is to be known is known by me, and to be developed is developed,
What is to be got rid of has been got rid of - therefore, brahman, am I Awake.<sup>67</sup>
For welfare here and now and for bliss in a future state
Do ask for permission (to see) that which you long (to know)."

Then it occurred to the brahman Brahmāyu:

"Permission has been given me by the recluse Gotama.

Suppose I were to ask the recluse Gotama about the goal either of the here and now or of a future state?"

But then it occurred to the brahman Brahmāyu:

"I myself am skilled in the goals of the here and now, and others ask me about the goal of the here and now.

Suppose I were to ask the recluse Gotama simply about the goal of a future state?"

Then Brahmāyu the brahman addressed the Lord in verses:

"How is one a brahman? How does one become master of knowledge?
How is one a threefold knowledge-man? Who is called learned?
How is one perfected? How does one become whole?
And how is one a sage? Who is called Awake?"

Then the Lord responded in verses
to the brahman Brahmāyu:

[330] "Who knows his former habitations and sees heaven and the sorrowful ways,
Who has attained destruction of births,<sup>68</sup> accomplished by super-knowledge, a Sage is he.
Who knows his mind is quite pure, freed from every attachment,
Who has got rid of birth and dying, in the Brahma-faring Whole is he.<sup>69</sup>
Who is master of all states of mind,<sup>70</sup> such a one Awake is called."

When this had been said, Brahmāyu the brahman,
rising from his seat,
arranging his upper robe over one shoulder,
having inclined his head to the Lord's feet, kissed the Lord's feet on all sides with his mouth and stroked them on all sides with his hands,
and he made known his (own) name:<sup>71</sup>

"I, good Gotama, am Brahmāyu, the brahman."

Then that company was filled with wonder and marvel,
and said:

"Indeed it is wonderful,
indeed it is marvellous how great is the psychic power and the majesty of the recluse in virtue of which this Brahmāyu the brahman, well known and renowned,
pays such deep respect."

Then the Lord spoke thus to Brahmāyu the brahman:

"Enough, brahman, rise up;
do sit down on your own seat since your mind was pleased with me."

Then the brahman Brahmāyu, having risen up,
sat down on his own seat.

Then the Lord gave a talk to Brahmāyu the brahman on various topics:<sup>72</sup> talk on giving,
talk on moral habit,
talk on heaven;
he explained the peril,
the vanity,
the depravity of the pleasures of the senses, the advantage in renouncing them.

When the Lord knew that the mind of Brahmāyu the brahman was ready, malleable,

devoid of the hindrances, uplifted,
pleased,
then he explained to him that teaching on dhamma that the Awakened Ones have themselves discovered:
anguish,
uprising,
stopping,
the Way.

And as a clean cloth without black specks
will easily take dye, even so as Brahmāyu the brahman was (sitting) on that very seat did dhamma-vision,
dustless and stainless,
arise in him:
that

"whatever is liable to origination all that is liable to stopping."

Then Brahmāyu the brahman, having seen dhamma,
attained dhamma,
known dhamma,
plunged into dhamma,
having crossed over doubt, [331] put away uncertainty and attained without another's help to full confidence in the Teacher's instruction,
spoke thus to the Lord:

"It is excellent, good Gotama;
it is excellent, good Gotama.

Even, good Gotama,
as one might set upright
what had been upset,
or disclose what was covered,
or show the way
to one who had gone astray,
or bring an oil-lamp into the darkness thinking that those with vision might see material shapes, even so is dhamma made clear
in many a figure
by the good Gotama.

So I am going to the revered Gotama (for refuge)<sup>73</sup>
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the revered Gotama accept me as a lay-disciple
going for refuge
from this day forth
for as long as life lasts.

And may the revered Gotama consent to a meal with me
on the morrow
together with the Order of monks."

The Lord consented by becoming silent.

Then Brahmāyu the brahman,
having understood the Lord's consent,
rising up from his seat,

having greeted the Lord,
departed keeping his right side towards him.

Then the brahman Brahmāyu
having had sumptuous foods,
solid and soft,
prepared in his own dwelling
towards the end of that night,
had the time announced to the Lord,
saying:

"It is time, good Gotama,
the meal is ready."

Then the Lord,
having dressed in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe,
approached the dwelling of Brahmāyu the brahman;
having approached,
he sat down on the appointed seat
together with the Order of monks.

Then did Brahmāyu the brahman for seven days
with his own hand
serve and satisfy the Order of monks with the Awakened One at its head
with sumptuous foods,
solid and soft.

Then at the end of the seven days the Lord set out on tour in Videha.

Not long after the Lord had set out Brahmāyu the brahman passed away.

Then a number of monks approached the Lord;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
they sat down at a respectful distance.

As they were sitting down at a respectful distance, these monks spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir,
Brahmāyu the brahman has passed away.

What is his bourn,
what his future state?"

"Clever,<sup>74</sup> monks, was the brahman Brahmāyu;
he followed after dhamma
according to various parts of dhamma,<sup>75</sup> and he did not [332] annoy me<sup>76</sup> with questionings about dhamma.

Monks, Brahmāyu the brahman, by the complete destruction of the five fetters binding to this lower (shore),
is of spontaneous uprising,
one who attains nibbāna there,
not liable to return from that world."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse with Brahmāyu:
The First

---

<sup>1</sup> This is a stock description of a learned brahman. "Master," pāragū, is a goer to the beyond in, and so one who has come to finality or culmination. Cf. M. ii. 210; D. i. 88; A. i. 163, 166; Sn. p. 105, ver. 1019 f.

<sup>2</sup> MA. iii. 362, DA. 247, AA. ii. 261 and SnA. 447 all give Iru, Yaju and Sāma Vedas (Rig, Yajur and Sāman Vedas).

<sup>3</sup> See Dial. i. 109, n. 2, where it is said: "It is quite unnecessary to suppose a silent reference to it (the Atharva Veda) here," as DA. 247 = MA. iii. 362 = AA. ii. 261 = SnA. 447 suggest.

<sup>4</sup> See Ambaṭṭha Suttanta (D. i. 87, and see Dial. i. 110, n. 2 and 131, n. 2). Also the Lakkhaṇa Suttanta (D. iii. 142), Mahāpadāna Sta. (D. ii. 1 ff.), Mahāpurisa Sta. (S. v. 158) and Vassakāra Sta. (A. ii. 35*f.*)m The last two give the Buddhist, as against the pre-Buddhist interpretation of the Great Man. See also Mhvu. Transln. i. 180 f.

<sup>5</sup> This too is a stock clause.

<sup>6</sup> bhavantam.

<sup>7</sup> manta. MA. iii. 364 explains by veda. Cf. Sn. 1000 ff. On the word mantra, as "prayer" (for the classes of poets, priests and warriors) and as "magical formula or incantation" (for the masses), see R.N. Dandekar, "Cultural Background of the Veda," Univ. of Ceylon Review, vol. XI, Nos. 3 and 4, 1953, p. 141 ff. Whatever a mantra is it is not necessarily a Rig-Vedic hymn as such. There are 1,028 of these while, according to Dandekar, there are "about 10,660 (Rig-Vedic) mantras."

<sup>8</sup> āgatāni, have come down, been handed down.

<sup>9</sup> gati, bourn, going, procedure. MA. iii. 364 explains by niṭṭhā, goal or conclusion.

<sup>10</sup> MA. iii. 365, he is a king delighting the world with the four wonderful aspects of protection (given at D. iii. 232, A. ii. 32).

<sup>11</sup> MA. iii. 365, he tolls on the wheel-treasure; if he govern with the four wheels of prosperity, sampatti (cf. A. ii. 32), and if he govern others with these, he is doing his duty, vatta, for the good of others.

<sup>12</sup> dhammika, he walks by dhamma.

<sup>13</sup> dhammarājā. Having succeeded to the throne through dhamma (i.e. legitimately, rightly), he is the 'natural,' jāta, king. Or, he is dhammika because of his 'rightness,' dhamma, in regard to the good of others, just as he is dhammarājā because of his 'rightness' in regard to his own good, attahita.

<sup>14</sup> MA. iii. 360: their bodies are like devas; they are called 'heroes' because of their uttermost valour, as though their bodies were made of energy.

<sup>15</sup> MA. iii. 367 identifies dhamma with sīa here, the moral conduct of keeping the five precepts.

<sup>16</sup> MA. iii. 367 shows that these three attainments follow one from another. Vivattaccchadda, the lifter of the veil, refers to removing the seven darknesses of the defilements: attachment, hatred, confusion, pride, false views, ignorance and wrong-doing.

<sup>17</sup> dātā ... paṭiggahetā, as at D. i. 89. For the following note I am indebted to Mr. P. Mehta: "The guru conveys or imparts a new mantra when he sees the pupil is ready for it. When the pupil sounds (pronounces) it correctly then the guru teaches him the meaning. Correct sounding influences the mental receptivity of the pupil and induces a state of consciousness which is most appropriate for learning the meaning. The 'mantra' as sound is imparted or conveyed; the 'mantra' as meaning or significance is taught."

<sup>18</sup> Cf. Miln. 167-169.

<sup>19</sup> Cf. Sn. 1022.

<sup>20</sup> As at Dhp. 2, Thag. 1041-1043, etc.

<sup>21</sup> For more notes on the thirty-two marks or signs, see Dial. ii. 13 ff. and Mhvu. Translation, i. 180 ff., where the order in which the marks are given differs now and again from the M. version. See also Lamotte, Mppś i. 285-288, notes, where it is said that these 32 marks ornament the bodies both of Buddhas and of wheel-turning kings, and again, either all or some of the marks adorn the bodies of some other persons besides. Some of these men and women are known to the Pali Canon, for example the brahman Bāvarin, who had three of the marks (Sn. 1022). Like Brahmāyu he was 120 years old (Sn. 1019). Cf. also Kvu. 283 where the point of controversy is whether a bodhisatta is fully or partially possessed of the 32 marks.

<sup>22</sup> He puts the whole foot down on the ground with a single movement—neither the big toe first nor the heel.

<sup>23</sup> dīghaṅguli. Āṅguli usually mean only the fingers. MA. iii. 376 includes the toes as well, and says that the āṅguli are thick at the roots and taper off gradually to slender points.

<sup>24</sup> jālahatthapādo. See "The Webbed Finger of the Buddha," by A.K. Coomaraswamy, IHQ. VII, 1931, p. 20. It is better to take this as does Buddhaghosa at MA. iii. 376, etc., as: "the four fingers of the Tathāgata's hands and the five toes of his feet are of an equal measure" - spaced as evenly apart (with no swellings) as is the "netting" or network, jāla, of a particular kind of latticed window when made by a skilled carpenter. A person whose fingers are "webbed" (i.e. grown together) like a snake's hood is not even fit to go forth (Vin. i. 71, quoted MA. iii. 376). So how could a "webbed finger" be a mark of a Great Man? "With hands and feet like a net" (Dial. ii. 14) explains nothing.

<sup>25</sup> Not towards the heels as in other people, MA. iii. 377. The Pali word is ussaṅkhapādo. Cf. also BHSD. s.v. ucchaṅkha.

<sup>26</sup> I.e. with flesh all round, not in a lump at one side. The notion is "straight-limbed." Cf. Sn. 165; S. i. 16.

<sup>27</sup> The traditional colour-symbol for immortality; suvaṇṇa.

<sup>28</sup> kañcana here; bright, shining.

<sup>29</sup> A straight tall body, like Brahmā's. Most creatures bend at the shoulders, hips and knees; but the Tathāgata, rising up tall, is like a high golden gateway in a city of the devas, MA. iii. 378.

<sup>30</sup> sattussada, omitted in Chalmers' text, but referred to in this textual position at MA. iii. 378 as meaning that on the four limbs, on both shoulders and on the back there is a protuberance of flesh.

<sup>31</sup> I.e. curving, paripuṇṇa. Although the back portion of a lion's body does not curve, the whole of the Tathāgata's body curves, MA. iii. 379.

<sup>32</sup> From the small of the back up to the shoulders, the fleshy covering is like a smooth golden slab.

<sup>33</sup> twenty in each jaw, MA. iii. 381.

<sup>34</sup> brahmassara, a sublime voice. It is like a Great Brahma's, MA. iii. 382. See Kvu. 467.

<sup>35</sup> Famed for its sweet note, the Indian cuckoo.

<sup>36</sup> I.e., absolutely symmetrical.

<sup>37</sup> No doubt this refrain should occur after the naming of each mark; while omitted in our text it occurs in D. ii. 17-19. [Ed.: included in this edition.

<sup>38</sup> These words for "bending up, down, in, out," unnāmeti, onāmeti, sannāmeti, vināmeti, occur several times later in this Discourse. Cf. also Miln. 117.

<sup>39</sup> MA. iii. 388, sweat pours from the body if one keeps on flinging out one's arms.

<sup>40</sup> This is called the "elephant look," M. i. 337. See MA. ii. 420, iii 133 (the latter referred to at MA. iii. 388).

<sup>41</sup> na ca vipekkhamāno gacchati. The passage is somewhat corrupt. MA. iii. 388: he walks without looking from this side to that as though not seeing the elephants, horses, etc. So this phrase may mean: "he walks without staring (about)," On the other hand, the next phrase: yugamattañ ca pekkhati, seems to develop the idea of "not without observing." In walking as in the other "postures," there is to be not only mindfulness but also clear consciousness.

<sup>42</sup> Cf. Sn. 410. MA. iii. 388 says he fixes his eyes as little as nine vidatthi (ahead) when he is walking.

<sup>43</sup> anāvaṭaṃ, as at S. I. 62. "Irresistible" at K.S. i, 76. MA. iii, 388: "It could not be said that he does not see beyond a plough's length, since no wall or door or bush or creeper is able to obstruct him. Thus because of his unobstructed (all-pervading, anāvaraṇa) knowledge, various thousands of groups of world-systems are reckoned as one," i.e. he can see and know them all together and all at once, with 'open,' unhindered, anāvaṭa, insights.

<sup>44</sup> Here, according to MA. iii. 388 antaraghara means from the threshold, ummāra, of a house, in distinction to the indakhila which, at Vin. iv. 160, is identified with the ummāra,. The indakhila is a (village) post.

<sup>45</sup> pakkhipati. MA. iii. 389, he does not first settle either his lower or upper limbs, but sits down saṇikaṃ, slowly, gently or gradually.

<sup>46</sup> See the Sekhiyas on walking and sitting "amid houses," Vin. iv. 186 ff., 199.

<sup>47</sup> He does not twirl round his bowl or throw out a drop of water or split the leaf cover of a fly-whisk or fan.

<sup>48</sup> He does not grind them on the ground.

<sup>49</sup> na khulukhulukāraka, not commented upon in MA. Chalmers translates: "he does not swish the water about" Neumann: "ohne zu plätschen." See P.E.D. s.v. gala, and cf. BHSD. s.v. khurukhuru-.

<sup>50</sup> Three portions of rice to one of cuny.

<sup>51</sup> MA. iii. 392 refers to M. Sta. 2 and Vism. 31.

<sup>52</sup> As at M. i. 355, ii. 10, and also at e.g. S. iv. 104, A. iii. 388, iv. 167; and see Vism. 31.

<sup>53</sup> Not indifferent to it and taking care of it - not like someone who once he has put his bowl on a stand (for bowls) does not pour water into it but watches indifferently while dust falls into it.

<sup>54</sup> He does not hurry away, MA. iii. 393.

<sup>55</sup> Not as high as his jaw or as low as his ankles, MA. iii. 393.

<sup>56</sup> Because he does not sweat as other people do.

<sup>57</sup> It does not stand free like a khali cloak.

<sup>58</sup> Reading kāyasmim with Siamese instead of text's kāyamhā. The wind cannot make his robe stir, MA. iii. 393.

<sup>59</sup> As at Vin. i. 9.

<sup>60</sup> Cf. M. i. 414, iii. 23; A. i. 157; S. iv. 339.

<sup>61</sup> Cf. D. ii. 211, 227 of Brahmā Sanāmkumāra's voice.

<sup>62</sup> bindu. MA. iii. 394 gives sampiṇḍita, brought together, connected.

<sup>63</sup> "His excellent virtues that I have not spoken of are more than those I have spoken of - like the great earth, the great ocean, unending, boundless, wide as the sky," MA. iii. 395.

<sup>64</sup> katāmkāsa.

<sup>65</sup> oram atha or oram attha. MA. iii. 396 says: "getting up quickly, having divided into two, they made room for him." See JPTS., 1887, p. 154 ff.

<sup>66</sup> Sn. 558; and below, p. 337. This and the next line are quoted at VinA. i. 115; ItA. 149; UdA. 84; PtsA. i. 215; Vism. 201.

<sup>67</sup> tasmā buddho'ami; also below, p. 337 = Sn. 558, A. ii. 39; cf. M. i. 171, Vin. i. 8.

<sup>68</sup> Iti. p. 100; A. i. 165; S. i. 167; Thig. 63 f. Cf. Dhp. 423; Sn. 647, of a brahman.

<sup>69</sup> This line also occurs at A. ii. 23.

<sup>70</sup> See also A. ii. 23.

<sup>71</sup> As at M. ii. 120. cf. S. i. 178, 193. See Intr. p. xxv. above.

<sup>72</sup> Cf. Vin. i. 15, ii. 155 ff.; D. i. 110; M. i. 379, etc.

<sup>73</sup> saraṇaṃ not in Chalmers' text; probably omitted by an oversight.

<sup>74</sup> For this paragraph cf. M. iii. 247, 270; S. iv. 63, v. 346; Ud. 8, 50. In all these passages other men are concerned, and other bourns.

<sup>75</sup> paccapādi dhammassānudhammam. MA. iii. 398 says: "In this Discourse dhamma means the Way of perfection (arahattamagga); anudhamma means the three lower Ways and the fruits of recluseship. The meaning is that he acquired these in successive order."

<sup>76</sup> M. text reads navamaṃ vihesesi, instead of na ca maṃ, as in two variant readings of the text, in the parallel contexts, and at MA. iii. 398. This navamaṃ has misled Chalmers, although it might be argued that his "difficulty with the ninth stage" (of meditation?) is borne out to some extent by the fact that Brahmayu is not said to have achieved arahantship, being spoken of in words descriptive only of a non-returner. But this is far-fetched, and nothing is said in this Discourse about Brahmayu attempting any of the "stages" in meditation or of becoming proficient in them.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
5. Brāhmaṇa Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
5. The Division on Brahmins

92. Discourse with Sela

Sela Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord walking on tour among the people of Anguttarāpa,<sup>2</sup> together with a large Order of monks, with twelve hundred and fifty monks, arrived at the market town called Āpaṇa belonging to the people of Anguttarāpa.

Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic<sup>3</sup> heard:

"Verily the recluse Gotama,
son of the Sakyans,
having gone forth from the Sakyan clan, walking on tour among the people of Anguttarāpa
together with a large Order of monks, with twelve hundred and fifty monks, has reached Āpaṇa.

[333] The most lovely report has gone abroad thus concerning this revered Gotama:<sup>4</sup>

'He is indeed Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
endowed with knowledge and (right) conduct,
Well-farer,
knower of the worlds,
the matchless charioteer of men to be tamed,
teacher of devas and mankind,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.

Having realised through his own super-knowledge,
he makes known this world
together with devas
including the Māras and the Brahmās;
creatures
together with recluses and brahmans,
with devas and mankind.

He teaches dhamma
that is lovely at the beginning,
lovely in the middle
and lovely at the ending;
he explains with the spirit and the letter
the Brahma-faring
completely fulfilled
and wholly purified.

Good indeed is the sight
of perfected ones such as this."

Then Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic
approached the Lord;

having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the Lord;
having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As the matted hair ascetic Keṇiya was sitting down at a respectful distance the Lord delighted,
roused,
inspired,
gladdened him
with talk on dhamma.

Then Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic, delighted,
roused,
inspired,
gladdened by the Lord
with talk on dhamma,
spoke thus to the Lord:

"May the good Gotama
together with the Order of monks
consent to a meal with me on the morrow."<sup>5</sup>

When this had been said,
the Lord spoke thus
to Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic:

"But, Keṇiya,
great is the Order of monks,
twelve hundred and fifty monks, and you are favourably disposed towards<sup>6</sup> the brahmans."

And a second time did Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic speak thus to the Lord:

"Although, good Gotama,
the Order of monks is large,
twelve hundred and fifty monks,
and although I am favourably disposed towards the brahmins, (yet) may the good Gotama consent to a meal with me
on the morrow
together with the Order of monks."

And a second time did the Lord speak thus
to Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic:

"But, Keṇiya,
great is the Order of monks,
twelve hundred and fifty monks,
and you are favourably disposed towards the brahmins."

And a third time did Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic speak thus to the Lord:

"Although, good Gotama,
the Order of monks is large,
twelve hundred and fifty monks,
and although I am favourably disposed towards the brahmins,
(yet) may the good Gotama consent to a meal with me
on the morrow
together with the Order of monks."

The Lord consented by becoming silent.

Then Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic,
having understood the Lord's consent,
rising from his seat,
approached his own hermitage;
having approached,

he addressed his friends and acquaintances, his kith and kin,
saying:

"Let my good friends and acquaintances, my kith and kin,
hear that the recluse Gotama
together with the Order of monks has been invited [334] by me for a meal on the morrow.

So would you do personal service for me?"

"Yes, good sir,"
and when the friends and acquaintances, the kith and kin of Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic had answered him in assent, some dug pits (for the fire), some chopped sticks,
some washed pots,
some put out jars of water, and some got ready the seats, while Keṇiya himself prepared a pavilion.<sup>7</sup>

Now at that time Sela the brahman was living in Āpaṇa.

He was master of the three Vedas,<sup>8</sup>
versed in the vocabularies and rituals
together with the phonology and exegesis
and the legendary tradition as the fifth;
he was learned in idioms,
a grammarian,
proficient in popular philosophy
and the marks of a Great Man.

He instructed three hundred brahman youths in mantras.

At that time Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic was favourably disposed towards the brahman Sela.

Then as Sela the brahman, surrounded by the three hundred brahman youths, was pacing up and down
and roaming about on foot
he approached the hermitage of Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic.

And in the hermitage of Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic Sela the brahman saw some people digging pits, some chopping sticks,
some washing pots,
some putting out jars of water, and some getting ready the seats, while Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic himself prepared a pavilion.

So he spoke thus to Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic:

"How now, is there to be a marriage<sup>9</sup> at the good Keṇiya's or a giving in marriage, or is a great oblation arranged, or has King Bimbisāra of Magadha been invited for the morrow together with his troops?"

"No, Sela, there is to be no marriage with me nor giving in marriage, nor has King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha been invited for the morrow
together with his troops.

But I have arranged a great oblation: the recluse Gotama,
son of the Sakyans,
gone forth from the Sakyan clan,
who has been walking on tour among the people of Aṅguttarapa,
together with a large Order of monks,
with twelve hundred and fifty monks,
has arrived at Āpaṇa.

The most lovely report has gone abroad thus concerning the recluse Gotama:

'He is indeed Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
endowed with knowledge and (right) conduct,
Well-farer,
knower of the worlds,
the matchless charioteer of men to be tamed,
teacher of devas and mankind,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.

He has been invited by me for the morrow
together with the Order of monks."

[335] "Keṇiya, did you say
'Awakened One'?"

"I did say 'Awakened One,' Sela."

"Keṇiya, did you say 'Awakened One'?"

"I did say 'Awakened One,' Sela."

Then it occurred to the brahman Sela:

"Even this sound 'Awakened One' is hard to come by in the world.

But in our mantras
the thirty-two marks of a Great Man are traditional.

For a Great Man endowed with these, only two courses are open, not another . . .1 But if he goes forth from home into homelessness he becomes a perfected one, a fully Self-Awakened One, a lifter of the world's veil.

For a Great Man
possessed of these
only two courses are open,
not another:10

If he settles in the household state he becomes a king who is a wheel-turner,
a dhamma-man,
a king under dhamma,
the ruler of the whole world,
one who brings stability to his realm;
and he is possessed of the seven Treasures.

These seven Treasures of his are
the wheel-treasure,
the elephant-treasure,
the horse-treasure,
the jewel-treasure,
the woman-treasure,
the householder-treasure,
the adviser-treasure as the seventh.

He will have more than a thousand sons,
valiant,

built on heroic lines,
able to crush opposing armies.

He dwells conquering this sea-girt land by dhamma,
not by stick,
not by sword.

But, if he goes forth from home
into homelessness
he becomes a perfected one,
a fully Self-Awakened One,
a lifter of the world's veil.

And where, good Keṇiya, is this revered Gotama,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
staying at present?"

When this had been said, Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic,
stretching out his right arm,
spoke thus to Sela the brahman:

"There, good Sela, by that dark blue line of forest."

Then Sela the brahman
with the three hundred brahman youths
approached the Lord.

Then Sela the brahman addressed these brahman youths,
saying:

"Come quietly, good sirs, (carefully) placing foot after foot; for, like lone-faring lions,<sup>11</sup> these Lords are hard to approach.

So if I should hold converse with the recluse Gotama, do not interrupt me, good sirs;
but wait for me
until the end of the conversation."

Then Sela the brahman approached the Lord;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the Lord;
having conversed in a friendly and courteous way, he sat down at respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance Sela the brahman looked for the thirty-two marks of a Great Man on the Lord's body.<sup>12</sup>

And Sela the brahman
saw all the thirty-two marks of a Great Man on the Lord's body
except two.

About these two marks of a great man
he was in doubt,
perplexed,
uncertain,
not satisfied -
whether what was cloth-hid was sheath-cased
and whether the tongue was large.

Then it occurred to the Lord:

"This Sela the brahman sees on me all the thirty-two marks of a Great Man

except two.

About these two marks of a Great Man
he is in doubt,
perplexed,
uncertain,
not satisfied:
whether what is cloth-hid is sheath-cased
and whether my tongue is large."

Then the Lord contrived such a contrivance of psychic power that Sela the brahman saw that that which the Lord had cloth-hid was sheath-cased.

Then the Lord,
having put out his tongue,
stroked it backwards and forwards
over both his ears
and he stroked it backwards and forwards
over both his nostrils
and he covered the whole dome of his forehead
with his tongue.

Then it occurred to Sela the brahman:

"The Lord is endowed with the thirty-two marks of a Great Man in full, not partially,
but yet I do not know whether he is an Awakened One or not.

All the same,
I have heard it said
by aged brahmans,
full of years,
teachers of teachers:

'When their own praises are being spoken, those that are perfected ones,
fully Self-Awakened Ones reveal the self.<sup>13</sup>

Suppose [336] that I,
face to face with the recluse Gotama were to praise him in suitable verses?"

Then Sela the brahman,
face to face with the Lord, praised him in suitable verses:

Sela

"Your<sup>14</sup> body is complete,<sup>15</sup> gleaming, finely proportioned,<sup>16</sup> beautiful to behold;
you are the colour of gold, the Lord; lustrous your teeth, you are heroic.
Indeed those distinguishing signs of a finely proportioned man - all these marks of a Great Man are on your body.
Your eyes are clear, the face is full,<sup>17</sup> you are well grown,<sup>18</sup> straight, splendid;
in the midst of an Order of recluses you shine like the sun.
Lovely to see is a monk with a golden coloured skin; but for this recluseship what use is such supremacy of colour?<sup>19</sup> You should be a king, a wheel-turner, a bull of charioteers,<sup>20</sup> victor over the whole world, chief of the Rose-apple Grove.<sup>21</sup> Nobles and wealthy kings will be your vassals; you are king of kings, the lord of men; rule, O Gotama."

[337] Gotama

"I am a king, Sela,
a matchless king under dhamma;
I turn the wheel by dhamma,<sup>22</sup> the wheel that cannot be turned back."

Sela

"Self-Awakened do you profess to be,
'A matchless king under dhamma;
I turn the wheel by dhamma' - thus, Gotama, you speak.
But who is the revered one's captain, the disciple second to the Teacher?
Who turns on this wheel of dhamma
That was set turning by you?"

Gotama

"The wheel set turning by me, Sela,
The matchless wheel of dhamma - Sāriputta<sup>23</sup> turns it on;
he is heir born<sup>24</sup> to the Tathāgata.
What is to be known is known by me, and to be developed developed is, what is to be got rid of has been got rid of - therefore, brahman, am I Awake.<sup>25</sup> Dispel your doubt in me, have faith, brahman.
Ever difficult to come by is the sight of Self-Awakened Ones.
Ever difficult to come by is their appearance in the world.
But I, brahman, am Self-Awakened, a physician without peer, Brahma-become, without compare, crushing Māra's hosts; having mastered all foes I rejoice, with no fear from anywhere."

[338] Sela

"Attend to this, good sirs. As speaks the Visioned One, physician, great hero, so roars the forest-lion.
Seeing him, Brahma-become, without compare, crushing Māra's hosts, who should not have faith - even a base-born black?
Who wishes, let him follow me; or, who wishes it not, let him depart; but I will go forth here under Him of Excellent Wisdom."

Brahmans

"If this teaching of the fully Self-Awakened One is agreeable to your reverence, we too will go forth under Him of Excellent Wisdom."

Sela

"These three hundred brahmans, their palms joined in salutation, are asking to fare the Brahma-faring under you, O Lord."

Gotama

"Well taught<sup>26</sup> is the Brahma-faring, Sela, It is self-realised, it is timeless.
The going forth in it is nothing vain for him who trains diligently."

Sela the brahman and his company received the going forth under the Lord, they received ordination.

Then towards the end of that night,
Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic,
having had sumptuous foods,
solid and soft,
prepared in his own hermitage,
had the time announced to the Lord,
saying:

"It is time, good Gotama,
the meal is ready."

Then the Lord,
dressing in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe,
approached the hermitage of the matted hair ascetic Keṇiya;

having approached,
he sat down on the appointed seat
together with the Order of monks.

Then Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic
with his own hand
served and satisfied the Order of monks
with the Awakened One at its head
with sumptuous foods,
solid and soft.

When the Lord had eaten
and had withdrawn his hand from the bowl, Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic,
taking a low seat,
sat down at a respectful distance.

As Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic was sitting down at a respectful distance, the Lord thanked him in these verses:

"Sacrifice is chief in fire-worship,<sup>27</sup> Sāvitrī chief of Vedic metres, [339] A king is chief of men,
The ocean chief of waters.
The moon is chief of the lamps of night,
The sun the chief of luminaries,
For those giving alms, desiring merit,
The Order is indeed the chief."

When the Lord had thanked the matted hair ascetic Keṇiya in these verses,
rising from his seat,
he departed.

Then the venerable Sela and his company,
dwelling alone,

aloof,
diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
having soon realised here and now
by their own super-knowledge
that matchless goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home
into homelessness,
entering on it
abided therein;
and they knew:

"Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so."

And the venerable Sela and his company became perfected ones.

Then the venerable Sela and his company
approached the Lord;
having approached,
having arranged his upper robe over one shoulder,
having saluted the Lord with joined palms, he addressed the Lord in verses:28

"Eight days ago, O Visioned One, we came to you for refuge; Lord, through your teaching we were tamed in seven nights.
You are the Wake, you the Teacher, you the Seer who is Māra's victor; Having cut out latent tendencies, you, crossed over, help this mortality to cross.
The basis (for rebirth) has been transcended by you, the cankers shattered by you.

A lion are you, without attachment, who has got rid of fear and dread.
These three hundred monks are standing with joined palms-Stretch forth your feet, O Hero, let great beings<sup>29</sup> honour the Teacher."

Discourse with Sela:
The Second

---

<sup>1</sup> The text of this Sutta is not given in M. ii. "as it is identical with that of the same name in the Suttanipata, printed at p. 99 of Prof. Fausböll's edition for the P.T.S. "This Sutta is also printed at p. 102 ff. of Dines Andersen and Helmer Smith's edn. of the Sn., likewise a P.T.S. publication. Cf. Vin. i. 245 ff., D. i. 87 ff.

<sup>2</sup> As in M. Sta. 54.

<sup>3</sup> For notes and references see B.D. iv. 336, n. 10.

<sup>4</sup> As in Sta. 91 (M. ii. 133).

<sup>5</sup> Cf. Vin. i. 248 for Keṇiya's invitation to a meal.

<sup>6</sup> abhippasanna, with the loc. The meaning really amounts to: being well enough pleased with to believe in; feeling very serene with.

<sup>7</sup> maṇḍalamāla. MA. iii. 400 calls it dusamaṇḍala, a cloth (covered) pavilion (?). SnA ii. 447 says "he made a pavilion with a canopy" (or awning).

<sup>8</sup> As at M. ii. 133.

<sup>9</sup> From here to "hard to come by in the world" below, cf. with Vin. ii. 155.

<sup>10</sup> As in Sta. 91 (M. ii. 134).

<sup>11</sup> MA. iii. 401, the solitary lion is watchful and diligent, appamāda. It is to mark the diligent dwelling that this simile is made.

<sup>12</sup> As in Sta. 91 (M. ii. 136).

<sup>13</sup> attānaṃ pātukaronti; cf. Vin. ii. 186, A. iii. 123, i.e. manifest, or make visible, exhibit, bring to light, "betray" (G.S. iii. 98) the self. But in the Buddha's Teaching this is what a foolish person does, e.g. Devadatta, not arahants, and, at D. iii. 115 not the Tathāgata.

<sup>14</sup> Cf. Thag. 818-837, the verses ascribed to Sela, and the responses as below.

<sup>15</sup> I.e. with the full complement of "marks," MA. iii. 402.

<sup>16</sup> sujāta. I have taken this as does Bu.: "well born in regard to excellence of height to breadth, to excellence of form," so as to keep a reference to the "mark" that is "symmetry."

<sup>17</sup> "Like the face of the full moon," MA. iii. 402. Cf. e.g. Suvarṇaprabhāsa Sūtra, Ch. XII (as given in R. Robinson's Chinese Buddhist Verse, London, 1954): "The countenance of the Buddha is like the clear full moon." This is only one of many examples of this simile.

<sup>18</sup> brahā. This also refers to the symmetrical development of height to breadth when the arms are stretched out. The next refers to the limbs being as straight as Brahmā's.

<sup>19</sup> uttamavaṇṇino.

<sup>20</sup> rathesabko. MA. iii. 402 explains by uttamarathī, with v.l. uttamasārathī-sārathī, charioteer, occurring in the stock description of the Buddha. ThagA. ii. 44 (SHB) explains by rathesu ājāniya-usabhapuriso mahārathiko, in regard to chariots he is a thoroughbred bull of a man, a great charioteer.

<sup>21</sup> The same as Jambudīpa, India. ThagA. ii. 44 (SHB) says that a wheel-turner is not merely Lord of Jambudīpa but of the four great "continents" or "islands" as well.

<sup>22</sup> Beginning with the four peerless arousings of mindfulness. The wheel of command is: get rid of this, make that arise. The wheel of dhamma is, beginning with dhamma, as learning, pariyattidhamma; 'This, monks, is the ariyan truth of anguish,' MA. iii. 403.

<sup>23</sup> According to the Comys. Sāriputta was sitting nearby.

<sup>24</sup> anujāta, "taking after" or "born equal to." See Iti. p. 63 for three kinds of children: avajāta, anujāta, atijāta. Here no physical relationship to the Tathāgata is meant, simply "heir in dhamma" as in M. Sta. 12.

<sup>25</sup> This line and the preceding one are also found at M. ii. 143.

<sup>26</sup> MA. iii. 406 says that the use of this phrase means Sela and the three hundred brahmans went forth by the 'Come, bhikkhu' formula.

<sup>27</sup> For notes on these verses, which occur at Vin. i. 246, see B.D. iv. 340.

<sup>28</sup> As at Thag. 838-841.

<sup>29</sup> nāga, as in M. Stas. 5, 24 (M. i. 32, 151).

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
5. Brāhmaṇa Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
5. The Division on Brahmins

93. Discourse with Assalāyana

Assalāyana Sutta

---

Thus have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Now at that time at least five hundred brahmins from a number of districts were residing at Sāvattḥī on some business or other.

Then it occurred to these brahmins:

"This recluse Gotama lays down the purity of the four castes.

Now, who is capable of arguing about this saying with the recluse Gotama?"

At that time the brahman youth Assalāyana was residing at Sāvattḥī.

He was young, his head shaven, sixteen years of age from his birth; he was master of the three Vedas<sup>1</sup> ... proficient in ... the marks of a Great Man.

Then it occurred to these brahmans:

"This brahman youth Assalāyana is residing at Sāvathī.

He is young, his head shaven ... proficient in ... the marks of a Great Man.

He is capable of arguing about this saying with the recluse Gotama."

Then these brahmans approached the brahman youth Assalāyana; having approached, they spoke thus to the brahman youth Assalāyana:

"Good Assalāyana, this recluse Gotama lays down the purity of the four castes; you go, good Assalāyana, and argue about this saying with the recluse Gotama."

When this had been said, Assalāyana the brahman youth spoke thus to those brahmans:

"Truly, sirs, is the recluse Gotama a speaker on dhamma but speakers on dhamma are difficult to argue with.

I am not able to argue about this saying with the recluse Gotama."

And a second time these brahmans spoke thus to the brahman youth Assalāyana:

"Good Assalāyana, this recluse Gotama lays down the purity of the four castes; you go, good Assalāyana, and argue about this saying with the recluse Gotama.

A wanderer's (life) is led by the good Assalāyana."

And a second time Assalāyana the brahman youth spoke thus to those brahmans:

"Truly, sirs, is the recluse Gotama a speaker on dhamma but speakers on dhamma are difficult to argue with.

I am not able to argue about this saying with the recluse Gotama."

[341] And a third time these brahmans spoke thus to the brahman youth Assalāyana:

"Good Assalāyana, this recluse Gotama lays down the purity of the four castes; you go, good Assalāyana, and argue about this saying with the recluse Gotama.

A wanderer's life is led by the good Assalāyana.

Let not the good Assalāyana be defeated in a defeat without resistance."<sup>2</sup>

When this had been said, Assalāyana the brahman youth spoke thus to those brahmans:

"Sirs, truly the recluse Gotama is a speaker on dhamma but speakers on dhamma are difficult to argue with.

I am not able to argue about this saying with the recluse Gotama.

All the same, I will go at the bidding of the reverend ones."

Then Assalāyana the brahman youth together with a large concourse of brahmans approached the Lord; having approached, he exchanged greetings with the Lord; having conversed in a friendly and courteous way, he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Assalāyana the brahman youth spoke thus to the Lord:

"Good Gotama, brahmans speak thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste, all other castes are low; only brahmans form the fair caste, all other castes are dark; only brahmans are pure, not

non-brahmans; only brahmans are own sons of Brahmā, born of his mouth, born of Brahmā, formed by Brahmā, heirs to Brahmā.<sup>3</sup>

What does the good Gotama say about this?"

"But, Assalāyana, brahman wives of brahmans are known<sup>4</sup> to have their seasons and to conceive and to give birth and to give suck.

Yet these brahmans, born of woman like everyone else, speak thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste ... heirs to Brahmā.'

"Although the good Gotama speaks thus, yet brahmans still consider it thus:

'Only brahmans ... heirs to Brahmā.'

"What do you think about this, Assalāyana?"

Have you heard that in Yona<sup>5</sup> and Kamboja<sup>6</sup> and other adjacent districts there are only two castes, the master and the slave?

And that having been [342] a master one becomes a slave; having been a slave one becomes a master?"<sup>7</sup>

"Yes, I have heard this, sir.

In Yona and Kamboja ... having been a slave one becomes a master."

"In reference to this then, Assalāyana, on what strength and authority do brahmans speak thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste ... heirs of Brahmā'?"

"Although the good Gotama speaks thus, yet brahmans still consider it thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste ... heirs to Brahmā.'

"What do you think about this, Assalāyana?"

If a noble made onslaught on creatures, took what had not been given, wrongly enjoyed pleasures of the senses, were a liar, of slanderous speech, of harsh speech, a gossip, covetous, malevolent in mind, of wrong view - would only he at the breaking up of the body after dying arise in the sorrowful way, the bad bourn, the Downfall, Niraya Hell, and not a brahman?

Nor yet a merchant?

And would a worker if he made onslaught on creatures ... were ... of wrong view - would he at the breaking up of the body after dying, arise in the sorrowful way ... Niraya Hell, and not a brahman?"

"This is not so, good Gotama.

If a noble, good Gotama, made onslaught on creatures, took what had not been given ... at the breaking up of the body after dying he would arise in ... Niraya Hell.

And so would a brahman, good Gotama, and so would a merchant, good Gotama, and so would a worker, good Gotama - so good Gotama, if they made onslaught on creatures, took what had not been given ... were ... of wrong view, all the four castes at the breaking up of the body after dying would arise in the sorrowful way, the bad bourn, the Downfall, Niraya Hell."

"In reference to this then, Assalāyana, on what strength and authority do brahmans speak thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste ... heirs of Brahmā'?"

"Although the good Gotama speaks thus, yet brahmans still consider it thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste ... heirs to Brahmā.'"

"What do you think about this, Assalāyana?"

If a brahman [343] refrained from onslaught on creatures, from taking what had not been given, from wrong enjoyment of the sense-pleasures, from being a liar, from slanderous speech, from harsh speech, from being a gossip, were not covetous, were not benevolent in mind and of right view - would only he at the breaking up of the body after dying arise in a good bourn, a heaven world, and not a noble, nor a merchant, nor a worker?"

"That is not so, good Gotama.

If a noble refrained from onslaught on creatures ... were benevolent in mind and of right view, at the breaking up of the body after dying he would arise in a good bourn, a heaven world.

And so would a brahman, good Gotama, and so would a merchant, good Gotama, and so would a worker, good Gotama - so, good Gotama, if they refrained from onslaught on creatures, from taking what had not been given ... were benevolent in mind and of right view, all the four castes at the breaking up of the body after dying would arise in a good bourn, a heaven world."

"In reference to this then, Assalāyana, on what strength and authority do brahmans speak thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste ... heirs to Brahmā'?"

"Although the good Gotama speaks thus, yet brahmans still consider it thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste ... heirs to Brahmā.'"

"What do you think about this, Assalāyana?"

Is it only a brahman who, on this supposition,<sup>8</sup> is capable of developing a mind of friendliness that is without enmity, without malevolence?

And not a noble, not a merchant, not a worker?"

"That is not so, good Gotama.

On this supposition, a noble too, good Gotama, is capable of developing a mind of friendliness that is without enmity, without malevolence; and also a brahman, good Gotama, and also a merchant, good Gotama, and also a worker, good Gotama - so, good Gotama, on this supposition all the four castes are capable of developing a mind of friendliness that is without enmity, without malevolence."

"In reference to this then, Assalāyana, on what strength and authority do brahmans speak thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste ... heirs to Brahmā'?"

"Although the good Gotama speaks thus, yet brahmans still [344] consider it thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste ... heirs to Brahmā.'"

"What do you think about this, Assalāyana?"

Is it only a brahman who, taking a back-scratcher and bath-powder<sup>9</sup> and going to a river, is capable of cleansing himself of dust and mud?

And not a noble, not a merchant, not a worker?"

"That is not so, good Gotama.

A noble too, good Gotama, who, taking a back-scratcher and bath-powder and going to a river, is capable of cleansing himself of dust and mud.

And so is a brahman ... and so is a merchant ... and so is a worker, good Gotama - so, good Gotama, all the four castes, taking a back-scratcher and bath-powder and going to a river, are capable of cleansing themselves of dust and mud."

"In reference to this then, Assalāyana, on what strength and authority do brahmans speak thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste ... heirs to Brahmā?'

"Although the good Gotama speaks thus, yet brahmans still consider it thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste ... heirs to Brahmā.'

"What do you think about this, Assalāyana?

If<sup>10</sup> a noble anointed king were to assemble a hundred men of varying origins, saying to them:

'Let the good sirs come; and let those who are of noble, priestly and royal families, bringing an upper piece of fire-stick<sup>11</sup> of teak<sup>12</sup> or sāl or of a sweet-scented tree<sup>13</sup> or of sandal or lotus, light a fire and get it to give out heat.

But let the good sirs come; and let those who are from a despised family, a trapper family, a bamboo-plaiter family, a cartwright family, a scavenger family,<sup>14</sup> bringing an upper piece of fire-stick from a dog's trough or a pig's trough or from a trough for dyeing or dry sticks from castor-oil shrub, light a fire and get it to give out heat.'

What do you think about this, Assalāyana?

Is the fire that is lit and the heat that is got by someone - no matter whether he be from a noble, priestly or royal family, and no matter whether he bring an upper piece of fire-stick of teak or sāl or of a sweet-scented tree or of sandal or lotus - [345] is it a fire that has flame and hue and brightness<sup>15</sup> and, being this fire, is it able to serve the purposes of a fire?

But is the fire that is lit and the heat that is got by someone - no matter whether he be from a despised family, a trapper family, a bamboo-plaiter family, a cartwright family, a scavenger family, and no matter whether he bring an upper piece of fire-stick from a dog's trough or a pig's trough or from a trough for dyeing or dry sticks from a castor-oil shrub - is it a fire that has neither flame nor hue nor brightness and, being this fire, is it unable to serve the purposes of a fire?"

"That is not so, good Gotama.

Whoever from a noble, priestly or royal family, bringing an upper piece of fire-stick of teak or sāl or of a sweet-scented tree or of sandal or lotus, lights a fire and gets it to give out heat - this fire has flame and hue and brightness and is able to serve the purposes of a fire.

And too, whoever from a despised family, a trapper family, a bamboo-plaiter family, a cartwright family, a scavenger family, bringing an upper piece of fire-stick from a dog's trough or a pig's trough or a trough for dyeing or dry sticks from a castor-oil shrub, lights a fire and gets it to give out heat - this fire too has flame and hue and brightness and is able to serve the purposes of a fire.

So, good Gotama, all these fires have flame and hue and brightness and are able to serve the purposes of a fire."

"In reference to this then, Assalāyana, on what strength and authority do brahmans speak thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste, all other castes are low; only brahmans form the fair caste, all other castes are dark; only brahmans are pure, not non-brahmans; only brahmans are sons of Brahmā, born of his mouth, born of Brahmā, formed by Brahmā, heirs to Brahmā?'

"Although the good Gotama speaks thus, yet brahmans still consider it thus:

'Only brahmans form the best caste ... heirs to Brahmā.'

"What do you think about this, Assalāyana?"

Suppose a noble youth were to consort with a brahman girl and as a result a son were born to them.<sup>16</sup>

Would that son of the noble youth and the brahman girl be like his mother and also like his father, and should he be called 'noble' and also 'brahman'?"

"Whatever son, good Gotama, were born to a noble youth with a brahman girl, he would be like his mother and also like his father, and he should be called 'noble' and also 'brahman.'"

[346] "What do you think about this, Assalāyana?"

Suppose a brahman youth were to consort with a noble girl and as a result a son<sup>17</sup> were born to them.

Would that son ... and should he be called 'noble' and also 'brahman'?"

"Whatever son, good Gotama, were born to a brahman youth and a noble girl, he would be like his mother and also like his father, and he should be called 'noble' and also 'brahman.'"

"What do you think about this, Assalāyana?"

Suppose a mare were mated with an ass and as a result a foal<sup>18</sup> were born of this mating.

Would that foal of the mare and the ass be like the mother and also like the father, and should it be called 'horse' and also 'ass'?"

"Because of its crossed birth,<sup>19</sup> good Gotama, it is a mule.

This good Gotama, is a difference that I see for it, but elsewhere, for the others, I see no difference at all."

"What do you think about this, Assalāyana?"

There might be two brahman youths here, uterine brothers, the one skilled (in the Vedas), educated (in them), the other unskilled, uneducated.

To which of these would brahmans first serve offerings for the dead<sup>20</sup> or cereals or oblations or meals for guests?"

"Good Gotama, brahmans would first serve offerings for the dead or cereals or oblations or meals for guests to that brahman youth who is skilled (in the Vedas), educated (in them).

For, good Gotama, what great fruit could there be of a gift to an unskilled, uneducated (person)?"

"What do you think about this, Assalāyana?"

There might be two brahman youths here, uterine brothers, the one skilled (in the Vedas), educated (in them), but of bad moral habit of evil character, and the other not skilled, uneducated, but of moral habit, lovely in character.

To which of these would brahmans first serve offerings for the dead ... or meals for guests?"

"Good Gotama, brahmans would first serve offerings for the dead ... or meals for guests to that brahman youth who is not skilled (in the Vedas), uneducated (in them), but who is of moral habit, lovely [347] in character.

For, good Gotama, what great fruit could there be of a gift to (a person of) bad moral habit, of evil character?"

"First you, Assalāyana, went on about birth; leaving birth you went on about mantras; leaving mantras you arrived at the purity of the four castes which is just what I lay down."

When this had been said, the brahman youth Assalāyana sat silent, ashamed, his shoulders drooped, his face cast down, overcome with disappointment, at a loss for an answer.

Then the Lord, understanding why Assalāyana the brahman youth was silent, ashamed, his shoulders drooped, his face cast down, overcome with disappointment, at a loss for an answer, spoke thus to Assalāyana the brahman youth:

"Once upon a time,<sup>21</sup> Assalāyana, while seven brahman seers were living in leaf huts in a stretch of forest a pernicious view like this arose in them:

'Only brahmans form the best caste, [155] all other castes are low ... heirs to Brahmā.'

And Assalāyana, the seer Asita Devala<sup>22</sup> heard:

'Indeed seven brahman seers are living in leaf huts in a stretch of forest and a pernicious view like this has arisen in them:

"Only brahmans form the best caste ... heirs to Brahmā."

Then, Assalāyana, the seer Asita Devala, having trimmed his hair and beard, having clothed himself in a pair of crimson coloured cloths, having put on sandals with many linings<sup>23</sup> and taking a staff made of gold, appeared in a cell in a hall<sup>24</sup> of the seven brahman seers.

And then, Assalāyana, as the seer Asita Devala was pacing up and down in the cell in a hall of the seven brahman seers, he spoke thus:

'Now, where have these revered brahman seers gone?

Now, where have these revered brahman seers gone?'

Then, Assalāyana, it occurred to the seven brahman seers:

'Who is it who, while pacing up and down like a village lad<sup>25</sup> in a cell in a hall of the seven brahman [348] seers, speaks thus:

"Now, where have these revered brahman seers gone?

Now, where have these revered brahman seers gone?'"

Then, Assalāyana, the seven brahman seers put a curse on the seer Asita Devala, saying:

'Become a vile cinder.'<sup>26</sup>

But, Assalāyana, the more the seven brahman seers cursed the seer Asita Devala, the more lovely became the seer Asita Devala, the more good to look upon and the more charming.

Then, Assalāyana, it occurred to the seven brahman seers:

'Vain is austerity<sup>27</sup> for us, fruitless the Brahma-faring.

Formerly when we put a curse on anyone, saying:

'Become a vile cinder', he became as a cinder; but the more we put a curse on this one the more lovely he becomes, the more good to look upon, the more charming.'

'Austerity is not vain for the revered ones, nor fruitless the Brahma-faring.

But, revered sirs, please get rid of your misapprehension about me.'

[156] 'We will get rid of whatever misapprehension there is.

But who is the revered sir?'

'Is the seer Asita Devala known to the revered sirs?'

'Yes, sir.'

'I, sirs, am he.'

Then, Assalāyana, the seven brahman seers approached the seer Asita Devala in order to honour him.

Then, Assalāyana, the seer Asita Devala spake thus to those seven brahman seers:

'I have heard this, good sirs:

While seven brahman seers were living in leaf huts in a stretch of forest a pernicious view like this arose in them:

"Only brahmans form the best caste, all other castes are low; only brahmans form the fair caste, all other castes are dark; only brahmans are pure, not non-brahmans; only brahmans are own sons of Brahmā, born of his mouth, born of Brahmā, formed by Brahmā, heirs to Brahmā."

'Yes, sir.'

'But do you, sirs, know whether their mothers consorted only with brahmans, not with non-brahmans?'

'No, sir.'

'And do you, sirs, know whether their mothers' mothers back through seven generations consorted only with brahmans, not with non-brahmans?'

[349] 'No, sir.'

'And do you, sirs, know whether their fathers consorted only with brahman women, not with non-brahman women?'

'No, sir.'

'And do you, sirs, know whether their fathers' fathers back through seven generations consorted only with brahman women, not non-brahman women?'

'No, sir.'

'But do you, sirs, know how there is conception?'

'We do know, sir, how there is conception.'

There is here a coitus of the parents, it is the mother's season and the gandhabba is present;

it is on the conjunction of these three things that there is conception.'<sup>28</sup>

'But do you, sirs, know whether that gandhabba is a noble or brahman or merchant or worker?'

'We do not know, sir, whether that gandhabba is a noble or a brahman or a merchant or a worker.'

'This being so, do you know, sirs, who you are?'

'This being so, sir, we do not know who we are.'

Assalāyana, these seven so called brahman seers, on being questioned, cross-questioned and pressed for an answer by the seer Asita Devala concerning their own claims to lineage were not able to explain.

So how can you, on being questioned, cross-questioned and pressed for an answer by me now explain your own claims to lineage - you who have the same teacher as they have, but not Puṇṇa the holder of the oblation-ladle?"<sup>29</sup>

When this had been said, Assalāyana the brahman youth spoke thus to the Lord:

"It is excellent, good Gotama, it is excellent, good Gotama.

May the good Gotama accept me as a lay-disciple going for refuge from this day forth for as long as life lasts."<sup>30</sup>

Discourse with Assalāyana: The Third

---

<sup>1</sup> As in Sta. 91 (M. ii. 133).

<sup>2</sup> Wanderers preserve the mantras and behave as they have learnt and been taught. Therefore Assalāyana will not be defeated, but will be the victor. MA. iii. 408.

<sup>3</sup> As at M. ii. 84.

<sup>4</sup> Brahman women are seen being led to weddings so as to provide Brahmans with sons, MA. iii. 408.

<sup>5</sup> See DPPN, where "probably the Pali equivalent for Ionians, Bactrian Greeks ... In later times, the name Yavanā and Yonā seems to have included all westerners living in India."

<sup>6</sup> A Mahājanapada belonging not to the Middle Country but to Uttarāpatha.

<sup>7</sup> MA. iii. 409 says that if a Brahman and his wife go trading in adjacent districts he may die there leaving no son, and the wife may have intercourse with a slave or workman. Any son born is a slave, although "pure" on his mother's side. If this son goes to trade in the Middle Country and marries a Brahman girl, any son born will be "pure" only on his mother's side.

<sup>8</sup> asmim padese. The meaning of padesa as "showing, pointing out, decision, appealing to precedent" seems unknown to the Pali Dictionaries. But see Monier-Williams under pra-diś, "to point out, show, announce, communicate," etc.

<sup>9</sup> Cf. M. ii. 46, 182; and cf. MA. iii. 280 with Vin. ii. 106.

<sup>10</sup> As at M. ii. 183.

<sup>11</sup> Cf. M. i. 240.

<sup>12</sup> sākassā vā, as in two versions, and as at M. ii. 183. Cf. also sākakaṭṭham ... sākakaṭṭham at M. ii. 129

<sup>13</sup> salāḷa as at e.g. Budv. II. 51. Translators (Min. Anth. iii. p. 11) say this is probably a pine tree, Pinus Devadars.

<sup>14</sup> For notes on these five kinds of "low birth" see B.D. ii. 173 f.

<sup>15</sup> pabhassara here; ābhā at M. ii. 130.

<sup>16</sup> Cf. D. i. 97.

<sup>17</sup> Cf. D. i. 97.

<sup>18</sup> kusora, with v. 11. kissero, kissaro. Childers gives "colt." Kisora in Sanskrit.

<sup>19</sup> vekurañjāya, with v. 11 kuṇḍam, kumāṇḍu. Neumann (II. 554) says: read vekurānvāya = vaikriyānvayāya.

<sup>20</sup> These four kinds of offerings also mentioned at D. i. 97. The first, "a gift for departed relatives," is saddha.

<sup>21</sup> Before Gotama's birth, MA. iii. 411.

<sup>22</sup> Cf. Jā. iii. 466. MA. iii. 411 says Asita was Kālaka, Devala was his name, and at that time the Lord was he. The name Kālaka probably identifies Asita with Kāla (or Asita) Devala of the Indriya jātaka, Jā. iii. 463 ff. At Mhvu. ii. 37 the seer Asita, who prophesied that the infant Gotama would become a Buddha, calls himself Kāla.

<sup>23</sup> ataliyo, also at S. i. 226; explained at MA. iii. 411, SA. i. 346 by gaṇaṇyaṇa, for which see Vin. i. 185.

<sup>24</sup> patthaṇḍila; MA. iii. 411 explains by paṇṇasālapariveṇa, a cell in a leaf hall.

<sup>25</sup> gānaṇḍala, as at Thag. 1143. MA. iii. 411 explains by gāmadāraka, a village youngster; cf. ThagA. on ver. 1143. There is probably also a hidden idea of "an ox (go) walking round and round on a threshing-floor."

<sup>26</sup> Or, "becoming a cinder, vile one."

<sup>27</sup> tapo, perhaps magical heat produced by ascetic practice. As this was used to reduce one's enemies or opponents to cinders, so here tapo may have the double meaning of austerity (balancing the Brahma-faring) and of power to burn up others.

<sup>28</sup> See M. i. 265-266.

<sup>29</sup> dabbigāha. MA. iii. 412: "Puṇṇa was the name of a benefactor of those seven seers; he took a ladle and cooked paṇṇa, leaves. He knew the art of handling the ladle. But he is not one of their teachers whom you (Assalāyana) also have; therefore you do not even know the art of handling a ladle."

<sup>30</sup> The usual formula for asking to become a lay disciple does not appear to occur here in full. The text does not even give abbreviation or omission marks.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
5. Brāhmaṇa Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
5. The Division on Brahmins

94. Discourse with Ghoṭamukha

Ghoṭamukha Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the venerable Udena was staying near Benares in the Khemiya Mango Grove.

Now at that time
the brahman Ghotamukha had arrived at Benares on some business or other.

Then while the brahman Ghoṭamukha was pacing up and down
and roaming about on foot he approached the Khemiya Mango Grove.

Now at that time
the venerable Udena was pacing up and down in the open.

Then the brahman Ghoṭamukha approached the venerable Udena;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the venerable Udena,
and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he spoke thus,
while still pacing up and down,
to the venerable Udena
while he was still pacing up and down:<sup>1</sup>

"My good recluse,
there is no going forth under dhamma,<sup>2</sup>
or so it seems to me;
but then
is this through not seeing revered men like yourself, or that which,
in this matter,
is dhamma?"

When this had been said,
the venerable Udena came down from the place for pacing up and down, entered a dwelling-place and sat down on an appointed seat.

And the brahman Ghoṭamukha also coming down from the place for pacing up and down and entering the dwelling-place stood at a respectful distance.

The venerable Udena spoke thus to the brahman Ghoṭamukha
as he was standing at a respectful distance:

"Brahman, there are seats; do sit down if you like."

"While waiting for the good Udena we do not sit down.

For how could one like me presume to sit down on a seat before being invited?"

Then the brahman Ghoṭamukha,
having taken a low seat,
sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the brahman Ghoṭamukha spoke thus to the venerable Udena:

"My good recluse,
there is no going forth under dhamma,
or so it seems to me;
but then,
is this through not seeing revered men like yourself,
or that which,
in this matter,
is dhamma?"

[351] "But if you, brahman, could allow what is approved by me, and could reject what should be rejected, and should you not know the meaning of what is said by me were to question me further about it,
saying:

'What is this, good Udena, what is the meaning of that?' - having arranged it like this we might have some conversation."

"I will allow what is approved by the good Udena, and I will reject what should be rejected, and if I do not know the meaning of what is said by the good Udena I will question the honoured Udena further about it,
saying:

'What is this, good Udena,
what is the meaning of that?' -
having arranged it like this let there be some conversation between us."

"Brahman, these four kinds of persons are found in the world.<sup>3</sup>

What four?

As to this, brahman, some person is a self-tormentor,
intent on the practice of self-torment;

as to this, brahman, some person is a tormentor of others,
intent on the practice of tormenting others;

as to this, brahman, some person is both a self-tormentor, intent on the practice of tormenting self,
and a tormentor of others,
intent on the practice of tormenting others;

as to this, brahman, some person is neither a self-tormentor, not intent on the practice of self-torment,
nor a tormentor of others,
not intent on the practice of tormenting others.

He, neither a self-tormentor
nor a tormentor of others,
is here-now allayed,
quenched,
become cool,

an experiencer of bliss
that lives with self Brahma-become.

Of these four persons, brahman, which appeals to your mind?"

"Now, revered sir, that person who is a self-tormentor, intent on the practice of self-torment -
that person does not appeal to my mind.

And, revered sir, that person who is a tormentor of others,
intent on the practice of tormenting others -
neither does that person appeal to my mind.

And, revered sir, that person who is a self-tormentor,
intent on the practice of self-torment,
and who is also a tormentor of others,
intent on the practice of tormenting others -
neither does that person appeal to my mind.

But, good Udena, whatever person is neither a self-tormentor,
intent on the practice of self-torment,
nor a tormentor of others,
intent on the practice of tormenting others,
he, neither a self-tormentor
nor a tormentor of others,
is here-now allayed,
quenched,
become cool,
an experiencer of bliss
that lives with self Brahma-become.

He does not mortify or torment
either himself or others - (all of them)

yearning for happiness and recoiling from pain.

Therefore this person appeals to my mind."

---

"Brahman, there are these two companies.<sup>4</sup>

Which two?

Here, brahman, some company, inflamed with a passion for gems and jewellery,<sup>5</sup> looks about for a wife and children, men and women slaves,
fields and sites,
gold and silver.

But here, brahman, some company, not inflamed with a passion for gems and jewellery,
getting rid of wife and children,
men and women slaves,
fields and sites,
gold and silver,
goes forth from home into homelessness.

This person, brahman, neither torments himself nor is intent on the practice of self-torment, he is not a tormentor of others nor intent on the practice of tormenting others.

He, neither a self-tormentor
nor a tormentor of others,
is here-now allayed,
quenched,
become cool,
an experiencer of bliss
that lives with self Brahma-become.

In which company do you, brahman, mostly see that man -
in that company that is inflamed with a passion for gems and jewellery
and looks about for a wife and children,
men and women slaves,
fields and sites,
gold and silver;
or in that company
that is not inflamed with a passion for gems and [352] jewellery and that,
getting rid of wife and children,
men and women slaves,
fields and sites,
gold and silver,
goes forth from home into homelessness?"

"This man, good Udena, who is neither a tormentor of self intent on the practice of tormenting self,
who is not a tormentor of others
intent on the practice of tormenting others,
and who, neither a self-tormentor
nor a tormentor of others,
is here-now allayed,
quenched,
become cool,

an experiencer of bliss
that lives with self Brahma-become -
I mostly see that man in that company that is not inflamed with a passion for gems and jewellery
and that, getting rid of wife and children,
men and women slaves,
fields and sites,
gold and silver,
goes forth from home into homelessness."

"But this was said by you just now, brahman:

'We understand thus, good recluse,
there is no going forth under dhamma,
or so it seems to me;
but then,
is this through not seeing revered men like yourself,
or that which,
in this matter,
is dhamma?"

"Good Udena, these words spoken to me are certainly helpful.

There is a going forth under dhamma, or so it (now) seems to me, and so may the good Udena understand me.

---

But it would be good
if, out of compassion, the good Udena would explain to me in full these four kinds of persons that he has spoken of in brief but not explained in full."

"Well then, brahman, listen, attend carefully
and I will speak."

"Yes, sir,"
the brahman Ghoṭamukha answered the venerable Udena in assent.

The venerable Udena spoke thus:

"And which, brahman,
is the person who torments self and is intent on the practice of self-torment?"

Here, brahman, some person is unclothed, flouting life's decencies,<sup>6</sup> licking his hands (after meals), not one to come when asked to do so,
not one to stand still when asked to do so.

He does not consent (to accept food) offered to (me) or specially prepared for (him) nor to (accept) an invitation (to a meal).

He does not accept (food) straight from a cooking pot or pan, nor within the threshold, nor among the faggots,
nor among the rice-pounders, nor when two people were eating, nor from a pregnant woman, nor from one giving suck, nor from one co-habiting with a man, nor from gleanings,
nor near where a dog is standing,

nor where flies are swarming, nor fish,
nor meat.

He drinks neither fermented liquor nor spirits
nor rice-gruel.

He is a one-house-man,
a one-piece-man,
or a two-house-man,
a two-piece-man or a three-house-man, a three-piece-man or a four-house-man, a four-piece-man or a five-house-man, a five-piece-man or a six-house-man, a six-piece-man or a seven-house-man, a seven-piece-man.

He subsists on one little offering, and he subsists on two little offerings and he subsists on three little offerings and he subsists on four little offerings and he subsists on five little offerings and he subsists on six little offerings and he subsists on seven little offerings.

He takes food only once a day, and once in two days and once in three days and once in four days and once in five days and once in six days

and once in seven days.

He lives intent on the practice of eating rice at regular fort-nightly intervals.

He comes to be one feeding on potherbs or feeding on millet or on wild rice or on snippets of skin or on water-plants
or on the red powder of rice husks or on the discarded scum of rice on the boil or on the flour of oil-seeds or grass or cowdung.

He is one who subsisted on forest roots and fruits, eating the fruits that had fallen.

He wares coarse hempen cloths, and he wares mixed cloths,
and he wares cerements,
and he wares rags taken from the dust heap, and he wares tree-bark fibre, and he wares antelope skins, and he wares strips of antelope skin, and he wares cloths of kusa-grass, and he wares cloths of bark, and he wares cloths of wood shavings, and he wares a blanket of human hair, and he wares a blanket of animal hair, and he wares owls' feathers.

He is one who plucks out the hair of his head and beard, intent on the practice of plucking out the hair of head and beard.

He becomes one who stands upright, refusing a seat;
He becomes one who squats on his haunches, intent on the practice of squatting.

He becomes one for covered thorns, making his bed on covered thorns;
and he is intent on the practice of going down to the water to bathe up to three times in an evening.

Thus in many a way does he live intent on the practice of mortifying and tormenting his body.

Brahman, this is called the person who is a self-tormentor, intent on the practice of self-torment.

---

And which, brahman,
is the person who is a tormentor of others,
intent on the practice of tormenting others?

In this case, brahman,
some person is a cattle-butcher, or a pig-killer,
fowler,

deer-stalker,
hunter,
fisherman,
thief,
executioner,
jailer,
or (one of) those others who follow a bloody calling.

This is the person, brahman, who is called a tormentor of others,
intent on the practice of tormenting others.

---

And which, brahman,
is the person who is both a self-tormentor,
intent on the practice of tormenting self,
and also a tormentor of others,
intent on the practice of tormenting others?

In this case, brahman,
some person is a noble anointed king or a very rich brahman.

He, having had a new conference hall built to the east of the town, having had his head and beard shaved, having put on a shaggy skin, having smeared his body with ghee and oil, scratching his back with a deer-horn, enters the conference hall together with his chief consort and a brahman priest.

Then he lies down to sleep on the bare grassy ground.

The king lives on the milk from one udder of a cow that has a calf of like colour, his chief consort lives on the milk from the second udder, the brahman priest lives on the milk from the third udder, the milk from the fourth udder they offer to the fire;
the calf lives on what is over.

He speaks thus:

'Let so many bulls be slain for the sacrifice, let so many steers be slain for the sacrifice, let so many heifers be slain for the sacrifice, let so many goats be slain for the sacrifice, let so many rams be slain for the sacrifice, let so many trees be felled for the sacrificial posts, let so much kusa-grass be reaped for the sacrificial spot.'

Those who are called his slaves or messengers
or workpeople,
they, scared of the stick,
scared of danger,
with tearful faces and crying, set about their preparations.

This, brahman, is called the person who is both a self-tormentor,
intent on the practice of self-torment,
and a tormentor of others,
intent on the practice of tormenting others.

---

And which, brahman, is the person who is neither a self-tormentor,
not intent on the practice of self-torment,
nor a tormentor of others,
not intent on the practice of tormenting others,
and who, neither a self-tormentor
nor a tormentor of others,
is here-now allayed,
quenched,
become cool,
an experiencer of bliss
that lives with self Brahma-become?

Here, brahman, a Tathāgata arises in the world, a perfected one,
a fully Self-awakened one
endowed with right knowledge and conduct,
well-farer,
knower of the worlds,
the matchless charioteer of men to be tamed,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.

He makes known this world
with the devas,
with Māra,
with Brahmā,
creation
with its recluses and brahmins,
its devas and men,
having realised them by his own super-knowledge.

He teaches dhamma which is lovely at the beginning,
lovely in the middle,
lovely at the ending,
with the spirit and the letter;
he proclaims the Brahma-faring
wholly fulfilled,
quite purified.

A householder
or a householder's son
or one born in another family
hears that dhamma.

Having heard that dhamma,
he gains faith in the Tathāgata.

Endowed with this faith
that he has acquired,
he reflects in this way:

'The household life is confined and dusty;
going forth is of the open;
it is not easy for one who lives in a house
to fare the Brahma-faring
wholly fulfilled,
wholly pure,
polished like a conch-shell.

Suppose now that I,
having cut off hair and beard,
having put on saffron robes,
should go forth from home
into homelessness?'

After a time,
getting rid of his wealth,
be it small or great,

getting rid of his circle of relations,
be it small or great,
having cut off his hair and beard,
having put on saffron robes,
he goes forth from home
into homelessness.

He, being thus one who has gone forth
and who is endowed with the training
and the way of living of monks,
abandoning onslaught on creatures,
is one who abstains from onslaught on creatures;
the stick laid aside,
the knife laid aside,
he lives kindly,
scrupulous,
friendly
and compassionate
towards all breathing things and creatures.

Abandoning the taking of what is not given,
he is one who abstains from taking what is not given;
being one who takes (only) what is given,
who waits for what is given,
not by stealing he lives with a self become pure.

Abandoning unchastity,
he is one who is chaste,
keeping remote (from unchastity),
abstaining from dealings with women.

Abandoning lying speech,
he is one who abstains from lying speech,
a truth-speaker,
a bondsman to truth,
trustworthy,

dependable,
no deceiver of the world.

Abandoning slanderous speech,
he is one who abstains from slanderous speech;
having heard something here
he is not one for repeating it elsewhere
for (causing) variance among these (people),
or having heard something elsewhere
he is not one to repeat it there
for (causing) variance among these (people).

In this way
he is a reconciler of those who are at variance,
and one who combines those who are friends.

Concord is his pleasure,
concord his delight,
concord his joy,
concord is the motive of his speech.

Abandoning harsh speech,
he is one who abstains from harsh speech.

Whatever speech is gentle,
pleasing to the ear,
affectionate,
going to the heart,
urbane,
pleasant to the manyfolk,
agreeable to the manyfolk -
he comes to be one who utters speech like this.

Abandoning frivolous chatter,
he is one who abstains from frivolous chatter.

He is a speaker at a right time,
a speaker of fact,
a speaker on the goal,
a speaker on dhamma,
a speaker on discipline,
he speaks words that are worth treasuring,
with similes at a right time
that are discriminating,
connected with the goal.

He comes to be one who abstains
from what involves destruction to seed-growth,
to vegetable growth.

He comes to be one who eats one meal a day,
refraining at night,
abstaining from eating at a wrong time.

He comes to be one who abstains
from watching shows of dancing,
singing,
music.

He comes to be one who abstains
from using garlands,
scents,
unguents,
adornments,
finery.

He comes to be one who abstains
from using high beds,
large beds.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting gold and silver.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting raw grain.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting raw meat.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting women and girls.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting women slaves and men slaves.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting goats and sheep.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting fowl and swine.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting elephants, cows, horses, mares.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting fields and sites.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting messages or going on such.

He comes to be one who abstains from buying and selling.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting from cheating with weights.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting from cheating with bronzes.

He comes to be one who abstains
from cheating with measures.

He comes to be one who abstains
from the crooked ways of bribery, fraud and deceit.

He comes to be one who abstains
from maiming, murdering, manacling, highway robbery.

He comes to be contented
with the robes for protecting his body,
with the almsfood for sustaining his stomach.

Wherever he goes
he takes these things with him as he goes.

As a bird on the wing
wherever it flies
takes its' wings with it as it flies,
so a monk,
contented with the robes for protecting his body,
with the almsfood for sustaining his stomach,
wherever he goes
takes these things with him as he goes.

He, possessed of the ariyan body of moral habit,
subjectively experiences unsullied well-being.

Having seen a material shape with the eye,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of sight uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of sight,
he comes to control over the organ of sight.

Having heard a sound with the ear,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of hearing uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of hearing,
he comes to control over the organ of hearing.

Having smelt a smell with the nose,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of smell uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of smell,
he comes to control over the organ of smell.

Having savoured a taste with the tongue,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of taste uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of taste,

he comes to control over the organ of taste.

Having felt a touch with the body,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of touch uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of touch,
he comes to control over the organ of touch.

Having cognised a mental object with the mind,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he lives with this organ of mind uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of mind,
he comes to control over the organ of mind.

If he is possessed of this ariyan control of the (sense-) organs,
he subjectively experiences unsullied well-being.

Whether he is setting out
or returning,
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is looking down
or looking round,
he is one who comports himself properly;

whether he is bending back
or stretching out (his arm),
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is carrying his outer cloak,
his bowl,
his robe,
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is munching,
drinking,
eating,
savouring,
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is obeying the calls of nature,
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is walking,
standing,
asleep,
awake,
talking,
silent,
he is one who comports himself properly.

Possessed of this ariyan body of moral habit
and possessed of this ariyan control of the (sense-) organs
and possessed of this ariyan mindfulness
and clear consciousness,
he chooses a remote lodging in a forest,
at the root of a tree,
on a mountain slope,
in a wilderness,
in a hill-cave,
in a cemetery,
in a forest haunt,
in the open
or on a heap of straw.

He, returning from alms-gathering
after his meal,
sits down cross-legged
holding the back erect,
having made mindfulness
rise up in front of him.

He, having got rid of covetousness for the world,
lives with a mind devoid of coveting,
he purifies the mind of coveting.

By getting rid of the taint of ill-will,
he lives benevolent in mind;
and compassionate for the welfare
of all creatures and beings,
he purifies the mind of the taint of ill-will.

By getting rid of sloth and torpor,
he lives devoid of sloth and torpor;
perceiving the light,
mindful and clearly conscious,
he purifies the mind of sloth and torpor.

By getting rid of restlessness and worry,
he lives calmly,
the mind subjectively tranquillised,
he purifies the mind of restlessness and worry.

By getting rid of doubt,
he lives doubt-crossed;
unperplexed as to the states that are skilled,
he purifies his mind of doubt.

He, by getting rid of these five hindrances - defilements of a mind and weakening to intuitive wisdom -
aloof from pleasure of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,

enters and abides in the first meditation,
which is accompanied by initial thought and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness
and is rapturous and joyful.

And again, brahman, a monk,
by allaying initial and discursive thought,
his mind subjectively tranquillised
and fixed on one point,
enters on
and abides in
the second meditation
which is devoid of initial and discursive thought,
is born of concentration
and is rapturous and joyful.

And again, brahman, a monk,
by the fading out of rapture,
dwells with equanimity,
attentive and clearly conscious,
and experiences in his person
that joy of which the ariyans say:
'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,'
and he enters on
and abides in
the third meditation.

And again, brahman, a monk
by getting rid of joy,
by getting rid of anguish,
by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows,
enters on
and abides in
the fourth meditation
which has neither anguish nor joy,

and which is entirely purified
by equanimity and mindfulness.

Thus with the mind composed,
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
stable,
immovable,
he directs his mind
to the knowledge and recollection of former habitations.

He recollects a variety of former habitations, thus:

One birth,
two births,
three births,
four births,
five births,
ten births,
twenty births,
thirty births,
forty births,
fifty births,
a hundred births,
a thousand births,
a hundred thousand births,
and many an eon of integration
and many an eon of disintegration
and many an eon of integration-disintegration:

'Such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,

so I was nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I came to be in another state where I was such a one by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so I was nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I arose here.'

Thus he recollects divers former habitations
in all their modes and detail.

■

With the mind composed thus,
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
stable,
immovable,
he directs his mind
to the knowledge of the passing hence
and the arising of beings.

With the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men,
he sees beings as they pass hence
or come to be;

he comprehends that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going,
according to the consequences of deeds,
and thinks:

'Indeed these worthy beings
who were possessed of wrong conduct in body,
speech
and thought,
scoffers at the ariyans,
holding a wrong view,
incurring deeds consequent on a wrong view -
these, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a sorrowful state,
a bad bourn,
the abyss,
Niraya Hell.

But these worthy beings
who were possessed of good conduct in body,
speech
and thought,
who did not scoff at the ariyans,
holding a right view,
incurring deeds consequent on a right view -
these at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.'

Thus with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
does he see beings as they pass hence,

as they arise;
he comprehends that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going
according to the consequences of deeds.

■

With the mind composed thus,
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
stable,
immovable,
he directs his mind
to the knowledge of the destruction of the cankers.

He comprehends as it really is:

'This is anguish',
'this is the arising of anguish',
'this is the stopping of anguish',
'this is the course leading to the stopping of anguish'.

He comprehends as it really is:

'These are the cankers',
'this is the arising of the cankers',
'this is the stopping of the cankers',
'this is the course leading to the stopping of the cankers'.

Knowing thus,
seeing thus,
his mind is freed from the canker of sense-pleasures
and his mind is freed from the canker of becoming
and his mind is freed from the canker of ignorance.

In freedom the knowledge comes to be:

'I am freed';
and he comprehends:

'Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.'

This, brahman, is called the person who is neither a self-tormentor intent on the practice of tormenting self,
nor a tormentor of others
intent on the practice of tormenting others.

He, neither a self-tormentor
nor a tormentor of others,
is here-now allayed,
quenched,
become cool,
an experiencer of bliss
that lives with self Brahma-become."

When this had been said Ghoṭamukha the brahman spoke thus,
to the venerable Udena:

"Excellent, good Udena,
excellent, good Udena.

It is as if, good Udena, one might set upright what had been upset,<sup>7</sup>
or might disclose what was covered,
or point out the way
to one who had gone astray,
or might bring an [353] oil-lamp into the darkness
so that those with vision might see material shapes -
even so is dhamma made clear in many a figure by the good Udena.

I am going to the revered Udena for refuge,
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the revered Udena accept me
as a lay-follower,
one gone for refuge from today forth
for as long as life lasts."

"But do not you, brahman, go for refuge to me.

You must go only to that Lord for refuge to whom I have gone for refuge."

"But where, good Udena, is this revered Gotama staying now,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One?"

"Brahman, this Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
has now attained final nibbāna."

"Good Udena, if we should hear that that honoured<sup>8</sup> Gotama were ten yojana distant, we should go the ten yojana so as to see that honoured Gotama,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One;
if we should hear that that honoured Gotama were twenty yojana distant, we should go the twenty yojana
so as to see that honoured Gotama,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One;
if we should hear that that honoured Gotama were thirty yojana distant, we should go the thirty yojana
so as to see that honoured Gotama,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One;
if we should hear that that honoured Gotama were forty yojana distant, we should go the forty yojana
so as to see that honoured Gotama,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One;
if we should hear that that honoured Gotama were fifty yojana distant, we should go the fifty yojana
so as to see that honoured Gotama,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

And, good Udena,
even if we heard that the honoured Gotama,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One
were a hundred yojana distant,
we should go the hundred yojana
so as to see that honoured Gotama,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

But, good Udena, since that revered<sup>9</sup> Gotama has attained final nibbāna, we are going for refuge to that honoured Gotama who has attained final nibbāna
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the revered Udena accept me as a lay-follower
going for refuge
from today forth
for as long as life lasts.

And, good Udena,
the king of Aṅga daily gives me a regular supply of alms,<sup>10</sup> so I am giving the good Udena one of these regular supplies of alms."

"But what, brahman, does the king of Aṅga give you daily as a regular supply of alms?" "Five hundred kahāpaṇa, good Udena."

"But, brahman, it is not allowable for us to receive gold and silver."<sup>11</sup>

"If it is not allowable to the good Udena, I will have a dwelling-place built for the good Udena."

"If you, brahman, wish to have a dwelling-place built for me, do have an assembly hall built for the Order at Pāṭaliputta."

"I am even more delighted and pleased with the good Udena that he urges me to make a gift to the Order.

So I, good Udena, will [354] have an assembly hall built for the Order at Pāṭaliputta from this regular supply of alms and from subsequent supplies of alms."

Then Ghoṭamukha the brahman from this regular supply of alms and from subsequent supplies of alms had an assembly hall built for the Order at Pāṭaliputta.

At the present time it is called Ghotamukhī.

Discourse with Ghoṭamukha:
The Fourth

---

<sup>1</sup> Following the v.l. caṅkamantaṃ, instead of text's ekamantaṃ.

<sup>2</sup> dhammiko paribbājo, explained by dhammikā pabbajjā at MA. iii. 412.

<sup>3</sup> As at M. 1. 341, above, p. 5 ff.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. A. i. 70-76.

<sup>5</sup> maṇikuṇḍalesu; perhaps jewelled earrings; cf. M. ii. 64. Also see S. i. 77 = Dhp. 345, 346 = Jā. ii. 140 for the sentiment expressed in the first half of this paragraph, and Thag. 187.

<sup>6</sup> As at M. i. 343 to 349; see above, p. 7 to p. 14.

<sup>7</sup> From here to the second request to be accepted as a lay disciple, cf. M. ii. 90.

<sup>8</sup> bhavantaṃ.

<sup>9</sup> bhavam.

<sup>10</sup> niccabhikkhā, alms as a permanent or constant gift.

<sup>11</sup> Nissag. XVIII, see Vin. iii. 236 ff.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
5. Brāhmaṇa Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
5. The Division on Brahmins

95. Discourse with Caṅkī<sup>1</sup>

Caṅkī Sutta

---

Thus have I heard:

At one time the Lord, walking on tour among the Kosalans together with a large Order of monks, arrived at a brahman village of the Kosalans called Opasāda.

While he was there near Opasāda the Lord stayed to the north of Opasāda in the Devas' Grove, the Sāl Grove.<sup>2</sup>

At that time in Opasāda – a place teeming with life, (a place of) grass, wood and water and of corn, in fief to the King – there dwelt the brahman Caṅkī as overlord, on a royal gift, a gift with full powers<sup>3</sup> that had been made to him by King Pasenadi of Kosala.

Then the brahman householders of Opasāda heard:

"Verily the recluse Gotama ...<sup>4</sup>... Good indeed is the sight of perfected ones like this."

Then the brahman householders of Opasāda, having set forth from Opasāda, went in companies, crowds and groups by the northern entrance to the Devas' Grove, the Sāl Grove.

At that time the brahman Caṅkī was lying down in the upper part of the palace during the heat of the day.

And the barman Caṅkī saw the brahman householders of Opasāda who, [355] having set forth from Opasāda, were going in companies, crowds and groups by the northern entrance to the Devas' Grove the Sāl Grove; and seeing them, he addressed an adviser, saying:

"Why, good adviser, do the brahman householders of Opasāda, having set forth from Opasāda, go in companies, crowds and groups by the northern entrance to the Devas' Grove, the Sāl Grove?"

"There is, good Caṅkī, the recluse Gotama, a son of the Sakyans, gone forth from a Sakyan family ...<sup>5</sup> an Awakened One, a Lord.

These are approaching this honoured Gotama."

"Well then, good adviser, approach the brahman householders of Opasāda; having approached, speak thus to the brahman householders of Opasāda:

'Sirs, the brahman Caṅkī speaks thus:

Please let the revered ones wait; Caṅkī the brahman will also approach to see the recluse Gotama."

"Yes, sir," and when that adviser had answered the brahman Caṅkī [165] in assent, he approached the brahman householders of Opasāda; having approached, he spoke thus to the brahman householders of Opasāda:

"Sirs, the brahman Caṅkī speaks thus:

Please let the revered ones wait; Caṅkī the brahman will also approach to see the recluse Gotama."

Now at that time at least five hundred brahmans from various brahman districts<sup>6</sup> were residing at Opasāda on some business or other.

These brahmans heard that the brahman Caṅkī would approach to see the recluse Gotama.

Then these brahmans approached the brahman Caṅkī; having approached, they spoke thus to the brahman Caṅkī:

"Is it indeed true that the good Caṅkī will approach to see the recluse Gotama?"

"That is my intention,<sup>7</sup> sirs; I will approach to see the recluse Gotama."

"Do not, good Caṅkī, approach to see the recluse Gotama.

It is not right<sup>8</sup> that the good Caṅkī should approach to see the recluse Gotama; it is right that the recluse Gotama should himself approach to see the honoured Caṅkī.

For the good Caṅkī is of pure birth on both sides, of pure descent from his mother and father back through seven generations, unchallenged, irreproachable in respect of birth.<sup>9</sup>

And because the good Caṅkī is of pure birth on both sides ... [356] irreproachable in respect of birth, that is a reason why it is not right for the good Caṅkī to approach to see the recluse Gotama; it is right that the recluse Gotama should himself approach to see the honoured Caṅkī.

For the good Caṅkī is prosperous, very wealthy, very rich.

Then, the good Caṅkī is master of the three Vedas, versed in the vocabularies and rituals together with the phonology and exegesis and the legendary tradition as the fifth; he is learned in idioms, a grammarian, proficient in popular philosophy and the marks of a Great Man.

Then the good Caṅkī is lovely, good to look upon, charming, possessed of the greatest beauty of complexion, of a sublime colour,<sup>10</sup> a sublime stature,<sup>11</sup> stately in appearance.

Then the good Caṅkī is of moral habit, one who has grown in moral habit, he is possessed<sup>12</sup> of a moral habit that has grown.<sup>13</sup>

Then the good Caṅkī has a lovely voice, a lovely delivery, he is possessed of urbane speech, distinct, not mumbling, he is able to make his meaning clear.

Then the good Caṅkī, the teacher of many teachers, instructs three hundred brahman youths in mantras.

Then the good Caṅkī is respected revered, esteemed, venerated by King Pasenadi of Kosala.

Then the good Caṅkī is respected ... venerated by the brahman Pokkharasāti.<sup>14</sup>

Then the good Caṅkī dwells as overlord in Opasāda – a place teeming with life, (a place of) grass, wood and water ... on a royal gift, a gift with full powers that has been made to him by King Pasenadi of Kosala.

And because the good Caṅkī dwells as overlord ... on a gift with full powers that has been made to him by King Pasenadi of Kosala, this is a reason why it is not right for the good Caṅkī to approach to see the recluse Gotama; it is right that the recluse Gotama should himself approach to see the honoured Caṅkī."

When this had been said, the brahman Caṅkī spoke thus to those brahmins:

"Well then, sirs, hear from me why it is right that we ourselves should go to see the honoured Gotama and why it is not right that the revered Gotama should himself come to see us.

Indeed, sirs, the recluse Gotama is of pure birth on both sides, of pure descent [357] from his mother and father back through seven generations, unchallenged, irreproachable in respect of birth.

And because the recluse Gotama is of pure birth on both sides ... irreproachable in respect of birth, this is a reason why it is not right for the good Gotama to come to see us, while it is right that we ourselves should go to see the honoured Gotama.

Indeed the recluse Gotama has gone forth giving up an abundance of unwrought and wrought gold<sup>15</sup> both in the ground and above it.<sup>16</sup>

Indeed, sirs, the recluse Gotama while he was a young man with lovely coal-black hair, endowed with radiant youth, in the prime of his life, went forth from home into homelessness.

Indeed, sirs, although his parents were unwilling and tears poured down their cheeks the recluse Gotama, having cut off his hair and beard and donned saffron robes, went forth from home into homelessness.

Indeed, sirs, the recluse Gotama is lovely, good to look upon, charming, possessed of the greatest beauty of complexion, [167] of a sublime colour, a sublime stature, stately in appearance.

Indeed, sirs, the recluse Gotama is of moral habit, one who is ariyan in moral habit, one who is skilled in moral habit, possessed of a moral habit that is skilled.

Indeed, sirs, the recluse Gotama has a lovely voice, a lovely delivery, he is possessed of urbane speech, distinct, not mumbling, he is able to make his meaning clear.

Indeed, sirs, the recluse Gotama is the teacher of many teachers.

Indeed, sirs, the recluse Gotama has destroyed attachment to sense-pleasures, has put away frivolity.<sup>17</sup>

Indeed, sirs, the recluse Gotama teaches kamma, teaches effective kamma,<sup>18</sup> desiring no evil for the brahman race.<sup>19</sup>

Indeed, sirs, the recluse Gotama has gone forth from a distinguished family, a leading noble family.<sup>20</sup>

Indeed, sirs, the recluse Gotama has gone forth from a prosperous family, very wealthy, very rich.

Indeed, sirs, (people) come from distant kingdoms, distant regions to question the recluse Gotama.

Indeed, sirs, various thousands of devatās have gone to the recluse Gotama for refuge for breathing things.

Indeed, sirs, a lovely report has gone abroad concerning the recluse Gotama:

He [358] is indeed Lord, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, endowed with knowledge and (right) conduct, Well-farer, knower of the worlds, the matchless charioteer of men to be tamed, teacher of devas and mankind, the Awakened One, the Lord.

Indeed, sirs, the recluse Gotama is endowed with the thirty-two marks of a Great Man.

Indeed, sirs, King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha with his wife and children has gone to the recluse Gotama for refuge for breathing things.

Indeed, sirs, King Pasenadi of Kosala with his wife and children has gone to the recluse Gotama for refuge for breathing things.

Indeed, sirs, the brahman Pokkharasāti with his wife and children has gone to the recluse Gotama for refuge for breathing things.

Indeed, sirs, the recluse Gotama has arrived at Opasāda and is staying near Opasāda, to the north, in the Devas' Grove, the Sāl Grove.

Whatever recluses and brahmans come to our villages or fields, they are our guests.

And guests must be revered, revered, esteemed, honoured by us.

So, sirs, because the recluse Gotama has arrived at Opasāda and is staying near Opasāda, to the north, in the Devas' Grove, the Sāl Grove, the recluse Gotama is our guest.

The guest must be revered, revered, esteemed and honoured by us.

This too is a reason why it is not right that the revered Gotama should come and see us.

But it is right that we ourselves should go and see the honoured Gotama.

To this extent I, sirs, know the good Gotama's splendour,<sup>21</sup> but this is not the (full) extent of the good Gotama's splendour – immeasurable is the splendour of the good Gotama.

It is not right that the good Gotama, possessed as he is of each one of these qualities, should come to see us.

But it is right that we ourselves should go to see the honoured Gotama.

Well then, sirs, all of us will go ourselves to see the recluse Gotama."

Then the brahman Caṅkī together with a large group of brahmans approached the Lord; having approached, he exchanged greetings with the Lord; and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way, he sat down at a respectful distance.

Now at that time the Lord was sitting down talking in a courteous way on this topic and that with a number of venerable brahmans.

Now at that time a brahman youth called Kāpaṭhika, young, with shaven head, sixteen years of age since his birth, master of the three Vedas, versed in the vocabularies and rituals together with the phonology and exegesis with the legendary tradition as the fifth; learned in idioms, a grammarian, proficient in popular philosophy and the marks of a Great Man, was [359] sitting down in that company.

At intervals he interrupted the conversation that the Lord was holding with the venerable brahmans.

Then the Lord reprimanded the brahman youth Kāpaṭhika, saying:

"Do not let the venerable Bhāradvāja interrupt at intervals the conversation being held with the venerable brahmans: let the venerable Bhāradvāja wait until the end of the conversation."

When this had been said the brahman Caṅkī spoke thus to the Lord:

"Do not let the good Gotama reprimand the brahman youth Kāpaṭhika.

The brahman youth Kāpaṭhika is a young man of a respectable family, and the brahman youth Kāpaṭhika is very learned, and the brahman youth Kāpaṭhika has a lovely delivery, and clever is the brahman youth Kāpaṭhika, and the brahman youth Kāpaṭhika is capable of arguing about this speech together with the good Gotama."

Then it occurred to the Lord:

"Certainly, [169] the brahman youth Kāpaṭhika must be 'finished'<sup>22</sup> in the threefold Vedic lore since brahmans honour him."

Then it occurred to the brahman youth Kāpaṭhika:

"If the recluse Gotama catches my eye, then I will ask the recluse Gotama a question."

Then the Lord, knowing with his mind the reasoning in the mind of the brahman youth Kāpaṭhika, caught his eye.

Then it occurred to the brahman youth Kāpaṭhika:

"The recluse Gotama is paying respect to me.

Suppose I were to ask the recluse Gotama a question?"

Then the brahman youth Kāpaṭhika spoke thus to the Lord:

"Good Gotama, that which is an ancient mantra<sup>23</sup> of the brahmans according hearsay and tradition, according to the authority of the collections<sup>24</sup> and in regard to which brahmans inevitably come to the conclusion:

'This alone is the truth, all else is falsehood' – what does the good Gotama say about this?"

"But, Bhāradvāja, is there even one brahman among them who speaks thus:

'I know this, I see this: this alone is the truth, all else is falsehood'?"

"No, good Gotama."

"But, Bhāradvāja, is there even one teacher of brahmans, even [360] one teacher of teachers back through seven generations of teachers who speaks thus:

'I know this, I see this; this alone is the truth, all else is falsehood'?"

"No, good Gotama."

"But, Bhāradvāja, those who were formerly seers of the brahmans,<sup>25</sup> makers of mantras, preservers of mantras, whose ancient mantras<sup>26</sup> as sung, taught and composed the brahmans of today still sing, still speak; they still speak what was spoken, they still teach what was taught – that is to say (by)

Atthaka, Vāmaka, Vāmadeva, Vessāmitta, Yamataggi, Āṅgīrasa, Bhāradvāja, Vāssetṭha, Kassapa, Bhagu – do even these speak thus:

'We know this, we see this: this alone is the truth, all else is falsehood?'

[170] "No, good Gotama."

"So it comes to this, Bhāradvāja: there is not a single brahman who speaks thus to a brahman:

'I know this ... all else is falsehood.'

There is not a single teacher of brahmans, not a single teacher of teachers back through seven generations of teachers who speaks thus:

'I know this ... all else is falsehood.'

And those who were formerly seers of the brahmans, makers of mantras ... that is to say (by) Atthaka ... Bhagu, not even those speak thus:

'We know this, we see this: this alone is the truth, all else is falsehood.'

Bhāradvāja, it is like a string of blind men<sup>27</sup> holding on to one another - neither does the foremost one see, nor does the middle one see, nor does the hindmost one see.

Even so, methinks, Bhāradvāja, do the words of the brahmans turn out to resemble a string of blind men: neither does the foremost one see nor does the middle one see nor does the hindmost one see.

What do you think about this Bhāradvāja?

This being so, does not the faith of the brahmans turn out to be groundless?"

"But, good Gotama, brahmans do not merely go by<sup>28</sup> faith in this matter; brahmans also go by report."

"First you, Bhāradvāja, set off about faith, now you are speaking of report.

These five things, Bhāradvāja, have a twofold maturing<sup>29</sup> here-now.

What five?

Faith,
inclination,
report,
consideration of reasons,
reflection on and approval of an opinion.<sup>30</sup>

These, Bhārad- [361] vāja, are five things having a twofold maturing here-now.

Moreover, Bhāradvāja, even although something may be thoroughly believed in, it may be empty, void, false; on the other hand, something not thoroughly believed in may be fact, truth, not otherwise.

Moreover, [171] Bhāradvāja, even although something may be thoroughly inclined towards ... well reported ... well considered ... well reflected upon, it may be empty, void, false; on the other hand, even although something is not well reflected upon, it may be fact, truth, not otherwise.

Preserving a truth, Bhāradvāja, is not enough for an intelligent man inevitably to come to the conclusion:

"This alone the truth, all else is falsehood."

"But to what extent, good Gotama, is there preservation of a truth?"

To what extent does one preserve a truth?

We are asking the honoured Gotama about preservation of a truth."

"Bhāradvāja, if a man has faith and says:

'Such is my faith,' speaking thus he preserves a truth, but not yet does he inevitably come to the conclusion:

'This alone is the truth, all else is falsehood.'

To this extent, Bhāradvāja, is there preservation of a truth, to this extent does one preserve a truth, and it is to this extent that we lay down the preservation of a truth; but not yet is there awakening to truth.

And if, Bhāradvāja, a man has an inclination ... a report ... a consideration of reasons ... a reflection on and approval of an opinion and says:

'Such is my reflection on and approval of the opinion,' speaking thus he preserves a truth, but not yet does he inevitably come to the conclusion:

'This alone is the truth, all else is falsehood.'

To this extent, Bhāradvāja, is there preservation of a truth, to this extent does one preserve a truth, and it is to this extent that we lay down the preservation of a truth; but not yet is there awakening to truth."

"To this extent, good Gotama, is there preservation of a truth, to this extent one preserves a truth, to this extent do we behold the preservation of a truth.

But to what extent, good Gotama, is there awakening to truth?

To what extent does one awaken to truth?

We are asking the honoured Gotama about awakening to truth."

"As to this, Bhāradvāja, suppose a monk is living depending on a village or market town; a householder or a householder's son, having approached him, examines him concerning three states: states of greed, states of aversion and states of confusion.<sup>31</sup>

He thinks:

'Does the venerable one have such states of greed that, his mind obsessed by [362] such states of greed, although not knowing, he would say, "I know," or although not seeing, he would say, "I see," or would he incite another to such a course as for a long time would be for his woe and ill?'

While examining him, he knows thus:

'This venerable one does not have such states of greed that, his mind obsessed by such states of greed, while not knowing he would say, "I know," or while not seeing he would say, "I see," nor would he incite another to such a course as would be for a long time for his woe and ill.'

As is that venerable one's conduct of body, as is his conduct of speech, so is it not that of a greedy person.

And when this venerable one teaches dhamma, that dhamma is deep, difficult to see, difficult to understand, peaceful, excellent, beyond dialectic, subtle, intelligible to the wise; it is not a dhamma that could be well taught by a greedy person.

After examining him and beholding that he is purified of states of greed, then he examines him further on states of aversion.

He thinks:

'Now, does this venerable one have such states of aversion that, his mind obsessed ... or would he incite another to such a course as for a long time would be for his woe and ill?'

... As is that venerable one's conduct of body,

... of speech, so is it not that of a person with aversion.

And when this venerable one is teaching dhamma, ... it is not a dhamma that could be well taught by a person with aversion.'

After examining him and beholding that he is purified of states of aversion, then he examines him further on states of confusion.

He thinks:

'Now does this venerable one have such states of confusion that, his mind obsessed ... it is not a dhamma that could be well taught by a confused person.'

After examining him and beholding that he is purified of states of confusion, then he reposes faith in him;
with faith born he draws close;<sup>32</sup> drawing close he sits down near by;
sitting down near by he lends ear;
lending ear he hears dhamma;
having heard dhamma he remembers it;
he tests the meaning of the things he remembers; while testing the meaning the things are approved of;
if there is approval of the things desire is born;
with desire born he makes an effort;
having made an effort he weighs it up;
having weighed it up he strives;
being self-resolute he realises with his person the highest truth itself;
and penetrating it by means of intuitive wisdom, he [363] sees.

It is to this extent, Bhāradvāja, that there is an awakening to truth; it is to this extent that one awakens to truth; it is to this extent that we lay down an awakening to truth; but not yet is there attainment of truth."

"To this extent, good Gotama, is there awakening to truth, to this extent does one awaken to truth, and to this extent do we behold an awakening to truth.

But to what extent, good Gotama, is there attainment of truth?

To what extent does one attain truth?

We are asking the honoured Gotama about attainment of truth."

[174] "There is attainment of truth, Bhāradvāja, by following,
developing and continually practising these things themselves.

To this extent, Bhāradvāja, is there attainment of truth, to this extent does one attain truth, and to this extent do we lay down the attainment of truth."

"To this extent, good Gotama, is there attainment of truth, to this extent does one attain truth, and to this extent do we behold the attainment of truth.

But what thing, good Gotama, is of much service in the attainment of truth?

We are asking the honoured Gotama about a thing that is of much service in the attainment of truth."

"Striving, Bhāradvāja, is of much service in the attainment of truth; for whoso should not strive after truth would not attain it; but if he strives, then he attains truth; therefore striving is of much service in the attainment of truth."

"But what thing, good Gotama, is of much service to striving?

We are asking the honoured Gotama about a thing that is of much service to striving."

"Weighing (things up), Bhāradvāja, is of much service to striving; for whoso should not weigh (things up) would not strive; but if he weighs up, then he strives; therefore weighing up is of much service to striving."

"But what thing, good Gotama, is of much service to weighing up?

We are asking the honoured Gotama about a thing that is of much service to weighing up."

"Making an effort, Bhāradvāja, is of much service to weighing up; for whoso should not make an effort would not weigh up; but if he makes an effort, then he weighs up; therefore making an effort is of much service to weighing up."

"But what thing, good Gotama, is of much service to making an effort?"

We are asking the honoured Gotama about a thing that is of much service to making an effort."

[364] "Desire, Bhāradvāja, is of much service to making an effort; should desire for it not be born, one could not make an effort for it; but if desire is born, then he makes an effort; therefore desire is of much service to making an effort."

"But what thing, good Gotama, is of much service to desire?"

We are asking the honoured Gotama about a thing that is of much service to desire."

"Approving of the things, Bhāradvāja, is of much service to desire; should the things not be approved of, desire for them could not be born; but if there is approval of the things, then desire is born; therefore approval of the things is of much service to desire."

"But what thing, good Gotama, is of much service to (reflection on and) approval of the things?"

We are asking the honoured Gotama about a thing that is of much service to (reflection on and) approval of the things."

"Testing the meaning, Bhāradvāja, is of much service to reflection on and approval of the things."

If one did not test that meaning, the things could not seem right for this reflection; but if one tests the meaning, then the things seem right for reflection; therefore testing the meaning is of much service to reflection on and approval of the things."

"But what thing, good Gotama, is of much service to testing the meaning?

We are asking the honoured Gotama about a thing that is of much service to testing the meaning."

"Remembering dhamma, Bhāradvāja, is of much service to testing the meaning; for whoso should not remember that dhamma could not test that meaning; but if he remembers dhamma, then he tests the meaning; therefore remembering dhamma is of much service to testing the meaning."

"But what thing, good Gotama, is of much service to remembering dhamma?

We are asking the honoured Gotama about a thing that is of much service to remembering dhamma."

"Hearing dhamma, Bhāradvāja, is of much service to remembering dhamma.

Whoso should not hear that dhamma could not remember that dhamma; but if he hears dhamma, then he remembers dhamma,<sup>33</sup> therefore hearing dhamma is of much service to remembering dhamma."

"But what thing, good Gotama, is of much service to hearing [365] dhamma?

We are asking the honoured Gotama about a thing that is of much service to hearing dhamma."

"Lending ear, Bhāradvāja, is of much service to hearing dhamma; [176] for whoso should not lend ear to it could not hear this dhamma; but if he lends ear, then he hears dhamma; therefore lending ear is of much service to hearing dhamma."

"But what thing, good Gotama, is of much service to lending ear?"

We are asking the honoured Gotama about a thing that is of much service to lending ear."

"Drawing close, Bhāradvāja, is of much service to lending ear; for whoso should not draw close to him could not lend ear to him; but if he draws close, then he lends ear; therefore drawing close is of much service to lending ear."

"But what good thing, good Gotama, is of much service to drawing close?"

We are asking the honoured Gotama about a thing that is of much service to drawing close."

"Approaching, Bhāradvāja, is of much service to drawing close; for whoso should not approach him could not draw close to him; but if he approaches, then he draws close; therefore approaching is of much service to drawing close."

"But what thing, good Gotama, is of much service to approaching?"

We are asking the honoured Gotama about a thing that is of much service to approaching."

"Faith, Bhāradvāja, is of much service to approaching; for should faith in him not be born, one could not approach him; but if faith is born, then he approaches; therefore faith is of much service to approaching."

"We asked the honoured Gotama about the preservation of truth; the good Gotama explained the preservation of truth; and we approved of it and were pleased, and so we are delighted.

We asked the honoured Gotama about awakening to truth; the good Gotama explained ... we are delighted.

We asked the honoured Gotama about the attainment of truth ...

We asked the honoured Gotama about a thing that is of much service to the attainment of truth ... we are delighted.

Whatever it was that we asked the honoured Gotama, that very thing the good Gotama explained; and we approved of it and were pleased, and so we are delighted.

For, formerly, good Gotama, we used to know (a distinction) thus:

'And who are these little shaveling recluses, menials, black, off-scourings of our Kinsman's heels?<sup>34</sup>

And who are the knowers of [366] dhamma?<sup>35</sup>

Indeed the good Gotama has aroused in me a recluse's regard<sup>36</sup> for recluses, a recluse's satisfaction in recluses, a recluse's respect for recluses.

It is excellent, good Gotama, it is excellent, good Gotama; ... May the revered Gotama accept me as a lay-disciple going for refuge from this day forth for as long as life lasts."

Discourse with Caṅkī: The Fifth

---

<sup>1</sup> This discourse, which should be compared with the Soṇadaṇḍa Suttanta at D. i. 111 ff., might be called "prompted by Caṅkī," the main part being delivered not to him but to Kāpaṭhika. Cf. M. Sta. 51.

<sup>2</sup> MA. iii. 414: it is said that oblations were offered here to the devas.

<sup>3</sup> Brahmadeyya. MA. iii. 455 explains as seṭṭhadeyya, the best gift; and then says: "having raised the parasol, it was to be enjoyed as if he were a king; once given, this gift could not be taken back again." Cf. D. i. 87 for this description of a royal gift, and see Dial. i. 108, n. 1.

<sup>4</sup> As at M. ii. 54-55, (above, p. 251) substituting Opasāda for Thullakoṭṭhita.

<sup>5</sup> As at M. ii. 55, above, p. 251.

<sup>6</sup> Lit. kingdoms, raja; MA. iii. 416 instances Kāsi and Kosala.

<sup>7</sup> evaṃ kho me bho hoti, lit. it is thus by me.

<sup>8</sup> na arahati, not fit.

<sup>9</sup> Stock. See under akkhitta (unchallenged) in PTC. Cf. D. i. 120 for five things that brahmans declare make a brahman.

<sup>10</sup> brahmavaṇṇī, with the best golden colour of the pure castes, MA. iii. 418.

<sup>11</sup> brahmavaccasī. MA. iii. 418 says his body is like that of Mahā-Brahmā – one of the marks of a Great Man (see Sta. 91).

<sup>12</sup> MA. iii. 418 gives yutta, intent on, in explanation of the text's samannāgata, possessed of.

<sup>13</sup> MA. iii. 418 says that these last two attributes are synonymous.

<sup>14</sup> A very rich brahman, evidently also of spiritual integrity. See M. Sta. 99.

<sup>15</sup> On hiraññasuvaṇṇa see B.D. i. 28, n. 1.

<sup>16</sup> See B.D. i. 79, n. 6.

<sup>17</sup> cāpalla. At M. i. 470, Vbh. 351, Vism. 106 cāpalya.

<sup>18</sup> Kammavādī kiriyavādī

<sup>19</sup> MA. iii. 422 says that Sāriputta, Moggallāna, Mahākassapa and so on belong to this race. 'Brahman' is therefore taken in the Buddhist sense above.

<sup>20</sup> Ādīnakhattiyakulā. On ādīna in this compound see Dial. i. 148, n. 2. Cf. ādīnamānaso at S. v. 74 and see K.S. v. 61, n. 5.

<sup>21</sup> vaṇṇa as at end of M. Sta. 56.

<sup>22</sup> katam, in the sense of perfect, finished, and therefore master; cf. katamkaranīyaṃ where katam means both 'ended' or 'concluded' and 'concluded well or properly'; thus finished (as ended) and finished (as in "a finished product").

<sup>23</sup> mantapada. MA. iii. 424 says this as well as manta means Veda. Some of the seers mentioned below have Vedic verses traditionally ascribed to them. See B.D. iv. 337.

<sup>24</sup> Cf. M. i. 520.

<sup>25</sup> Down to the name Bhagu cf. Vin. i. 245; D. i. 104, 238, 242; A. iii. 224, 229; M. ii. 200.

<sup>26</sup> See note 23.

<sup>27</sup> As at M. ii. 200, D. i. 239.

<sup>28</sup> Parirūpāsanti, to pay homage, usually with the acc.

<sup>29</sup> MA. iii. 426 says a maturing that has been and that has not (yet) been.

<sup>30</sup> On the five also see S. ii. 115, iv. 138. Cf. A. i. 190, ii. 191.

<sup>31</sup> Cf. A. i. 190 f.

<sup>32</sup> The text reads saddhājāto upasaṃkamanto payirūpāsati. But to agree with the manner of the wording in the rest of the passage, I think upasaṃkamanti should be inserted after saddhājāto as at M. i. 480.

Otherwise these two passages are similar.

<sup>33</sup> Text reads: yasmā ca kho dhammaṃ dhāreti, instead of, as would seem more correct, yasmā ca kho dhammaṃ suṇāti tasmā dhammaṃ dhāreti.

<sup>34</sup> As at M. i. 334; see M.L.S. i. 397.

<sup>35</sup> Cf. M. i. 480.

<sup>36</sup> pema, liking, affection.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
5. Brāhmaṇa Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
5. The Division on Brahmans

96. Discourse with Esukārī

Phasukārī or Esukārī Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattthī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Then the brahman Esukārī approached the Lord;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the Lord,
and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Esukārī the brahman spoke thus to the Lord:

"Brahmans, good Gotama,
lay down four (types of) service:

they lay down service for a brahman, they lay down service for a noble, they lay down service for a merchant, they lay down service for a worker.

As to this, good Gotama, brahmans lay down service for a brahman,
saying:

'A brahman may serve a brahman, or a noble may serve a brahman, or a merchant may serve a brahman, or a worker may serve a brahman.'

This is the service, good Gotama, that brahmans lay down for a brahman.

As to this, good Gotama, brahmans lay down service for a noble,
saying: || ||

'A noble may serve a noble or a merchant may serve a noble or a worker may serve a noble.'

This is the service, good Gotama, that brahmans lay down for a noble.

As to this, good Gotama, brahmans lay down service for a merchant,
saying:

'A merchant may serve a merchant or a worker may serve a merchant.'

This is the service, good Gotama, that brahmans lay down for a merchant.

As to this, good Gotama, brahmans lay down service for a worker,
saying:

'A worker may serve a worker.

For who else could serve a worker?'

This is the [367] service, good Gotama, that brahmans lay down for a worker.

Brahmans, good Gotama,
lay down these four (types of) service.

What does the good Gotama say about this?"

"But, brahman, does everyone agree with the brahmans when they lay down these four (types of) service?"

"No, good Gotama."

"Like a poor
needy
destitute man<sup>1</sup> on whom they might force a morsel (of meat although)
he did not want it,
saying:

'You must eat this meat, my good man, and you must hand over a price for it as well' -

even so, brahman,
do the brahmans -
and moreover without the assent of recluses and brahmans -
lay down these four (types of) service.

I, brahman, do not say that everyone should serve.

But, brahman, I do not say that everyone should not serve.

For if, brahman,
there is a servitor
who is worse for his service,
not better,
I do not say that he should serve.

But if, brahman, there is a servitor who is better for his service,
not worse,
I say that he should serve.

---

And if, brahman, one should ask a noble,
saying:

'Is your servitor worse,
not better,
as a result of his service;
or is your servitor, better,
not worse,
as a result of his service?

And so which one should you be served by?'

- then the noble, brahman, in replying rightly
would reply thus:

'The servitor who is worse,
not better,
as a result of serving me -
I should not be served by him.

But the servitor who is better,
not worse,
as a result of serving me -
I should be served by him.'

■

And if, brahman, one should ask a brahman,
saying:

'Is your servitor worse,
not better,
as a result of his service;
or is your servitor, better,
not worse,
as a result of his service?

And so which one should you be served by?'

- then the brahman, brahman,
in replying rightly
would reply thus:

'The servitor who is worse,
not better,
as a result of serving me -
I should not be served by him.

But the servitor who is better,
not worse,
as a result of serving me -
I should be served by him.'

■

And if, brahman, one should ask a merchant,
saying:

'Is your servitor worse,
not better,
as a result of his service;
or is your servitor, better,
not worse,
as a result of his service?

And so which one should you be served by?'

- then the merchant, brahman,
in replying rightly
would reply thus:

'The servitor who is worse,
not better,
as a result of serving me -
I should not be served by him.

But the servitor who is better,
not worse,
as a result of serving me -
I should be served by him.'

■

And if, brahman, one should ask a worker,
saying:

'Is your servitor worse,
not better,
as a result of his service;
or is your servitor, better,

not worse,
as a result of his service?

And so which one should you be served by?'

- then the worker, brahman,
in replying rightly
would reply thus:

'The servitor who is worse,
not better,
as a result of serving me -
I should not be served by him.

But the servitor who is better,
not worse,
as a result of serving me -
I should be served by him.'

---

I, brahman, do not speak of 'better' because of birth in a high-class family.<sup>2</sup>

But, brahman, I do not speak of 'worse'
because of birth in a high-class family.

I, brahman, do not speak of 'better' because of splendour of complexion.<sup>3</sup>

But, brahman, I do not speak of 'worse'
because of splendour of complexion.

I, brahman, do not speak of 'better' because of splendour of possessions,<sup>4</sup>

But I, brahman, do not speak of 'worse' because of splendour of possessions.

■

For, as to this, brahman, someone from a high-class [368] family makes onslaught on creatures,
takes what has not been given,
wrongly enjoys pleasures of the senses,
is a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
of wrong view.

Therefore I do not speak of 'better'
because of birth in a high-class family.

But, as to this, brahman,
someone from a high-class family
may refrain from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from wrongly enjoying pleasures of the senses,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
from harsh speech,
from gossiping,
and be not covetous,
not malevolent in mind,
of right view.

Therefore I do speak of 'worse'
because of birth in a high-class family.

■

For, as to this, brahman, someone with splendour of complexion
makes onslaught on creatures,
takes what has not been given,
wrongly enjoys pleasures of the senses,
is a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
of wrong view.

Therefore I do not speak of 'better'
because of splendour of complexion.

But, as to this, brahman,
someone with splendour of complexion
may refrain from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from wrongly enjoying pleasures of the senses,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
from harsh speech,
from gossiping,
and be not covetous,
not malevolent in mind,
of right view.

Therefore I do speak of 'worse'
because of splendour of complexion.

■

For, as to this, brahman, someone with splendour of possessions
makes onslaught on creatures,
takes what has not been given,
wrongly enjoys pleasures of the senses,
is a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
of wrong view.

Therefore I do not speak of 'better'
because of splendour of possessions.

But, as to this, brahman,
someone with splendour of possessions
may refrain from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from wrongly enjoying pleasures of the senses,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
from harsh speech,
from gossiping,
and be not covetous,
not malevolent in mind,
of right view.

Therefore I do speak of 'worse'
because of splendour of possessions.

I, brahman, do not say that everyone should serve.

But, brahman, I do not say that everyone should not serve.

That servitor, brahman, in whom as a result of his service faith grows,
moral habit grows,
learning grows,
renunciation grows,
wisdom grows,<sup>5</sup> I say of him that he should serve."

---

When this had been said, Esukārī the brahman
spoke thus to the Lord:

"Brahmans, good Gotama,
lay down four (types of) treasure:<sup>6</sup> they lay down a brahman's wealth,<sup>7</sup> they lay down a noble's wealth, they lay down a merchant's wealth, they lay down a worker's wealth.

In regard to this, good Gotama, brahmans lay down that a brahman's wealth is walking for alms.<sup>8</sup>

But, on despising the wealth of walking for alms, a brahman is one
who does not meet his obligations
and is like a guardian
taking what has not been given.

This, good Gotama, is how brahmans lay down a brahman's wealth.

■

In regard to this, good Gotama, brahmans lay down that a noble's wealth is the bow and quiver.

But, on despising the wealth of bow and quiver, a noble is one
who does not meet his obligations
and is like a guardian
taking what has not been given.

This, good Gotama, is how brah- [369] mans lay down a noble's wealth.

■

In regard to this, good Gotama, brahmans lay down
that a merchant's<sup>9</sup> wealth is agriculture and cow-keeping.<sup>10</sup>

But, on despising the wealth of agriculture and cow-keeping, a merchant is one
who does not meet his obligations
and is like a guardian
taking what has not been given.

This, good Gotama, is how brahmans lay down a merchant's wealth.

■

In regard to this, good Gotama,
brahmans lay down
that a worker's wealth is the sickle and pingo.

But, on despising the wealth of sickle and pingo, a worker is one
who does not meet his obligations
and is like a guardian
taking what has not been given.

This, good Gotama, is how brahmans lay down a worker's wealth.

Brahmans, good Gotama,
lay down these four (types of) treasure.

What does the good Gotama say about this?"

"But, brahman, does everyone agree with the brahmans when they lay down these four (types of) treasure?"

"No, good Gotama."

"Like a poor
needy
destitute man
on whom they might force a morsel (of meat although)
he did not want it,
saying:

'You must eat this meat, my good man, and you must hand over a price for it as well' -

even so, brahman,
do the brahmans -
and moreover

without the assent of recluses and brahmans -
lay down these four (types of) treasure.

---

Now I, brahman, lay down that a man's wealth is dhamma, ariyan,
supermundane.

On recollecting his ancient family lineage on his maternal and paternal sides,<sup>10</sup> wherever it is that there is the production of an individuality,<sup>11</sup>
it is reckoned in accordance with that.

So, if there is the production of an individuality
in a noble family,
it is reckoned as a noble.

If there is the production of an individuality
in a brahman family,
it is reckoned as a brahman.

If there is the production of an individuality
in a merchant family,
it is reckoned as a merchant.

If there is the production of an individuality
in a worker family,
it is reckoned as a worker.

■

As a fire, brahman, no matter on account of what condition it burns, is reckoned precisely as that:

if the fire burns
because of dry sticks
it is reckoned as a dry stick fire; if the fire burns because of chips it is reckoned as a fire of chips;
if the fire burns
because of grass
it is reckoned as a grass fire;
if the fire burns
because of cowdung
it is reckoned as a cowdung fire
-even so, brahman,
do I lay down that a man's wealth is dhamma,
ariyan,
supermundane.

■

On recollecting his ancient family lineage on his maternal and paternal sides, wherever it is that there is the production of an individuality,
it is reckoned in accordance with that.

So, if there is the production of an individuality
in a noble family,
[370]it is reckoned precisely as a noble.

If there is the production of an individuality
in a brahman family,
it is reckoned precisely as a brahman.

If there is the production of an individuality
in a merchant family,

it is reckoned precisely as a merchant.

If there is the production of an individuality
in a worker family,
it is reckoned precisely as a worker.

---

But if, brahman,
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a noble family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slandering speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.<sup>12</sup>

■

And if, brahman,
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness

from a brahman family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

■

And if, brahman,
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a merchant family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,

dhamma,
what is skilled.

■

And if, brahman,
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a worker family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slanderos speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

---

What do you think about this, brahman?

On this supposition,
is it only a brahman
who is capable of developing a mind of friendliness
that is without enmity,
without malevolence?

And not a noble,
not a merchant,
not a worker?"<sup>13</sup>

"That is not so, good Gotama.

For on this supposition a noble too is capable of developing a mind of friendliness
that is without enmity,
without malevolence,
and so is a brahman, good Gotama,
and so is a merchant, good Gotama,
and so is a worker, good Gotama -
so, good Gotama,
on this supposition
all the four castes
are capable of developing a mind of friendliness
that is without enmity,
without malevolence."

"Even so, brahman, if
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a noble family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slandering speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind

and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

■

And if, brahman,
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a brahman family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slandering speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

■

And if, brahman,
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a merchant family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,

from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

■

And if, brahman,
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a worker family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

---

What do you think about this, brahman?

Is it only a brahman
who, taking a back-scratcher and bath-powder<sup>14</sup>
and going to a river,
is capable of cleansing himself of dust and mud?

And not a noble,
not a merchant,
not a worker?"

"That is not so, good Gotama.

A noble too, good Gotama, [371] taking a back-scratcher and bath-powder
and going to a river,
is capable of cleansing himself of dust and mud.

And so is a brahman, good Gotama,
and so is a merchant, good Gotama,
and so is a worker, good Gotama -
so, good Gotama,
all the four castes,
taking a back-scratcher and bath-powder
and going to a river, are capable of cleansing themselves of dust and mud."

"Even so, brahman, if
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a noble family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,

from unchastity,
lying,
slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

■

And if, brahman,
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a brahman family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

■

And if, brahman,
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a merchant family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

■

And if, brahman,
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a worker family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,

not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

---

What do you think about this, brahman?

If<sup>15</sup> a noble anointed king were to assemble a hundred men of varying origins saying to them:

'Let the good sirs come;
and let those who are of noble, priestly
and royal families,
bringing an upper piece of fire-stick
of teak
or sāl
or of a sweet-scented tree or of sandal
or lotus,
light a fire
and get it to give out heat.

But let the good sirs come;
and let those who are from a despised family,
a trapper family,
a bamboo-plaiter family,
a cartwright family,
a scavenger family,

bringing an upper piece of fire-stick
from a dog's trough
or a pig's trough
or from a trough for dyeing or dry sticks from castor-oil shrub,
light a fire
and get it to give out heat.'

What do you think about this, brahman?

Is the fire that is lit and the heat that is got by someone - no matter whether he be from a noble, priestly
or royal family,
and no matter whether he bring an upper piece of fire-stick
of teak
or sāl
or of a sweet-scented tree
or of sandal
or lotus -
is it a fire
that has flame
and hue
and brightness
and, being this fire,
is it able to serve the purposes of a fire?

But is the fire that is lit and the heat that is got by someone - no matter whether he be from a despised family,
a trapper family,
a bamboo-plaiter family,
a cartwright family,
a scavenger family,
and no matter whether he bring an upper piece of fire-stick

from a dog's trough
or a pig's trough
or from a trough for dyeing
or dry sticks from a castor-oil shrub -
is it a fire
that has neither flame nor hue
nor brightness
and, being this fire,
is it unable to serve the purposes of a fire?"

"That is not so, good Gotama.

Whoever from a noble,
priestly
or royal family,
bringing an upper piece of fire-stick
of teak
or sāl
or of a sweet-scented tree
or of sandal
or lotus,
lights a fire
and gets it to give out heat - this fire has flame
and hue
and brightness
and is able to serve the purposes of a fire.

And too,
whoever from a despised family,
a trapper family,
a bamboo-plaiter family,
a cartwright family,
a scavenger family,
bringing an upper piece of fire-stick

from a dog's trough
or a pig's trough
or a trough for dyeing
or dry sticks from a castor-oil shrub, lights a fire
and gets it to give out heat - this fire too has flame
and hue
and brightness
and is able to serve the purposes of a fire.

So, good Gotama,
all these fires
have flame
and hue
and brightness
and are able to serve the purposes of a fire."

■

"Even so, brahman, if
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a noble family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slandorous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind

and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

■

And if, brahman,
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a brahman family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slandering speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

■

And if, brahman,
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a merchant family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,

from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

■

And if, brahman,
one who has gone forth from home
into homelessness
from a worker family,
owing to the dhamma and discipline
promulgated by the Tathāgata
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from unchastity,
lying,
slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind
and is of right view,
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.

When this had been said
the brahman Esukārī spoke thus to the Lord:

"It is excellent, good Gotama,
excellent, good Gotama.

It is as if, good Gotama,
one might set upright what had been upset,
or might disclose what was covered,
or point out the way
to one who had gone astray,
or might bring an oil-lamp into the darkness
so that those with vision might see material shapes -
even so is dhamma made clear
in many a figure by the good Gotama.

I am going to the revered Gotama for refuge,
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the revered Gotama accept me
as a lay-follower,
one gone for refuge from today forth
for as long as life lasts."

Discourse with Esukārī:
The Sixth

---

<sup>1</sup> As at A. iii. 384. See also M, i. 450.

<sup>2</sup> MA. iii. 428, noble and brahman.

<sup>3</sup> MA. iii. 428, even a merchant has a splendid complexion.

<sup>4</sup> MA. iii. 428, even a worker, indeed even a member of a despised class, may have splendid possessions.

<sup>5</sup> At A. iii. 80 = S. iv, 250 these five ways of growing constitute ariyan growth.

<sup>6</sup> dhana.

<sup>7</sup> sandhana, assets, resources, belongings.

<sup>8</sup> Even if a brahman is very rich he should walk for alms as did at one time the rich brahmans of old, MA. iii. 428.

<sup>9</sup> vessa, which I have translated throughout by "merchant" could only be a merchant-trader if he first provided himself with something to sell, mainly grains and the products of the cow.

<sup>10</sup> Cf. D. i. 93.

<sup>11</sup> attabhāvassa abhinibbatti, two very complex words.

<sup>12</sup> Cf. M. i. 502 (above, p. 182), M. ii. 197 (below, p. 386).

<sup>13</sup> Cf. M. ii. 151 (above, p. 343).

<sup>14</sup> Cf. M. ii. 151.

<sup>15</sup> As at M. ii. 151-152.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
5. Brāhmaṇa Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
5. The Division on Brahmans

97. Discourse with Dhānanjāni

Dhānanjāni Sutta

---

Thus have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Rājagaha
in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels' feeding-place.

Now at that time the venerable Sāriputta was walking on tour near the Northern Mountain<sup>1</sup> together with a large Order of monks.

Then a certain monk who had spent the rains near Rājagaha approached the Northern Mountain and the venerable Sāriputta;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the venerable Sāriputta,
and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way
he sat down at a respectful distance.

The venerable Sāriputta spoke thus to this monk
as he was sitting down at a respectful distance:

"I hope, your reverence, that the Lord is well and strong?"

"The Lord is well and strong, your reverence."

"And I hope, your reverence, that the Order of monks is well and strong?"

"The Order of monks is also well and strong, your reverence."

"There is there, your reverence, a brahman named Dhānañjāni near the Taṇḍulapāla Gateway.<sup>2</sup>

I hope, your reverence, that the brahman named Dhānañjāni is well and strong?"

"Your reverence, the brahman Dhānañjāni is also well and strong."

"I hope, your reverence, that the brahman Dhānañjāni is being diligent?"

"How could the brahman Dhānañjāni be diligent, your reverence?"

Under the king's patronage, your reverence, the brahman Dhānañjāni plunders brahman householders; and under the patronage of the brahman householders he plunders the king.

His wife
who had faith
and whom he had married from a family that has faith has died,

and he has married another wife who has no faith
and who comes from a family that has no faith."

"This is indeed bad hearing,
your reverence;
indeed, your [373] reverence, it is bad hearing
that we hear the brahman Dhānañjāni is negligent.

Perhaps sometime, somewhere
we might meet the brahman Dhānañjāni, perhaps there might be some conversation."

Then the venerable Sāriputta, having stayed near the Northern Mountain for as long as he found suitable, set out on tour for Rājagaha.

Walking on tour
he gradually arrived at Rājagaha.

While he was there
the venerable Sāriputta stayed near Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove
at the squirrels' feeding-place.

Then the venerable Sāriputta,
dressing in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe,
entered Rājagaha for almsfood.

Now at that time the brahman Dhānañjāni was having cows milked in a cow-pen outside the town.

When the venerable Sāriputta, had walked for alms in Rājagaha and was returning from the alms-gathering after the meal,
he approached the brahman Dhānañjāni.

The brahman Dhānañjāni saw the venerable Sāriputta coming in the distance;
seeing him,
he approached the venerable Sāriputta;
having approached,
he spoke thus to the venerable Sāriputta:

"Drink some of this milk, good Sāriputta, until it is time for a meal."

"No, brahman,
I have finished with eating for today.

I will take my day-sojourn
at the root of a tree - you could come there."

"Yes, sir,"
the brahman Dhānañjāni answered the venerable Sāriputta in assent.

Then when the brahman Dhānañjāni had had breakfast, he approached the venerable Sāriputta;
having approached
he exchanged greetings with the venerable Sāriputta,
and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

The venerable Sāriputta spoke thus to the brahman Dhānañjāni
as he was sitting down at a respectful distance:

"I hope that you are being diligent, Dhānañjāni?"

"How could I be diligent, good Sāriputta, when there are my parents to support, my wife and children to support, my slaves,
servants
and work-people to support, when there are services to perform<sup>3</sup> for friends and acquaintances, services to perform for kith and kin, services to perform for guests, rites to perform<sup>3</sup> for the ancestors, rites to perform for the devatās, duties to perform<sup>3</sup> for the king - and this body too must be satisfied and looked after."

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Suppose someone were a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of his parents;
because of his non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring
the guardians of Niraya Hell
might drag him off to Niraya Hell.

Would he gain [374] anything by saying:

'I was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of my parents -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) me off to Niraya Hell'?

Or would his parents gain anything for him by saying:

'It was because of us
that he was a non-dhamma-farer,

an uneven-farer -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) him off to Niraya Hell'?"

"No, good Sāriputta,
for the guardians of Niraya Hell
would hurl him wailing
into Niraya Hell itself."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Suppose someone were a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of his wife and children<sup>4</sup>;
because of his non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring
the guardians of Niraya Hell
might drag him off to Niraya Hell.

Would he gain anything by saying:

'I was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of my wife and children -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) me off to Niraya Hell'?

Or would his wife and children gain anything for him
by saying:

'It was because of us
that he was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) him off to Niraya Hell'?"

"No, good Sāriputta,
for the guardians of Niraya Hell
would hurl him wailing
into Niraya Hell itself."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?"

Suppose someone were a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of his slaves, servants and work-people;
because of his non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring
the guardians of Niraya Hell
might drag him off to Niraya Hell.

Would he gain anything by saying:

'I was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of my slaves, servants and work-people -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) me off to Niraya Hell'?

Or would his slaves, servants and work-people gain anything for him
by saying:

'It was because of us
that he was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) him off to Niraya Hell'?"

"No, good Sāriputta,
for the guardians of Niraya Hell

would hurl him wailing
into Niraya Hell itself."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Suppose someone were a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of his friends and acquaintances;
because of his non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring
the guardians of Niraya Hell
might drag him off to Niraya Hell.

Would he gain anything by saying:

'I was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of my friends and acquaintances -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) me off to Niraya Hell'?

Or would his friends and acquaintances gain anything for him
by saying:

'It was because of us
that he was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) him off to Niraya Hell'?"

"No, good Sāriputta,
for the guardians of Niraya Hell
would hurl him wailing
into Niraya Hell itself."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Suppose someone were a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of his kith and kin;
because of his non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring
the guardians of Niraya Hell
might drag him off to Niraya Hell.

Would he gain anything by saying:

'I was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of my kith and kin -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) me off to Niraya Hell'?

Or would his kith and kin gain anything for him
by saying:

'It was because of us
that he was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) him off to Niraya Hell'?"

"No, good Sāriputta,
for the guardians of Niraya Hell
would hurl him wailing
into Niraya Hell itself."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Suppose someone were a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of his guests;
because of his non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring
the guardians of Niraya Hell
might drag him off to Niraya Hell.

Would he gain anything by saying:

'I was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of my guests -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) me off to Niraya Hell'?

Or would his guests gain anything for him
by saying:

'It was because of us
that he was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) him off to Niraya Hell'?"

"No, good Sāriputta,
for the guardians of Niraya Hell
would hurl him wailing
into Niraya Hell itself."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?"

Suppose someone were a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of his ancestors;

because of his non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring
the guardians of Niraya Hell
might drag him off to Niraya Hell.

Would he gain anything by saying:

'I was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of my ancestors -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) me off to Niraya Hell'?

Or would his ancestors gain anything for him
by saying:

'It was because of us
that he was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) him off to Niraya Hell'?"

"No, good Sāriputta,
for the guardians of Niraya Hell
would hurl him wailing
into Niraya Hell itself."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Suppose someone were a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of the devatās;
because of his non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring

the guardians of Niraya Hell
might drag him off to Niraya Hell.

Would he gain anything by saying:

'I was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of the devatās; -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) me off to Niraya Hell'?

Or would the devatās; gain anything for him
by saying:

'It was because of us
that he was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) him off to Niraya Hell'?"

"No, good Sāriputta,
for the guardians of Niraya Hell
would hurl him wailing
into Niraya Hell itself."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Suppose someone were a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of the king
because of his non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring
the guardians of Niraya Hell
might drag him off to Niraya Hell.

Would he gain anything by saying:

'I was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of the king -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) me off to Niraya Hell'?

Or would the king gain anything for him
by saying:

'It was because of us
that he was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) him off to Niraya Hell'?"

"No, good Sāriputta,
for the guardians of Niraya Hell
would hurl him wailing
into Niraya Hell itself."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Suppose someone were a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of satisfying and looking after his body
because of his non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring
the guardians of Niraya Hell
might drag him off to Niraya Hell.

Would he gain anything by saying:

'I was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer
because of satisfying and looking after my body -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) me off to Niraya Hell'?

Or would others gain anything for him
by saying:

'It was because of satisfying and looking after his body
that he was a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer -
do not let the guardians of Niraya Hell
(drag) him off to Niraya Hell'?"

"No, good Sāriputta,
for the guardians of Niraya Hell
would hurl him wailing
into Niraya Hell itself."

---

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is the better:
he who, because of his parents,
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
or he who, because of his parents,
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer?"

"He is not the better, Sāriputta, who because of his parents

is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
but he who, good Sāriputta,
because of his parents
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer,
he is indeed [375] the better.

Dhamma-faring,
even-faring,
good Sāriputta,
is better than non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring."

"There are, Dhānañjāni,
other causally effective rightful actions<sup>5</sup> by which one is able to support one's parents
and not make evil kamma but proceed on a course that is good.<sup>6</sup>

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is the better:
he who, because of his wife and children,
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
or he who, because of his wife and children,
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer?"

"He is not the better, Sāriputta, who because of his wife and children
is a non-dhamma-farer,

an uneven-farer;
but he who, good Sāriputta, because of his wife and children
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer,
he is indeed the better.

Dhamma-faring,
even-faring,
good Sāriputta,
is better than non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring."

"There are, Dhānañjāni,
other causally effective
rightful actions
by which one is able to support one's wife and children
and not make evil kamma
but proceed on a course that is good.

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is the better:
he who, because of his slaves, servants and workpeople,
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
or he who, because of his slaves, servants and workpeople,
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer?"

"He is not the better, Sāriputta, who because of his slaves, servants and workpeople
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
but he who, good Sāriputta,

because of his slaves, servants and workpeople
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer,
he is indeed the better.

Dhamma-faring,
even-faring,
good Sāriputta,
is better than non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring."

"There are, Dhānañjāni,
other causally effective
rightful actions
by which one is able to support one's slaves, servants and workpeople
and not make evil kamma
but proceed on a course that is good.

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is the better:
he who, because of his friends and acquaintances,
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
or he who, because of his friends and acquaintances,
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer?"

"He is not the better, Sāriputta, who because of his friends and acquaintances
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
but he who, good Sāriputta,
because of his friends and acquaintances
is a dhamma-farer,

an even-farer,
he is indeed the better.

Dhamma-faring,
even-faring,
good Sāriputta,
is better than non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring."

"There are, Dhānañjāni,
other causally effective
rightful actions
by which one is able to support one's friends and acquaintances
and not make evil kamma
but proceed on a course that is good.

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is the better:
he who, because of his kith and kin,
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
or he who, because of his kith and kin,
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer?"

"He is not the better, Sāriputta, who because of his kith and kin
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
but he who, good Sāriputta,
because of his kith and kin
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer,
he is indeed the better.

Dhamma-faring,
even-faring,
good Sāriputta,
is better than non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring."

"There are, Dhānañjāni,
other causally effective
rightful actions
by which one is able to support one's kith and kin
and not make evil kamma
but proceed on a course that is good.

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is the better:
he who, because of his guests,
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
or he who, because of his guests,
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer?"

"He is not the better, Sāriputta, who because of his guests
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
but he who, good Sāriputta,
because of his guests
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer,
he is indeed the better.

Dhamma-faring,
even-faring,

good Sāriputta,
is better than non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring."

"There are, Dhānañjāni,
other causally effective
rightful actions
by which one is able to support one's guests
and not make evil kamma
but proceed on a course that is good.

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is the better:
he who, because of his ancestors,
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
or he who, because of his ancestors,
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer?"

"He is not the better, Sāriputta, who because of his ancestors
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
but he who, good Sāriputta,
because of his ancestors
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer,
he is indeed the better.

Dhamma-faring,
even-faring,
good Sāriputta,

is better than non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring."

"There are, Dhānañjāni,
other causally effective
rightful actions
by which one is able to support one's ancestors
and not make evil kamma
but proceed on a course that is good.

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is the better:
he who, because of the devatās,
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
or he who, because of the devatās,
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer?"

"He is not the better, Sāriputta, who because of the devatās
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
but he who, good Sāriputta,
because of the devatās
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer,
he is indeed the better.

Dhamma-faring,
even-faring,
good Sāriputta,
is better than non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring."

"There are, Dhānañjāni,
other causally effective
rightful actions
by which one is able to support the devatās
and not make evil kamma
but proceed on a course that is good.

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is the better:
he who, because of the king,
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
or he who, because of the king,
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer?"

"He is not the better, Sāriputta, who because of the king
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
but he who, good Sāriputta,
because of the king
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer,
he is indeed the better.

Dhamma-faring,
even-faring,
good Sāriputta,
is better than non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring."

"There are, Dhānañjāni,
other causally effective

rightful actions
by which one is able to support the king
and not make evil kamma
but proceed on a course that is good.

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is the better:
he who, because of satisfaction and care of the body,
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
or he who, because of satisfaction and care of the body,
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer?"

"He is not the better, Sāriputta, who because of satisfaction and care of the body
is a non-dhamma-farer,
an uneven-farer;
but he who, good Sāriputta, because of satisfaction and care of the body
is a dhamma-farer,
an even-farer,
he is indeed the better.

Dhamma-faring,
even-faring,
good Sāriputta,
is better than non-dhamma-faring,
uneven-faring."

"There are, Dhānañjāni,
other causally effective
rightful actions
by which one is able to satisfy and care for the body

and not make evil kamma but proceed on a course that is good."

---

Then Dhānañjāni the brahman, having rejoiced in what the venerable Sāriputta had said,
having given thanks,
rising from his seat departed.

Then after a time
the brahman Dhānañjāni was ill,
in pain,
grievously afflicted.

Then the brahman Dhānañjāni summoned a man,
and said:

"Come you, my good man,
approach the Lord;
having approached,
in my name salute the Lord's feet with your head,
saying:

'Revered sir, Dhānañjāni the brahman is ill,
in pain,
grievously afflicted;
he salutes the Lord's feet with his head';

and then approach the venerable Sāriputta;
having approached,
in my name salute the venerable Sāriputta's feet with your head,
saying:

'Revered sir, Dhānañjāni the brahman is ill,
in pain,
grievously afflicted;
he salutes the venerable Sāriputta's feet with his head';
and then say:

'It would be good indeed, revered sir,
if the venerable Sāriputta
would approach the dwelling of the brahman Dhānañjāni,
out of compassion.'

"Yes, revered sir,"
and this man,
having answered the brahman [376] Dhānañjāni in assent,
approached the Lord;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, this man spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, Dhānañjāni the brahman is ill,
in pain,
grievously afflicted;
he salutes the Lord's feet with his head."

And then he approached the venerable Sāriputta;
having approached,
having greeted the venerable Sāriputta,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, this man spoke thus to the venerable Sāriputta:

"Revered sir, Dhānañjāni the brahman is ill,
in pain,

grievously afflicted;
he salutes the venerable Sāriputta's feet with his head";

It would be good indeed, revered sir,
if the venerable Sāriputta
would approach the dwelling of the brahman Dhānañjāni,
out of compassion."

Then the venerable Sāriputta,
having dressed in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe,
approached the dwelling of the brahman Dhānañjāni;
having approached,
he sat down on the appointed seat.

As he was sitting down
the venerable Sāriputta spoke thus to the brahman Dhānañjāni:

"I hope that you, Dhānañjāni, are better,
I hope you are keeping going.

I hope the painful feelings are decreasing,
not increasing,
and that a decrease in them is apparent,
not an increase?"

"No, good Sāriputta,
I am no better,
I am not keeping going.

My grievously painful feelings are increasing,
not decreasing,
an increase in them is apparent,
not a decrease.

Good Sāriputta, as<sup>7</sup> a strong man might cleave one's head
with a sharp-edged sword,
even so, good Sāriputta,
do exceedingly loud winds rend my head.

I am no better, good Sāriputta,
I am not keeping going.

My grievously painful feelings are increasing,
not decreasing,
an increase in them is apparent,
not a decrease.

As, good Sāriputta, a strong man might clamp a turban on one's head
with a tight leather strap,
even so, good Sāriputta,
do I have very bad headaches.

I am no better, good Sāriputta,
I am not keeping going.

My grievously painful feelings are increasing,
not decreasing,
an increase in them is apparent,
not a decrease.

As, good Sāriputta, a skilled cattle butcher or his apprentice
might cut through the stomach
with a sharp butcher's knife,
even so, good Sāriputta,
do very strong winds cut through my stomach.

I am no better, good Sāriputta,
I am not keeping going.

My grievously painful feelings are increasing,
not decreasing,
an increase in them is apparent,
not a decrease.

As, good Sāriputta, two strong men,
having taken hold of a weaker man by his limbs,
might set fire to him,
might make him sizzle up over a charcoal pit, even so, good Sāriputta, there is a fierce heat in my body.

I am no better, good Sāriputta,
I am not keeping going.

[377] My grievously painful feelings are increasing,
not decreasing,
an increase in them is apparent,
not a decrease.

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is better:
Niraya Hell or an animal womb?"

"An animal womb is better than Niraya Hell, good Sāriputta."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is better:
an animal womb or the realm of the departed?"

"The realm of the departed is better than an animal womb, good Sāriputta."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is better:
the realm of the departed or human-kind?

"Human-kind is better than the realm of the departed, good Sāriputta."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which is better:
human-kind or the Four Great Regent devas<sup>8</sup>?"

"The Four Great Regent devas is better than human-kind, good Sāriputta."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which are better:
the Four Great Regent devas or the devas of the Thirty-Three?"

"The devas of the Thirty-Three are better than the Four Great Regent devas, good Sāriputta."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which are better:
the devas of the Thirty-Three or Yama's devas?"

"Yama's devas are better than the Thirty-Three, good Sāriputta."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?

Which are better:
Yama's devas or the Tusita devas?"

"The Tusita devas are better than Yama's devas, good Sāriputta."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?"

Which are better:
the Tusita devas or the devas of creation?"

"The devas of creation are better than the Tusita devas, good Sāriputta."

■

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?"

Which are better:
the devas of creation or the devas that have power over the creations of other?"

"The devas that have power over the creations of others are better than the devas of creation, good Sāriputta."

"What do you think about this, Dhānañjāni?"

Which is better:
the devas that have power over the creations of others or the Brahma-world?"

"The revered Sāriputta said 'Brahma-world,'
the revered Sāriputta said 'Brahma-world.'"

Then it occurred to the venerable Sāriputta:

"These brahmans are very intent on the Brahma-world."

Suppose I were to show the brahman Dhānañjāni
the way to companionship with Brahmā?

Dhānañjāni, I will show you the way to companionship with Brahmā.

Listen to it,
attend carefully,
and I will speak."

[378] "Yes, sir,"
the brahman Dhānañjāni answered the venerable Sāriputta in assent.

The venerable Sāriputta spoke thus;

"And which, Dhānañjāni, is the way to companionship with Brahmā?

As to this, Dhānañjāni, a monk dwells, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of friendliness,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of friendliness
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

This, Dhānañjāni, is a way to companionship with Brahmā.

■

And again, Dhānañjāni, a monk dwells, having suffused the first quarter
with a mind of compassion,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of compassion
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

This, Dhānañjāni, is a way to companionship with Brahmā.

■

And again, Dhānañjāni, a monk dwells, having suffused the first quarter
with a mind of sympathetic joy,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of sympathetic joy
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,

immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

This, Dhānañjāni, is a way to companionship with Brahmā.

■

And again, Dhānañjāni, a monk dwells, having suffused the first quarter
with a mind of equanimity,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of equanimity
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

"Well then, good Sāriputta,
in my name salute the Lord's feet with your head,
and say:

'Lord, the brahman Dhānañjāni is ill,
in pain,
grievously afflicted;
he salutes the Lord's feet with his head.'

"Then, although there was something further to be done, the venerable Sāriputta established the brahman Dhānañjāni

(only) in the less, in a Brahma-world<sup>9</sup>
and, rising from his seat,
he departed.

Soon after the venerable Sāriputta had gone, the brahman Dhānañjāni passed away, and arose in the Brahma-world.<sup>10</sup>

Then the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks, although there was something further to be done, this Sāriputta established the brahman Dhānañjāni (only) in the less,
in the Brahma-world,
and rising from his seat,
he is departing."

Then the venerable Sāriputta approached the Lord;
having approached,
having greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance,
the venerable Sāriputta spoke thus to the Lord:

"Lord, the brahman Dhānañjāni is ill,
in pain,
grievously afflicted;
he salutes the Lord's feet with his head."

[379] "But why did you, Sāriputta, although there was something further to be done, having established the brahman Dhānañjāni (only) in the less,

in the Brahma-world,
rising from your seat, depart?"<sup>11</sup>

"It occurred to me, Lord:

"These brahmans are very intent on the Brahma-world.

Suppose I were to show the brahman Dhānañjāni
the way to companionship with Brahmā?"

"Sāriputta, the brahman Dhānañjāni has died and has arisen in the Brahma-world."

Discourse with Dhānañjāni:
The Seventh

---

<sup>1</sup> Dakkhiṇāgiri. MA. iii. 429 says giri is the mountain slope, and that this was the name of the northern part of the mountainous country surrounding Rājagaha.

<sup>2</sup> One of the lesser gateways of Rājagaha, MA. iii. 429.

<sup>3</sup> karaṇīyam kātabbhaṃ.

<sup>4</sup> As above paragraph mutatis mutandis.

<sup>5</sup> sahetukā dhammikā kammantā.

<sup>6</sup> puññaṃ paṭipadaṃ. Here, as frequently, puñña as the opposite of pāpa, evil, is "good" rather than "merit."

<sup>7</sup> This and the following similes as at M. i. 243-244, etc.

<sup>8</sup> Cf. with the longer list of devas at M. i. 289.

<sup>9</sup> The idea no doubt is that Sāriputta missed an opportunity of telling the brahman about dhamma and spoke only of *hīna Brahmalo*ka, a "low" world instead of the lokuitara dhamma, the supermundane dhamma (see Sta. No. 96, above, p. 369), towards the winning of which the teaching of the Buddha is directed.

<sup>10</sup> No mention of hīna, low or lesser, Brahma-world here. This raises the problem of whether Dhānañjāni profited more from Sāriputta's teaching than the latter knew or had attempted.

<sup>11</sup> A rebuke recorded to have been given by Gotama to Sāriputta, "the beloved disciple," is of rare occurrence. See above, p. 131 and Intr. p. xxvi.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
5. Brāhmaṇa Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
5. The Division on Brahmins

98. Discourse to Vāseṭṭha

Vāseṭṭha Sutta

---

Thus have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Icchānaṅkala in a forest glade near Icchānaṅkala.

Now at that time many wealthy and distinguished brahmins were living in Icchānaṅkala, such as the brahman Cankī,<sup>2</sup> the brahman Tārukkha, the brahman Pokkharasāti, the brahman Jāṇussoṇi, the brahman Todeyya, and other wealthy and distinguished brahmins.<sup>3</sup>

Then as the brahman youths Vāseṭṭha and Bhāradvāja were pacing up and down

and roaming about on foot,
this chance conversation arose:

"How is one a brahman?"

The brahman youth Bhāradvāja spoke thus:

"If one is of pure birth on both the mother's and the father's side, [380] and is of pure descent back through seven generations, unchallenged and irreproachable in respect of birth, then is one a brahman."

The brahman youth Vāseṭṭha spoke thus:

"If one is of moral habit and right practice,<sup>4</sup>
then is one a brahman."

But neither was Bhāradvāja the brahman youth able to convince Vāseṭṭha the brahman youth, nor was Vāseṭṭha the brahman youth able to convince Bhāradvāja the brahman youth.

Then Vāseṭṭha the brahman youth spoke thus to Bhāradvāja the brahman youth:

"Bhāradvāja, this recluse Gotama,
the son of the Sakyans,
gone forth from a Sakyan clan, is staying near Icchānaṅkala, in a forest glade near Icchānaṅkala.

And a lovely report has gone abroad about the recluse Gotama thus:

He is indeed Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
endowed with knowledge and (right) conduct,
Well-farer,
knower of the worlds,
the matchless charioteer of men to be tamed,
teacher of devas and mankind,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.

Let us go, good Bhāradvāja;
we will approach the recluse Gotama,
and having approached
we will ask the recluse Gotama about this matter, and as the recluse Gotama explains it to us, so will we accept it."

"Yes, sir,"
the brahman youth Bhāradvāja answered the brahman youth Vāsetṭha in assent.

Then the brahman youths Vāsetṭha and Bhāradvāja
approached the Lord;
having approached,
they exchanged greetings with the Lord;
having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
they sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Vāsetṭha the brahman youth addressed the Lord in these verses:

Vāsetṭha:

"Both of us have been recognised as<sup>5</sup> and we claim to be three-Veda-(men), I, of Pokkharasāti (a pupil), this brahman youth of Tārukkha.<sup>6</sup>
In what is pointed out of the three Vedas - in that we are whole:
We are versed in the pada-pāṭha,<sup>7</sup> grammarians, in speaking we are like teachers.

[381] There is contention between us, Gotama, in respect of birth:
'By birth one is a brahman' - so speaks Bhāradvāja;
But I say, 'By doing'<sup>8</sup> - let the Visioned One know it thus.
As we are each unable to convince the other,
We come to ask the revered Self-Awakened One, widely famed.
As people salute the moon when it has come to the full,
So, in the world, honouring him, do they thus praise Gotama.
We are asking Gotama, the Eye risen in the world:
Is one by birth a brahman or does one (so) become by doing?
Tell us this who know not, that a brahman we may know."

Gotama:<sup>9</sup>

"Vāsetṭha, I will expound
To you in gradual and very truth
Division in the kinds<sup>10</sup> of living things;
For kinds divide.<sup>11</sup> Behold the grass and trees!
They reason not, yet they possess the mark
After their kind, for kinds indeed divide.
Consider then the beetles, moths and ants:
They after their kind too possess the mark
After their kind, for kinds indeed divide.
And so four-footed creatures, great and small
They after their kind too possess the mark
After their kind, for kinds indeed divide.
The reptiles, snakes, the long-backed animals
They after their kind too possess the mark
After their kind, for kinds indeed divide.
[382] Fish and pond-feeders, water-denzens

They after their kind too possess the mark
After their kind, for kinds indeed divide.
Birds and the winged creatures, fowls o' the air,
They after their kind all possess the mark
For kinds indeed divide. Each after his kind bears His mark; in man there is not manifold.<sup>12</sup>
Not in the hair or head or ears or eyes,
Not in the mouth or nose or lips or brows,
Not in the throat, hips, belly or the back,
Not in the rump, sex-organs or the breast,
Not in the hands or feet, fingers or nails,
Not in the legs or thighs, colour or voice,
Is mark that forms his kind as in all else.
Nothing unique<sup>13</sup> is in men's bodies found:
The difference in men is nominal.

The man forsooth who earns his livelihood
By minding cows and fields, know, Vāsetṭha,
He is a farmer, not a brahmana!
Who works at diverse crafts, know him to be An artisan and not a brahmana!
Who plies a trade for livelihood, know him
To be a trader, not a brahmana!
Who toils in service for another man,
Know as a servant, not a brahmana!
Who lives by taking things not giv'n, know him
To be a thief and not a brahmana!
Who lives indeed by archery, know him
To be a soldier, not a brahmana!
Who lives by priestly craft, know him to be A celebrant and not a brahmana!
And he who owns the village, countryside,
Know him as a rajah and no brahmana!

I call none 'brahman' from mere parentage,
Tho' he be 'Sir'-ed and wealthy too: the man

Of naught, who grasps not, brahman him I call!

Who cuts all fetters, thirsting not, fears not,
Fetter-free, boundless, brahman him I call.

Who cuts thong, halter, strap, and cord, throws off [383] The bar,<sup>14</sup> has woken, brahman him I call.

Who, blameless, bears blows, bonds, abuse, well armed With strength of patience, brahman him I call.

Him wrathless, spotless, moral, free of pride,<sup>15</sup>
Last body bearing, tamed, I brahman call.

As water on a leaf, as seed on awl,
Who to lust clings not, brahman him I call.

Who knows here now that ill for self is quenched, Burden-dropped,<sup>16</sup> boundless, brahman him I call.

Him of deep wisdom, sage, skilled in all ways,
Won to the goal supreme, I brahman call.

Who not with homeless nor with householder sorts, Frugal, resort-less, brahman him I call.

Who rod lays by 'gainst weak and strong, slays not,
To slay incites none, brahman him I call.

Him cool<sup>17</sup> mid violence, mid foes no foe, Mid grasping grasping not, I brahman call.

From whom hate, passion, pride, and guile have fall'n,
As seed from needle, brahman him I call.

Who teaches gently, utters words of truth,
And none offendeth, brahman him I call.

Who here takes naught, long, short, small, large, good, bad, Nothing not given, brahman him I call.

In whom no hopes are found for here or yon, Fetter-free, hope-free, brahman him I call.

In whom no grooves are found, gone doubt, who knows,
Won to depths deathless,<sup>18</sup> brahman him I call.

Who here has passed bond of both good and ill Griefless, cleansed, dustless, brahman him I call.

[384] Him spotless, cleansed, unclouded, clear as moon,
With 'life'<sup>19</sup> and pleasure quenched, I brahman call.

Who hath this bog, false, painful round, passed o'er, Crossed and yon-fared, a muser, doubt gone, still,
Cool<sup>20</sup> in detachment, brahman him I call.

Who pleasures here forsakes and homeless fares, Lust and 'life'<sup>19</sup> ended, brahman him I call.

Who craving here forsakes and homeless fares, Craving, 'life'<sup>19</sup> ended, brahman him I call.

Him rid of human yoke, passed deva-yoke, Fetterless, free of yokes, I brahman call.

Him rid of likes and dislikes, cool,<sup>21</sup> detached, Vigorous, world-conqueror, I brahman call.

Who knows of all men the rise and fall, uncaught,
Awake, well-faring, brahman him I call.

Whose lot men, devas, gandharvas know not,
Cankerless, worthy,<sup>22</sup> brahman him I call.

Him for whom present, future, past, holds naught,
Who grasps not, man-of-naught, I brahman call.

The bull, elect, the hero, victor, sage,
Awake, still, washen, brahman him I call.

Who knows his former life, sees heaven and hell,
Won to birth's ending, brahman him I call.

What the world holds as 'name' and 'lineage'
Is indeed nominal, terms risen here
And there by popular opinion,

Adhered to long, views of the ignorant!
The ignorant declare: 'A brahman is

By birth.' None is by birth a brahman; none By birth no brahmana; by deeds is one
A brahmana, by deeds no brahmana!

[385] By deeds one is a farmer and by deeds
An artisan, by deeds a trader too;

By deeds one is a servant and a thief,
By deeds a soldier and a celebrant,
And even so a rajah is by deeds.

'Tis thus in truth the wise perceive the deed, Seers of origin by way of cause,<sup>23</sup>
Men expert in result of deeds. The world

Revolves by deeds, mankind revolves by deeds;
As pin holds fast the rolling chariot's wheel,
So beings are in bondage held by deeds.

A brahman one becomes by Brahma-faring,
By temperance, austerity, restraint:

This is indeed supreme for brahmanhood.

Who by three Vedas is accomplished,
With no more coming here, and man-of-calm,
Know thou, Vāsetṭha, even thus of him:
He is of knowers Sakka<sup>24</sup> and Brahmā!"

When this had been said, the brahman youths Vāsetṭha and Bhāradvāja spoke thus to the Lord:

"It is wonderful, good Gotama, wonderful, good Gotama.

It is as if, good Gotama,
one might set upright what had been upset,
or might disclose what was covered,
or point out the way
to one who had gone astray,
or might bring an oil-lamp into the darkness
so that those with vision might see material shapes -
even so is dhamma made clear
in many a figure by the good Gotama.

We are going to the revered Gotama for refuge,<sup>25</sup>
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the good Gotama accept us as lay-disciples,
going for refuge from today forth
for as long as life lasts."

Discourse to Vāsetṭha:
The Eighth

---

<sup>1</sup> The text of this Discourse is not given in M. ii. It is the same as the Vāsetṭha Sutta at Sn. p. 115 ff. The Comys (SnA 462 ff. and MA. iii. 431 ff.) show several interesting variations. Cf. also D. i. 235 ff.

<sup>2</sup> MA. iii. 431 says that Cankī and the four others were priests of King Pasenadi.

<sup>3</sup> MA. iii. 431: "every six months they gather together in two places: if they want to purify (their) birth (jātiṃ sodhetukāmā), then for this purpose they gather together at Ukkaṭṭhā under Pokkharasāti. If they want to purify the mantras, then they gather together at Icchānaṅkala. At this time they gathered together there for purifying the mantras." SnA 462 says that they were there for meditating upon and thoroughly examining the Vedas.

<sup>4</sup> MA. iii. 432 = SnA. 463, in explanation of kammanā (Sn. 696) say: "to say one 'is of moral habit' (sīlava) refers to the sevenfold ways of skilled kamma in gesture and speech; referring to the threefold kamma of mind, one says 'endowed with right practice' (vat(t)a-sampanna)". See M. Sta. 41 for this tenfold way of skilled action.

<sup>5</sup> By their teachers.

<sup>6</sup> For passages parallel to these verses see the Concordance in Wov. Cads., p. 199 f.

<sup>7</sup> An educated brahman who can pronounce each word in a mantra separately "without coalescence or saṃdhi and with its own specific accent" is a padaka, i.e. versed in Vedic lines and words. See R. N. Dandekar, Cultural Background of the Vedas, UCR. vol. XI, Nos. 3 and 4, July-October, 1953, p. 139.

<sup>8</sup> kammanā, see above, p. 380, n. 4. It therefore appears to mean by accomplished training, that is in sīla and mind development; and thus has no pronounced reference to past kamma working in the present. P.E.D. gives "by character." In the following verses, e.g. 650 ff., I follow E. M. Hare in translating as "deeds." Cf. Sn. 136: kammanā vasalo hoti kammanā hoti brāhmano, which SnA. 183 explains as: "he is an outcaste from thriving on impure kamma, a brahman from driving out what is impure by means of pure kamma" (or, "doing," kammunā, where kammunā, is but a variant of the instrumental kammanā).

<sup>9</sup> From here to the end of the verses I give E. M. Hare's translation in Woven Cadences.

<sup>10</sup> jāti, kind or birth.

<sup>11</sup> There is a diversity of kind.

<sup>12</sup> I.e. no variety of native marks.

<sup>13</sup> Or specific.

<sup>14</sup> Or, lifts the barrier, ukkhittapaligha, as at M. i. 139.

<sup>15</sup> anussadam.

<sup>16</sup> pannabhāra, as at M. i. 139.

<sup>17</sup> nibbuta.

<sup>18</sup> amatogadha, the plunge into deathlessness.

<sup>19</sup> bhava.

<sup>20</sup> nibbuta.

<sup>21</sup> sītibhūta, cooled, become cool.

<sup>22</sup> arahaniyam.

<sup>23</sup> paṭiccasamuppādasā.

<sup>24</sup> Note at Woo. Gads. p. 97 reads; "Sn. Index suggests word-play; so perhaps 'best possible of knowers.' Tihi vijjāhi may refer to the 'triple lore' given in verse 647 above, see K.S. i. 208 and G.S. i. 149."

<sup>25</sup> According to DA. 406 this was their first time of going for refuge. The second was after they had heard the Tevijja Sutlanta (D. Sta. 13); a few days afterwards they "went forth", were ordained and attained arahantship. DA. 406 refers to the Aggañña Sutta (D. Sta. 27) for this event, which DA. 872 states to be the case.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
5. Brāhmaṇa Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
5. The Division on Brahmans

99. Discourse with Subha

Subha Sutta

---

Thus have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Now at that time the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son<sup>1</sup> was residing in Sāvattḥī in a householder's dwelling on some business or other.

Then the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son, who was staying in that householder's dwelling, spoke thus to that householder:

"I have heard, householder, that Sāvattḥī is not unfrequented by perfected ones.

Could we today
pay our respects to a recluse or brahman?"<sup>2</sup>

"Revered sir, this Lord is staying near Sāvattthī
in the Jeta Grove
in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

You could pay respects to this Lord, revered sir."

When the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son, had answered that householder in assent,
he approached the Lord;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the Lord;
having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance,
the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son,
spoke thus to the Lord:

"Good Gotama, brahmans speak thus:

'A householder is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled;<sup>3</sup> one who has gone forth
is not accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled.'

What does the good Gotama say to this?"

■

"On this point I, brahman youth, discriminate,<sup>4</sup> on this point I do not speak definitely.<sup>5</sup>

I, brahman youth,
do not praise a wrong course in either a householder or one who has gone forth.

If, brahman youth,
either a householder<sup>6</sup>
or one who has gone forth
is faring along wrongly, then as a result
and consequence
of his wrong [387] course he is not accomplishing the right path, dhamma, what is skilled.

■

But I, brahman youth, praise a right course both for a householder
and for one who has gone forth.

If, brahman youth,
either a householder
or one who has gone forth
is faring along rightly, then as a result
and consequence
of his right course
he is accomplishing the right path,
dhamma,
what is skilled."

---

"Good Gotama, brahmans speak thus:

'Having a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,
great problems -
this occupation<sup>7</sup> of householders is of great fruit.

Not having a great deal to do:<sup>8</sup> few duties,<sup>9</sup>
a small administration,
small problems -
this occupation of those who have gone forth
is of small fruit.'

What does the good Gotama say to this?"

■

"On this point too I, brahman youth, discriminate, on this point I do not speak definitely.

There is, brahman youth, an occupation
where there is a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,
great problems -
which if failed of
is of small fruit.

There is, brahman youth, an occupation
where there is a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,

great problems -
which if succeeded in
is of great fruit.

There is, brahman youth, an occupation
where there is not a great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -
which if failed of
is of small fruit.

There is, brahman youth, an occupation
where there is not a great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -
which if succeeded in
is of great fruit.

■

And what, brahman youth, is an occupation
where there is a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,
great problems -
which if failed of
is of small fruit?

Agriculture, brahman youth, is an occupation
where there is a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,
great problems -

which if failed of
is of small fruit.

■

And what, brahman youth, is an occupation
where there is a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,
great problems -
which if succeeded in
is of great fruit?

Agriculture, brahman youth, is an occupation
where there is a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,
great problems -
which if succeeded in
is of great fruit.

■

And what, brahman youth, is an occupation
where there is not a great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -
which if failed of
is of small fruit?

Trading, brahman youth, is an occupation
where there is not a great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -

which if failed of
is of small fruit.

■

And what, brahman youth, is an occupation
where there is not a [388] great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -
which if succeeded in
is of great fruit?

Trading, brahman youth is an occupation
where there is not a great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -
which if succeeded in
is of great fruit.

---

As, brahman youth, agriculture is an occupation
where there is a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,
great problems -
which if failed of
is of small fruit,
even so, brahman youth,
an occupation of a householder
where there is a great deal to do:
many duties,

a large administration,
great problems -
is one which if failed of
is of small fruit.

As, brahman youth, agriculture is an occupation
where there is a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,
great problems -
which if succeeded in is of great fruit,
even so, brahman youth,
an occupation of a householder
where there is a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,
great problems -
is one which if succeeded in
is of great fruit.

As, brahman youth, trading is an occupation
where there is not a great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems,
which if failed of
is of small fruit,
even so, brahman youth,
an occupation of one who has gone forth
where there is not a great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -
is one which if failed of
is of small fruit.

As, brahman youth, trading is an occupation
where there is not a great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -
which if succeeded in
is of great fruit,
even so, brahman youth,
an occupation of one who has gone forth
where there is not a great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -
is one which if succeeded in
is of great fruit."

---

"Brahmans, good Gotama, lay down five things<sup>10</sup> for the doing<sup>11</sup> of good,
for success in what is skilled."

"If it were not burdensome to you, brahman youth, it would be good
if you would speak in this company about those five things that the brahman lay down
for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled."

"It is not burdensome to me, good Gotama, where there may be a revered one or ones like revered ones."

"Well then, brahman youth, do speak."

"Truth, good Gotama, is the first thing that brahmans lay down
for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled.

Austerity, good Gotama, is the second thing that brahmans lay down
for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled.

Chastity,<sup>12</sup> good Gotama, is the third [389] thing that brahmans lay down
for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled.

Study of the (Vedic) hymns,<sup>13</sup> good Gotama, is the fourth thing that brahmans lay down
for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled.

Renunciation, good Gotama, is the fifth thing that brahmans lay down
for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled.

Brahmans, good Gotama,
lay down these five things
for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled.

What does the good Gotama say to this?"

■

"But what, brahman youth?

Is there even a single brahman who speaks thus:

'I, having realised by<sup>14</sup> super-knowledge, declare the result of these five things'?"

"No, good Gotama."

"So what, brahman youth?

Is there a single teacher of brahmans, even a single line of teachers
back through seven generations of teachers, who speaks thus:

'I, having realised by my own super-knowledge,
declare the result of these five things'?"

"No, good Gotama."

"So what, brahman youth?

Even those who were formerly seers of the brahmans,<sup>15</sup> makers of mantras,
preservers of mantras,
whose ancient mantras as sung, taught
and composed
the brahmans of today
still sing,
still speak;
they still speak what was spoken, they still teach what was taught - that is to say (by) Atṭhaka, Vāmaka,
Vāmadeva,

Vessāmitta,
Yamataggi,
Aṅgīrasa,
Bhāradvāja,
Vāsetṭha,
Kassapa,
Bhagu-
do even these speak thus:

'We, having realised by our own super-knowledge,
declare the result of these five things'?"

"No, good Gotama."

■

"So what you are really saying, brahman youth, is that among the brahmans there is not even a single brahman who speaks thus:

'I, having realised by my own super-knowledge,
declare the result of these five things'."

There is not even a single teacher of brahmans, even a single line of teachers
back through seven generations of teachers,
who speaks thus:

'I, having realised by my own super-knowledge,
declare the result of these five things'."

And also that even those who were formerly seers of the brahmans, makers of mantras,
preservers of mantras,
whose ancient mantras as sung,
taught
and composed

the brahmans of today
still sing,
still speak;
they still speak what was spoken,
they still teach what was taught -
that is to say (by) Atṭhaka, Vāmaka,
Vāmadeva,
Vessāmitta,
Yamataggi,
Aṅgīrasa,
Bhāradvāja,
Vāsetṭha,
Kassapa,
Bhagu-
not even these speak thus:

'We, having realised by our own super-knowledge,
declare the result of these five things'."

Brahman youth, it is like a string of blind men<sup>16</sup> holding on to one another - neither does the foremost one see,
nor does the middle one see,
nor does the hindmost one see.

Even so, methinks, brahman youth, do the words of the brahmans turn out to [390] resemble the string of blind men: neither does the first one see
nor does the middle one see nor does the last one see."

■

When this had been said,
the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son,
angry and displeased
at being spoken to by the Lord with the simile of the string of blind men, scorning even the Lord,
despising even the Lord, and saying even of the Lord:

"The recluse Gotama will be disgraced,"<sup>17</sup>
spoke thus to the Lord:

"A brahman, good Gotama, Pokkharasāti, of the Upamanna (clan, incumbent)<sup>18</sup> of the Subhaga forest glade,<sup>19</sup> speaks thus:

'Even thus do some recluses and brahmans claim states of further-men,
the excellent knowledge and vision
befitting the ariyans.

This speech of theirs
proves merely ridiculous, it proves merely worthless,
it proves merely empty, it proves merely void.

For how could a man know or see
or realise
states of further-men,
the excellent knowledge and vision
befitting the ariyans?' - such a situation does not exist."

■

"But, brahman youth, does the brahman Pokkharasāti of the Upamanna (clan, incumbent)
of the Subhaga forest glade, comprehend with his mind
the reasoning in the mind
of absolutely all recluses and brahmins?"

"Good Gotama, the brahman Pokkharasāti of the Upamanna (clan, incumbent)
of the Subhaga forest glade, does not even comprehend with his mind
the reasoning in the mind of Puṇṇikā, his slave woman.

So how could he comprehend with his mind
the reasoning in the mind
of absolutely all recluses and brahmins?" "Brahman youth, it is like<sup>20</sup> a man blind from birth who could not see dark or bright shapes, who could not see green shapes, who could not see yellow shapes, who could not see red shapes, who could not see crimson shapes, who could not see what is even or uneven, who could not see the stars, who could not see the moons and the suns.

He might speak thus:

"There are no dark and bright shapes, there is no one who sees dark and bright shapes, there is no one who sees green shapes, there is no one who sees yellow shapes, there is no one who sees red shapes, there is no one who sees crimson shapes, there is no one who sees what is even or uneven, there is no one who sees the stars, there is no one who sees the moons and the suns.

I do not see this,
therefore it does not exist.'

Would he, brahman youth, in speaking rightly
speak thus?"

"No, good Gotama.

'There are dark and bright shapes, there is one who sees dark and bright shapes;
there are green shapes, there is one who sees green shapes;
there are yellow shapes, there is one who sees yellow shapes;
there are red shapes,
there is one who sees red shapes;
there are crimson shapes, there is one who sees crimson shapes;
there is what is even or uneven, there is one who sees what is even or uneven;
there are stars,
there is one who sees stars;
there are moons and suns, there is one who sees moons and suns.

I do not know this,
I do not [391] see this,
therefore it does not exist' -
in speaking rightly
he would not speak thus, good Gotama."

"In the same way, brahman youth, the brahman Pokkharasāti
of the Upamanna (clan, incumbent)
of the Subhaga forest glade, is blind,
he is without vision.

This situation certainly does not exist - that he might know
or see
or realise
states of further-men,
the excellent knowledge and vision
befitting the ariyans.

■

What do you think about this, brahman youth?

Which is better
for those wealthy brahmans of Kosala, such as the brahman Canki,<sup>21</sup> the brahman Tārukka,
the brahman Pokkharasāti,
the brahman Jāṇussoṇi,
and your father the brahman Todeyya - that the speech they should utter be conventional<sup>22</sup> or unconventional?"

"Conventional, good Gotama."

"Which is better for them, that the speech they should utter be thought out<sup>23</sup> or not thought out?"

"Thought out, good Gotama."

"Which is better for them, that the speech they should utter be considered<sup>24</sup> or not considered?"

"Considered, good Gotama."

"Which is better for them, that the speech they should utter be connected with the goal<sup>25</sup> or not connected with the goal?"

"Connected with the goal, good Gotama."

"What do you think about this, brahman youth?"

This being so,
is the speech uttered by the brahman Pokkharasāti
of the Upamanna (clan, incumbent)
of the Subhaga forest glade, conventional
or unconventional?"

"Unconventional, good Gotama."

"Is the speech uttered thought out,
or not thought out?"

"Not thought out, good Gotama?"

"Is the speech uttered considered or not considered?"

"Not considered, good Gotama."

"Is the speech uttered connected with the goal or not connected with the goal?"

"Not connected with the goal, good Gotama."

■

[392] "These five, brahman youth, are hindrances.

What five?

The hindrance of desire for sense-pleasures, the hindrance of malevolence, the hindrance of sloth and torpor, the hindrance of restlessness and worry, the hindrance of doubt.

These, brahman youth, are the five hindrances.

Brahman youth, the brahman Pokkharasāti,
of the Upamañña (clan, incumbent)
of the Subhaga forest glade, is veiled,
obstructed,
covered and enveloped
by these five hindrances.

This situation certainly does not occur that he should know
or see
or realise
states of further-men,
the excellent knowledge and vision
befitting the ariyans.

■

These five, brahman youth, are the strands of pleasures of the senses:

What five?

Material shapes cognisable by the eye,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

Sounds cognisable by the ear,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

Smells cognisable by the nose,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

Tastes cognisable by the tongue,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

Touches cognisable by the body,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,

enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

These, brahman youth, are the five strands of sense-pleasures.

Brahman youth, the brahman Pokkharasāti
of the Upamañña (clan, incumbent)
of the Subhaga forest glade, is enslaved
and infatuated
by these five strands of sense-pleasures, he is addicted to them, and enjoys them
without seeing the peril (in them), without knowing the escape (from them).

This situation certainly does not occur
that he should know
or see
or realise
states of further-men,
the excellent knowledge and vision
befitting the ariyans.

■

What do you think about this, brahman youth?

Which of these fires would have flame
and hue
and brightness:
the fire that one could kindle from fuel of grass and dry sticks or the fire that one could kindle without fuel of grass and dry sticks?"

"If it were possible, good Gotama, to kindle a fire
without fuel of grass and dry sticks, that fire would have flame
and hue
and brightness."

"That, is impossible, brahman youth,
it cannot come to pass,
that one should kindle a fire without fuel of grass and dry sticks - except through psychic power.<sup>26</sup>

I, brahman youth,
say of this delight
which is a delight on account of the five strands of sense-pleasures, that it is like the fire that burns on account of fuel of grass and dry sticks.

I, brahman youth,
say of this delight
which is a delight apart from pleasures of the senses,
apart from unskilled [393] states of mind,
that it is like the fire that burns because it is without fuel of grass and dry sticks.

And what, brahman youth,
is delight apart from pleasures of the senses,
apart from unskilled states of mind?

As to this, brahman youth, a monk,
aloof from the pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
entering into the first meditation
which is accompanied by initial thought
and discursive thought,

is born of aloofness,
and is rapturous and joyful,
abides in it.

This, brahman youth,
is delight apart from pleasures of the senses,
apart from unskilled states of mind.

And again, monks, a monk,
by allaying initial and discursive thought,
his mind subjectively tranquillised
and fixed on one point,
enters on
and abides in
the second meditation
which is devoid of initial and discursive thought,
is born of concentration
and is rapturous and joyful.

This too, brahman youth,
is delight apart from pleasures of the senses,
apart from unskilled states of mind.

Brahman youth, those brahmans who lay down five things for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled - what is the thing of greatest fruit that these brahmans lay down
for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled?"

"Good Gotama, those brahmans
who lay down five things for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled - renunciation is the thing of greatest fruit that these brahmans lay down

for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled."

"What do you think about this, brahman youth?

Suppose a great sacrifice to be prepared here by a certain brahman, and that two brahmans should come along,
thinking:

'We will enjoy the great sacrifice of the brahman so-and-so'

and that one brahman should think:

'O may I myself
get the best seat in the refectory,<sup>27</sup>
the best drinking water,
the best food;

may that (other) brahman not get the best seat in the refectory,
the best drinking water,
the best food -

the other brahman
is getting the best seat in the refectory,
the best drinking water,
the best food,

I am not getting the best seat in the refectory,
the best drinking water,
the best food;'

thinking thus he is angry and discontented - what result do brahmans lay down for him,

brahman youth?"

"But, as to this, good Gotama, brahmans do not give a gift, thinking:

'Let the other be angry and discontented with this.'

For, as to this,
brahmans give a gift simply out of compassion."

"This being so, brahman youth, is this the sixth method of brahmans for doing good,
that is to say compassion?"

"This being so, good Gotama, this is the sixth method of brahmans
for doing good,
that is to say compassion."

"Brahman youth,
those brahmans who lay down five things
for [394] the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled - where do you observe these five things abundantly: among householders
or among those who have gone forth?"

"Good Gotama, these five things that brahmans lay down
for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled -
I observe these five things abundantly in those who have gone forth, little among householders.

For a householder, good Gotama,
having a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,
great problems -
is not constantly and consistently a truth-speaker.

But one who has gone forth, good Gotama, having not a great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -
is constantly and consistently a truth-speaker.

■

A householder, good Gotama,
having a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,
great problems -
is not constantly and consistently a man of austerity.

But one who has gone forth, good Gotama,
having not a great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -
is constantly and consistently a 'bumer-up,'<sup>28</sup>.

■

A householder, good Gotama,
having a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,

great problems -
is not constantly and consistently a chaste man.

But one who has gone forth, good Gotama,
having not a great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -
is constantly and consistently a Brahma-farer<sup>29</sup>.

■

A householder, good Gotama,
having a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,
great problems -
is not constantly and consistently intent on study.

But one who has gone forth, good Gotama,
having not a great deal to do:
few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -
is constantly and consistently intent on study.

■

A householder, good Gotama,
having a great deal to do:
many duties,
a large administration,
great problems -
is not constantly and consistently intent on renunciation.

But one who has gone forth, good Gotama,
having not a great deal to do:

few duties,
a small administration,
small problems -
is constantly and consistently intent on renunciation.

■

Those five things, good Gotama, that recluses and brahmans lay down
for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled -
I observe these five things abundantly among those who have gone forth, little among householders."

"Those five things, brahman youth, that brahmans lay down for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled,
I say that these are equipments<sup>30</sup> of the mind,
that is to say
for developing a mind
that is without enmity,
without malevolence.

Here, brahman youth,
a monk is a truth-speaker.

He, thinking,

'I am a truthspeaker'

acquires knowledge of the goal,<sup>31</sup> acquires knowledge of dhamma,
acquires the rapture which is connected with dhamma.

I say of that rapture
which is connected with what is skilled<sup>32</sup>

that it is an equipment of the mind,
that is to say
for developing a mind
that is without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

Here, brahman youth,
a monk is a burner-up.

He, thinking,

'I am a burner-up'

acquires knowledge of the goal,
acquires knowledge of dhamma,
acquires the rapture which is connected with dhamma.

I say of that rapture
which is connected with what is skilled
that it is an equipment of the mind,
that is to say
for developing a mind
that is without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

Here, brahman youth,
a monk is a Brahma-farer.

He, thinking,

'I am a Brahma-farer'

acquires knowledge of the goal,
acquires knowledge of dhamma,
acquires the rapture which is connected with dhamma.

I say of that rapture
which is connected with what is skilled
that it is an equipment of the mind,
that is to say
for developing a mind
that is without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

Here, brahman youth,
a monk is intent on study.

He, thinking,

'I am intent on study'

acquires knowledge of the goal,
acquires knowledge of dhamma,
acquires the rapture which is connected with dhamma.

I say of that rapture
which is connected with what is skilled
that it is an equipment of the mind,
that is to say
for developing a mind
that is without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

Here, brahman youth,
a monk is intent on renunciation.

He, thinking,

'I am intent on renunciation'

acquires knowledge of the goal,
acquires knowledge of dhamma,
acquires the rapture which is connected with dhamma.

I say of that rapture
which is connected with what is skilled
that it is an equipment [395] of the mind,
that is to say
for developing a mind
that is without enmity,
without malevolence.

---

When this had been said,
the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son,
spoke thus to the Lord:

"I have heard, good Gotama, that the recluse Gotama knows
the way to companionship with Brahmā." 33

"What do you think about this, brahman youth?

Is Naḷakāra village near here?

Is Naḷakāra village not far from here?"

"Yes, sir, Naḷakāra village is near here, Naḷakāra village is not far from here."

"What do you think about this, brahman youth?

Suppose a man had been born and bred here in Naḷakāra village, and that someone were to ask him who had never up to that time left Naḷakāra village the way to Naḷakāra village - would that man who had been born and bred in Naḷakāra village hesitate
or be at a loss
when asked the way to Naḷakāra village?"

"No, good Gotama.

What is the reason for this?

It is that that man was born and bred in Naḷakāra village; so all the roads to Naḷakāra village are well known to him."

"Yet, brahman youth, there might be hesitation or being at a loss for that man who was born and bred in Naḷakāra village on being asked the way to Naḷakāra village.

But for the Tathāgata there is neither hesitation nor being at a loss when he is asked about the Brahma-world or the course leading to the Brahma-world.

And I, brahman youth, comprehend Brahmā
and the Brahma-world and the course leading to the Brahma-world;

and that according to the faring is the uprising in the Brahma-world, that too I comprehend."

"I have heard, good Gotama, that the recluse Gotama teaches the way to companionship with Brahmā.

It would be good
if the revered Gotama would teach me
the way to companionship with Brahmā."

"Well then, brahman youth, listen
and attend carefully,
and I will speak."

"Yes, sir,"
the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son, answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"And what, brahman youth,
is the way to companionship with [396] Brahmā?

As to this, brahman youth, a monk dwells, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of friendliness,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,

with a mind of friendliness
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

When, brahman youth,
the freedom of mind that is friendliness
has been developed thus,
that deed which is done in a limited range
does not rest there,
does not remain there.<sup>34</sup>

Brahman youth,
as a stout conch-blower informs the four quarters
without any difficulty,
so, brahman youth,
when the freedom of mind that is friendliness
has been developed thus,
that deed which is done in a limited range
does not rest there,
does not remain there.

This, brahman youth,
is a way to companionship with Brahmā.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of compassion,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;

he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of compassion
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

When, brahman youth,
the freedom of mind that is compassion
has been developed thus,
that deed which is done in a limited range
does not rest there,
does not remain there.

Brahman youth,
as a stout conch-blower informs the four quarters
without any difficulty,
so, brahman youth,
when the freedom of mind that is compassion
has been developed thus,
that deed which is done in a limited range
does not rest there,
does not remain there.

This, brahman youth,
is a way to companionship with Brahmā.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of sympathetic joy,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;

just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of sympathetic joy
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

When, brahman youth,
the freedom of mind that is sympathetic joy
has been developed thus,
that deed which is done in a limited range
does not rest there,
does not remain there.

Brahman youth,
as a stout conch-blower informs the four quarters
without any difficulty,
so, brahman youth,
when the freedom of mind that is sympathetic joy
has been developed thus,
that deed which is done in a limited range
does not rest there,
does not remain there.

This, brahman youth,
is a way to companionship with Brahmā.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of equanimity,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of equanimity
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

When, brahman youth,
the freedom of mind that is equanimity
has been developed thus,
that deed which is done in a limited range
does not rest there,
does not remain there.

Brahman youth,
as a stout conch-blower informs the four quarters
without any difficulty,
so, brahman youth,
when the freedom of mind that is equanimity
has been developed thus,
that deed which is done in a limited range
does not rest there,
does not remain there.

This, brahman youth,
is a way to companionship with Brahmā.

When this had been said,
the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son
spoke thus to the Lord:

"It is excellent, good Gotama,
excellent, good Gotama.

It is as if, good Gotama,
one might set upright what had been upset,
or might disclose what was covered,
or point out the way
to one who had gone astray,
or might bring an oil-lamp into the darkness
so that those with vision might see material shapes -
even so is dhamma made clear
in many a figure by the good Gotama.

I am going to the revered Gotama for refuge,
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the revered Gotama accept me
as a lay-follower,
one gone for refuge from today forth
for as long as life lasts."

But, please, good Gotama, we are going now,
we are very busy
and there is much to be done."

"You must do now, brahman youth, that for which you deem it to be the right time."

Then the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son,
having rejoiced in what the Lord had said,
having given thanks,

rising from his seat,
having greeted the Lord,
departed keeping his right side towards him.

Now at that time the brahman Jāṇussoṇi was leaving Sāvattḥī early in the day in a chariot (drawn by) all-white mules.

The brahman Jāṇussoṇi saw the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son,
coming in the distance;
and seeing him,
he spoke thus to the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son:

"Now, where is the good Bhāradvāja coming from so early in the day?"

"I, sir, am coming from the recluse Gotama."

"What do you think about this, good Bhāradvāja?

Has the recluse Gotama lucidity of wisdom?

Do you think him clever?"<sup>35</sup>

"But who am I, sir, that I should know whether the recluse Gotama has lucidity of wisdom?

Surely only one like him could know whether the recluse Gotama has lucidity of wisdom?"

"Undoubtedly it is with lofty praise that the revered Bhāradvāja praises the recluse Gotama."

"But who am I that I should praise the recluse Gotama?"

Praised by the praised is the revered Gotama, chief among devas and men.

And, sir,
the recluse Gotama speaks of those five things that brahmans lay down
for the doing of good,
for success in what is skilled,
as equipments of the mind, that is for developing a mind that is without enmity, without malevolence."

When this had been said,
the brahman Jāṇussoṇi,
having got down from his chariot (drawn by) all-white mules, having arranged his upper cloth over one shoulder,
having saluted the Lord with joined palms,
uttered this solemn utterance:

"It is a gain for King Pasenadi of Kosala, it is well gotten by King Pasenadi of Kosala [398] that the Tathāgata,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One, is staying in his kingdom."<sup>36</sup>

Discourse with Subha:
The Ninth

---

<sup>1</sup> The Subha Sutta at D. i. 204 ff. records a conversation between Subha and Ānanda soon after the Buddha's death. See also M. Sta. 135, the real name for which, according to Bu., is also Subhasutta. See DA. 384f. Todeyya was a rich brahman, overlord of a village named Tudi not far from Sāvattḥī.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. D. i. 47.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. M. i. 502 (above, p. 182).

<sup>4</sup> vibhajjavādo, speak analysing.

<sup>5</sup> na ekam savādo, do not make a definite assertion, do not speak one-sidedly.

<sup>6</sup> Cf. A. i. 69.

<sup>7</sup> kammaṭṭhāna.

<sup>8</sup> appaṭṭha; cf. A. iii. 120.

<sup>9</sup> appakiccha; cf. A. iii. 120; It. p. 72; Sn. 144.

<sup>10</sup> pañca dhamme.

<sup>11</sup> kiriyāya, or causally effecting, hence Gotama's question, just below, whether any result (vipāka, ripening) is declared.

<sup>12</sup> brahmacariya. MA. iii. 448 gives chastity. Cf. MA. iii. 443, VbhA. 504, SnA. 317, 387.

<sup>13</sup> ajjhena; MA. iii 448 says mantagahaṇa, perhaps "reciting."

<sup>14</sup> sayam omitted here, probably in error.

<sup>15</sup> As at M. ii. 169.

<sup>16</sup> As at M. ii. 170.

<sup>17</sup> Cf. M. ii. 43.

<sup>18</sup> MA. iii. 447, issara, lord, master.

<sup>19</sup> Near Ukkatṭha, MA. iii. 447. Pokkharasāti was a resident of this place, DA. 399.

<sup>20</sup> Cf. M. i. 509.

<sup>21</sup> These five brahmans are also mentioned at the beginning of Sta. 98.

<sup>22</sup> sammusā = samuccā, as what is agreed upon by the opinion of the world; by common consent.

<sup>23</sup> mantā; at MA. iii. 447 explained by tulayitvā, weighed, and by parigaṇhitvā, examined.

<sup>24</sup> patisaṅkhāya = jānitvā, MA. iii. 447.

<sup>25</sup> atthasaṃhitā = kāraṇanissitā, dependent on action (?).

<sup>26</sup> As at the pāṭihāriya when Gotama kindled the matted-hair ascetics' firewood at Vin. i. 31.

<sup>27</sup> Cf. M. i. 28 (M.L.S. i. 35).

<sup>28</sup> tapassin, burning up wrong states of mind; "man of austerity" better suits the brahman mode of life.

<sup>29</sup> brahma-cārin also means chaste.

<sup>30</sup> parikkhāra; cf. citta-parikkhāra at A. iv. 62.

<sup>31</sup> Cf. M. i. 37.

<sup>32</sup> kusalāpasamhita, as at S. ii. 220.

<sup>33</sup> Cf. M. ii. 194; D. i. 249.

<sup>34</sup> See also D. i. 251; S. iv. 322; A. v. 299; and cf. Jā. ii. 61 f. which regards pamāṇa as equivalent to paritta, small. All the Comys. (except Jā. ii. 62) take pamāṇakata kamma as equivalent to kāmāvacara, "that which pertains to the senses and their corresponding objects." It seems that the small deed or the deed done in the limited range (such as is being thought of in this context) cannot remain and give its own result unless it is "covered" (ajjhottharivā) by a large deed.

<sup>35</sup> This passage, to "devas and men," also at M. i. 175.

<sup>36</sup> Such a "gain" is karmic in its nature.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
II. Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa
5. Brāhmaṇa Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
II. The Middle Fifty Discourses
5. The Division on Brahmins

100. Discourse with Saṅgārava

Saṅgārava Sutta

---

Thus have I heard:

At one time the Lord was walking on tour among the Kosalans together with a large Order of monks.

Now at that time the brahman lady called Dhānañjānī,<sup>2</sup> who had confident belief in the Awakened One, in dhamma and in the Order, was residing in Caṇḍalakappa.<sup>3</sup>

Then the brahman lady Dhānañjānī, having tripped,<sup>4</sup> three times uttered this solemn utterance:

"Praise to that Lord, perfected One,

fully Self-Awakened One.

Praise to that Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

Praise to that Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One."

Now at that time the brahman youth Saṅgārava was residing in Caṇḍalakappa;
he was master of the three Vedas,<sup>5</sup>
versed in the vocabularies and rituals
together with the phonology and exegesis
and the legendary tradition as the fifth;
he was learned in idioms,
a grammarian,
proficient in popular philosophy
and the marks of a Great Man.

The brahman youth Saṅgārava heard what the brahman lady [399] Dhānañjānī was saying;
on hearing it
he spoke thus to the brahman lady Dhānañjānī:

"This brahman lady Dhānañjānī is mean, this brahman lady Dhānañjānī is disgraced in that,
while there are brahmans in existence, she speaks in praise of this little shaveling recluse."

"But do not you, dear learned friend,<sup>6</sup> know this Lord's moral habit and wisdom?<sup>7</sup>

If you, dear learned friend, were to know this Lord's moral habit and wisdom, you, dear learned friend, would not consider that this Lord should be abused and reviled."

"Well then, lady,
if the recluse Gotama arrives in Caṇḍalakappa, you might let me know."

"Yes, learned friend," the brahman lady Dhānañjānī answered the brahman youth Saṅgārava in assent.

Then as the Lord was walking on tour among the Kosalans he gradually arrived at Caṇḍalakappa.

While he was there
the Lord stayed in the mango grove of the brahmans of Tudi.<sup>8</sup>

Then the brahman lady Dhānañjānī heard that the Lord had arrived at Caṇḍalakappa and was staying in the mango grove of the brahmans of Tudi.

Then the brahman lady Dhānañjānī approached the brahman youth Saṅgārava;
having approached,
she spoke thus to the brahman youth Saṅgārava:

"Dear learned friend,
this Lord has arrived at Caṇḍalakappa and is staying in the mango grove
of the brahmans of Tudi.

Dear learned friend,
you must do now that for which you think it the right time."

"Yes, lady,"
and the brahman youth Saṅgāraḥa, having answered the brahman lady Dhānañjānī in assent,
approached the Lord;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the Lord;
having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Saṅgāraḥa the brahman youth
spoke thus to the Lord:

"There are, good Gotama, some recluses and brahmans who claim that, in regard to the fundamentals of the Brahma-faring,<sup>9</sup> they [400] have attained here-now
to excellence
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.<sup>10</sup>

Among those recluses and brahmans, good Gotama, who claim that,
in regard to the fundamentals of the Brahma-faring,
they have attained here-now
to excellence
and to going beyond through super-knowledge - of which (sort) is the revered Gotama?"

"I, Bhāradvāja, say that there is a difference among those who claim that,
in regard to the fundamentals of the Brahma-faring,

they have attained here-now
to excellence
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

There are, Bhāradvāja,
some recluses and brahmans who depend on report;<sup>11</sup> these claim that it is through report that, in regard to the fundamentals of the Brahma-faring,
they have attained here-now
to excellence
and to going beyond through super-knowledge - such as the three-Veda-brahmans.

But there are, Bhāradvāja,
some recluses and brahmans who with only mere faith claim that,
in regard to the fundamentals of the Brahma-faring,
they have attained here-now
to excellence
and to going beyond through super-knowledge - such as reasoners and investigators.<sup>12</sup>

There are, Bhāradvāja,
some recluses and brahmans
who by fully understanding dhamma of themselves only,<sup>13</sup> although these truths had not been heard before,<sup>14</sup>
claim that,
in regard to the fundamentals of the Brahma-faring,
they have attained here-now
to excellence
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

Now, Bhāradvāja,
I am one of those recluses and brahmans
who by fully understanding dhamma
of themselves only,
although these truths had not been heard before,
claim that,
in regard to the fundamentals of the Brahma-faring,
they have attained here-now
to excellence
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

You must understand it in this way, Bhāradvāja, that I am one of those recluses and brahmans
who by fully understanding dhamma
of themselves only,
although these truths had not been heard before,
claim that,
in regard to the fundamentals of the Brahma-faring,
they have attained here-now
to excellence
and to going beyond through super-knowledge.

As to this,<sup>15</sup> Bhāradvāja, before my Self-awakening while I was still [401] the bodhisatta,
not fully awakened,
it occurred to me:

Narrow is the household life, a path of dust,
going forth is in the open, nor is it easy
while dwelling in a house to lead the Brahma-faring
completely fulfilled,

completely purified,
polished like a conch-shell.

Suppose now that I,
having cut off hair and beard,
having donned saffron garments,
should go forth from home into homelessness?

So I, Bhāradvāja,
after a time,
being young,
my hair coal-black,
possessed of radiant youth,
in the prime of my life —
although my unwilling parents wept and wailed — having cut off my hair and beard, having put on yellow robes, went forth from home into homelessness.

I, being gone forth thus,
a quester for whatever is good,
searching for the incomparable,
matchless path to peace,
approached Āḷāra the Kālāma;
having approached,
I spoke thus to Āḷāra the Kālāma:

'I, reverend Kālāma, want to fare the Brahmā-faring
in this dhamma and discipline.'

This said, Bhāradvāja, Āḷāra the Kālāma spoke thus to me:

'Let the venerable one proceed;
this dhamma is such that an intelligent man,
having soon realised super-knowledge for himself (as learnt from) his own teacher,
may enter on and abide in it.'

So I, Bhāradvāja, very soon,
very quickly,
mastered that dhamma.

I, Bhāradvāja, as far as mere lip service,
mere repetition
were concerned,
spoke the doctrine of knowledge,
and the doctrine of the elders,
and I claimed —
I as well as others —
that 'I know, I see.'

Then it occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'But Āḷāra the Kālāma does not merely proclaim this dhamma
simply out of faith:
Having realised super-knowledge for myself,
entering on it,
I am abiding therein.

For surely Āḷāra the Kālāma proceeds knowing, seeing this dhamma.'

Then did I, Bhāradvāja,
approach Āḷāra the Kālāma;
having approached,
I spoke thus to Āḷāra the Kālāma:

'To what extent do you, reverend Kālāma,
having realised super-knowledge for yourself,
entering thereon,
proclaim this dhamma?'

When this had been said, Bhāradvāja, Āḷāra the Kālāma proclaimed the plane of no-thing.

Then it occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'It is not only Āḷāra the Kālāma who has faith,
I too have faith.

It is not only Āḷāra the Kālāma who has energy,
I too have energy.

It is not only Āḷāra the Kālāma who has mindfulness,
I too have mindfulness.

It is not only Āḷāra the Kālāma who has concentration,
I too have concentration.

It is not only Āḷāra the Kālāma who has intuitive wisdom,
I too have intuitive wisdom.

Suppose now that I should strive
for the realisation of that dhamma
which Āḷāra the Kālāma proclaims:
'Having realised super-knowledge for myself,
entering on it
I am abiding therein?'

So I, Bhāradvāja, very soon,
very quickly,
having realised super-knowledge for myself,
entering on that dhamma,
abided therein.

Then I, Bhāradvāja,
approached Āḷāra the Kālāma;
having approached,
I spoke thus to Āḷāra the Kālāma:

'Is it to this extent
that you, reverend Kalama,
proclaim this dhamma,

entering on it,
having realised it by your own super-knowledge?'

'It is to this extent
that I, your reverence,
proclaim this dhamma,
entering on it,
having realised it by my own super-knowledge.'

'I too, your reverence,
having realised this dhamma
by my own super-knowledge,
entering on it
am abiding in it.'

'It is profitable for us,
it is well gotten for us, your reverence,
that we see a fellow Brahmā-farer
such as the venerable one.

This dhamma that I, entering on,
proclaim,
having realised it by my own super-knowledge,
is the dhamma that you,
entering on,
are abiding in,
having realised it by your own super-knowledge;
the dhamma that you,
entering on,
are abiding in,
having realised it by your own super-knowledge,
is the dhamma that I,
entering on,
proclaim,
having realised it by my own super-knowledge.

The dhamma that I know,
this is the dhamma that you know.

The dhamma that you know,
this is the dhamma that I know.

As I am,
so are you;
as you are,
so am I.

Come now, your reverence,
being just the two of us,
let us look after this group.'

In this way, Bhāradvāja, did Āḷāra the Kālāma,
being my teacher,
set me — the pupil —
on the same level as himself
and honoured me with the highest honour.

Then it occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'This dhamma does not conduce to disregard nor to dispassion
nor to stopping
nor to tranquillity
nor to super-knowledge
nor to awakening
nor to Nibbāna,
but only as far as reaching the plane of no-thing.'

So I, Bhāradvāja,
not getting enough from this dhamma,
disregarded and turned away from this dhamma.

---

Then I, Bhāradvāja,
a quester for whatever is good,
searching for the incomparable,
matchless path to peace,
approached Uddaka, Rāma's son;
having approached,
I spoke thus to Uddaka, Rāma's son:

'I, your reverence,
want to fare the Brahmā-faring
in this dhamma and discipline.'

This said, Bhāradvāja, Uddaka, Rāma's son,
spoke thus to me:

'Let the venerable one proceed;
this dhamma is such
that an intelligent man,
having soon realised super-knowledge for himself, (as learnt from) his own teacher,
may enter on and abide in it.'

So I, Bhāradvāja, very soon,
very quickly,
mastered that dhamma.

I, Bhāradvāja, as far as mere lip service,
mere repetition were concerned,
spoke the doctrine of knowledge
and the doctrine of the elders,
and I claimed —

I as well as others —
that 'I know, I see.'

Then it occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'But Uddahka, Rāma's son, does not merely proclaim this dhamma simply out of faith:
Having realised super-knowledge for myself,
entering on it,
I am abiding in it.

For surely Uddaka, Rāma's son,
proceeds knowing and seeing this dhamma.'

Then did I, Bhāradvāja,
approach Uddaka, Rāma's;
having approached,
I spoke thus to Uddaka, Rāma's son:

'To what extent do you, reverend Rāma,
having realised super-knowledge for yourself,
entering thereon
proclaim this dhamma?'

When this had been said, Bhāradvāja, Uddahka, Rāma's son, proclaimed the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.

Then it occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'It is not only Rāma who has faith,
I too have faith.

It is not only Rāma who has energy,
I too have energy.

It is not only Rāma who has mindfulness,
I too have mindfulness.

It is not only Rāma who has concentration,
I too have concentration.

It is not only Rāma who has intuitive wisdom,
I too have intuitive wisdom.

Suppose now that I should strive for the realisation of that dhamma
which Rāma proclaims:

'Having realised super-knowledge for myself,
entering on it
I am abiding in it?'

So I, Bhāradvāja, very soon,
very quickly,
having realised super-knowledge for myself,
entering on that dhamma,
abided therein.

Then I, Bhāradvāja,
approached Uddaka, Rāma's son;
having approached,
I spoke thus to Uddaka, Rāma's son:

'Is it to this extent
that you, reverend Rāma,
proclaim this dhamma,
entering on it,
having realised it by your own super-knowledge?'

'It is to this extent
that I, your reverence,
proclaim this dhamma,
entering on it,
having realised it by my own super-knowledge.'

'I too, your reverence,
having realised this dhamma by my own super-knowledge,

entering on it
am abiding in it.'

'It is profitable for us,
it is well gotten by us,
your reverence,
that we see a fellow-Brahmā-farer such as the venerable one.

This dhamma that I,
entering on,
proclaim,
having realised it by my own super-knowledge,
is the dhamma that you,
entering on,
are abiding in,
having realised it by your own super-knowledge;
the dhamma that you,
entering on,
are abiding in,
having realised it by your own super-knowledge,
is the dhamma that I,
entering on,
proclaim,
having realised it by my own super-knowledge.

The dhamma that I know,
this is the dhamma that you know.

That dhamma that you know,
this is the dhamma that I know.

As I am,
so are you;
as you are,
so am I.

Come now, your reverence,
being just the two of us,
let us look after this group.

In this way, Bhāradvāja, did Uddaka, Rāma's son,
being my teacher,
set me — the pupil —
on the same level as himself
and honoured me with the highest honour.

Then it occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'This dhamma does not conduce to disregard nor to dispassion
nor to stopping
nor to tranquillity
nor to super-knowledge
nor to awakening
nor to Nibbāna,
but only as far as reaching the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-
perception.'

So I, Bhāradvāja, not getting enough from this dhamma, disregarded and turned away from this dhamma.

---

Then I, monks, a quester for whatever is good,
searching for the incomparable,
matchless path to peace,
walking on tour through Magadha
in due course arrived at Uruvela,
the camp township.

There I saw a delightful stretch of land
and a lovely woodland grove,
and a clear flowing river
with a delightful ford,
and a village for support nearby.

It occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'Indeed it is a delightful stretch of land,
and the woodland grove is lovely,
and the river flows clear
with a delightful ford,
and there is a village for support nearby.

Indeed this does well
for the striving
of a young man set on striving.'

Moreover, Bhāradvāja, three similes occurred to me spontaneously,
never heard before:

It is as if there were a wet sappy stick placed in water;
then a man might come along
bringing an upper piece of fire-stick,
and thinking:

'I will light a fire,
I will get heat.'

What do you think about this, Bhāradvāja?

Could that man, bringing an upper piece of fire-stick,
and rubbing that wet sappy stick
that had been placed in water (with it),
light a fire,
could he get heat?"

"No, good Gotama.

What is the cause of this?

It is, good Gotama,
that such a stick is wet and sappy
and that it was placed in water.

That man would only get fatigue and distress."

"In like manner, Bhāradvāja,
whatever recluses or brahmans dwell not aloof
from pleasures of the senses that are bodily,
then if that which is for them,
among the sense-pleasures,
desire for sense-pleasure,
affection for sense-pleasure,
infatuation with sense-pleasure,
thirst for sense-pleasure,
fever for sense-pleasure -
if that is not properly got rid of subjectively
nor properly allayed,
whether these worthy recluses and brahmans experience feelings which are
acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe,
they could not become those for knowledge,
for vision,
for the incomparable Self-awakening;
and whether these worthy recluses and brahmans do not experience feelings
which are acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe,
they could not become those for knowledge,

for vision,
for the incomparable Self-awakening.

This, Bhāradvāja, was the first parable
that occurred to me spontaneously, never heard before.

■

Then, Bhāradvāja, a second parable occurred to me spontaneously,
never heard before.

It is as if, Bhāradvāja, a wet, sappy stick
were placed on dry ground,
far from water.

Then a man might come along
bringing an upper piece of fire-stick,
and thinking:

'I will light a fire,
I will get heat.'

What do you think about this, Bhāradvāja?

Could that man,
bringing an upper piece of fire-stick,
and rubbing that wet sappy stick
that had been placed on the dry ground,
far from water,
light a fire,
could he get heat?"|| ||

"No, good Gotama.

What is the cause of this?

It is, good Gotama, that that stick is wet and sappy
although it had been placed on dry ground,
far from water.

So that man would only get fatigue and distress."

"In like manner, Bhāradvāja,
whatever recluses or brahmans dwell not aloof
from pleasures of the senses that are bodily,
then if that which is for them,
among the sense-pleasures,
desire for sense-pleasure,
affection for sense-pleasure,
infatuation with sense-pleasure,
thirst for sense-pleasure,
fever for sense-pleasure -
if that is not properly got rid of subjectively
nor properly allayed,
whether these worthy recluses and brahmans experience feelings which are
acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe,
they could not become those for knowledge,
for vision,
for the incomparable Self-awakening;
and whether these worthy recluses and brahmans do not experience feelings
which are acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe,
they could not become those for knowledge,
for vision,
for the incomparable Self-awakening.

This, Bhāradvāja, was the second parable that occurred to me spontaneously, never heard before.

■

Then, Bhāradvāja, a third parable occurred to me spontaneously, never heard before.

It is as if, Bhāradvāja, a dry sapless stick were placed on the dry ground, far from water.

Then a man might come along bringing an upper piece of fire-stick, and thinking:

'I will light a fire,
I will get heat.'

What do you think about this, Bhāradvāja?

Could that man, bringing an upper piece of fire-stick, and rubbing that dry sapless stick that had been placed on dry ground, far from water, light a fire, could he get heat?"

"Yes, good Gotama.

What is the cause of this?

It is, good Gotama, that that stick was dry and sapless

and had been placed on dry ground
far from water."

"In like manner, Bhāradvāja,
whatever recluses or brahmans dwell aloof
from pleasures of the senses that are bodily,
then if that which is for them,
among the sense-pleasures,
desire for sense-pleasure,
affection for sense-pleasure,
infatuation with sense-pleasure,
thirst for sense-pleasure,
fever for sense-pleasure -
if this is well got rid of subjectively,
well allayed,
then whether these worthy recluses and brahmans experience feelings that
are acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe,
indeed they become those for knowledge,
for vision,
for the incomparable Self-awakening;
and whether these worthy recluses and brahmans do not experience feelings
that are acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe,
indeed they become those for knowledge,
for vision,
for the incomparable Self-awakening.

This, Bhāradvāja, was the third parable
that occurred to me spontaneously,
never heard before.

These, Bhāradvāja, were the three parables
that occurred to me spontaneously, never heard before.

---

It occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'Suppose now that I,
with my teeth clenched,
with my tongue pressed against the palate,
by mind should subdue,
restrain and dominate my mind?'

So I, Bhāradvāja, with my teeth clenched,
with my tongue pressed against the palate,
by mind subdued,
restrained
and dominated my mind.

While I was subduing,
restraining
and dominating my mind,
with the teeth clenched,
the tongue pressed against the palate,
sweat poured from my armpits.

It is as if, Bhāradvāja,
a strong man,
having taken hold of a weaker man
by his head or shoulders,
would subdue,
restrain
and dominate him.

Even so, while I, Bhāradvāja,
was subduing,
restraining
and dominating my mind by mind,
with my teeth clenched,
with my tongue pressed against the palate,
sweat poured from my armpits.

Although, Bhāradvāja, unsluggish energy came to be stirred up in me,
unmuddled mindfulness set up,
yet my body was turbulent,
not calmed,
because I was harassed in striving
by striving against that very pain.

It occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'Suppose now that I should meditate
the non-breathing meditation?

So I, Bhāradvāja,
stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose.

When I, Bhāradvāja,
had stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose,
there came to be an exceedingly loud noise
of winds escaping by the auditory passages.

As there comes to be an exceedingly loud noise
from the roaring of a smith's bellows, even so when I, Bhāradvāja, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose,

there came to be an exceedingly loud noise
of wind escaping by the auditory passages.

Although, Bhāradvāja, unsluggish energy came to be stirred up in me,
unmuddled mindfulness set up,
yet my body was turbulent,
not calmed,
because I was harassed in striving
by striving against that very pain.

It occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'Suppose now that I should still meditate
the non-breathing meditation?'

So I, Bhāradvāja, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears.

When I, Bhāradvāja, had stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
exceedingly loud winds rent my head.

As, Bhāradvāja, a strong man
might cleave one's head
with a sharp-edged sword, even so when I, Bhāradvāja, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
exceedingly loud winds rent my head.

Although, Bhāradvāja, unsluggish energy came to be stirred up in me,
unmuddled mindfulness set up,

yet my body was turbulent,
not calmed,
because I was harassed in striving
by striving against that very pain.

It occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'Suppose that I should still meditate
the non-breathing meditation?'

So I, Bhāradvāja, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears.

When I, Bhāradvāja, had stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
I came to have very bad headaches.

As, Bhāradvāja, a strong man
might clamp a turban on one's head
with a tight leather strap, even so when I, Bhāradvāja, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
did I come to have very bad headaches.

Although, Bhāradvāja, unsluggish energy came to be stirred up in me,
unmuddled mindfulness set up,
yet my body was turbulent,
not calmed,
because I was harassed in striving
by striving against that very pain.

It occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'Suppose now that I should still meditate
the non-breathing meditation?'

So I, Bhāradvāja, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears.

When I, Bhāradvāja, had stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
very strong winds cut through my stomach.

As, Bhāradvāja, a skilled cattle-butcher or his apprentice
might cut through the stomach
with a sharp butcher's knife, even so, Bhāradvāja, did very strong winds
cut through my stomach.

Although, Bhāradvāja, unsluggish energy came to be stirred up in me,
unmuddled mindfulness set up,
yet my body was turbulent,
not calmed,
because I was harassed in striving
by striving against that very pain.

It occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'Suppose now that I should still meditate
the non-breathing meditation?'

So I, Bhāradvāja, stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth

and through the nose
and through the ears.

When I, Bhāradvāja, had stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
there came to be a fierce heat in my body.

As, Bhāradvāja, two strong men,
having taken hold of a weaker man by his limbs,
might set fire to him,
might make him sizzle up
over a charcoal pit,
even so, Bhāradvāja,
when I had stopped breathing in and breathing out
through the mouth
and through the nose
and through the ears,
did there come to be a fierce heat in my body.

Although, Bhāradvāja, unsluggish energy came to be stirred up in me,
unmuddled mindfulness set up,
yet my body was turbulent,
not calmed,
because I was harassed in striving
by striving against that very pain.

In addition to this, Bhāradvāja,
devatās, having seen me, spoke thus:

'The recluse Gotama has passed away.'

Other devatās spoke thus;

'The recluse Gotama has not passed away,
but he is passing away.'

Other devatās spoke thus:

'The recluse Gotama has not passed away,
nor is he passing away;
the recluse Gotama is a perfected one,
the mode of living of a perfected one
is just like this.'

It occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'Suppose now that I should take the line
of desisting from all food?'

Then, Bhāradvāja, devatās,
having approached me,
spoke thus:

'Do not, good sir,
take the line of desisting from all food.

If you, good sir,
take the line of desisting from all food,
then we will give you deva-like essences
to take in through the pores of the skin;
you will keep going by means of them.'

Then, Bhāradvāja, it occurred to me:

'Suppose that I should take the line
of not eating anything,
and these devatās were to give me deva-like essences
to take in through the pores of the skin,
and that I should keep going by means of them,
that would be an imposture in me.'

So I, Bhāradvāja, rejected those devatās
I said,

'Enough.'

It occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'Suppose now that I were to take food
little by little,
drop by drop,
such as bean-soup
or vetch-soup
or chick-pea-soup
or pea-soup?

So I, Bhāradvāja, took food
little by little,
drop by drop,
such as bean-soup
or vetch-soup
or chick-pea-soup
or pea-soup.

While I, Bhāradvāja, was taking food
little by little,
drop by drop,
such as bean-soup
or vetch-soup
or chick-pea-soup
or pea-soup,
my body became exceedingly emaciated.

Because I ate so little,
all my limbs became like the joints of withered creepers;
because I ate so little,
my buttocks became like a bullock's hoof;
because I ate so little,
my protruding backbone
became like a string of balls;

because I ate so little,
my gaunt ribs
became like the crazy rafters
of a tumble-down shed;
because I ate so little,
the pupils of my eyes
appeared lying low and deep;
because I ate so little,
my scalp became shrivelled and shrunk
as a bitter white gourd
cut before it is ripe
becomes shrivelled and shrunk by a hot wind.

If I, Bhāradvāja, thought:

'I will touch the skin of my belly,'
it was my backbone that I took hold of.

If I thought:

'I will touch my backbone,'
it was the skin of my belly that I took hold of.

For because I ate so little,
the skin of my belly, Bhāradvāja,
came to be cleaving to my backbone.

If I, Bhāradvāja, thought:

'I will obey the calls of nature,'
I fell down on my face then and there,
because I ate so little.

If I, Bhāradvāja, soothing my body, stroked my limbs with my hand,
the hairs,
rotted at the roots,

fell away from my body
as I stroked my limbs with my hand,
because I ate so little.

And further, Bhāradvāja, men,
having seen me,
spoke thus:

'The recluse Gotama is black.'

Other men spoke thus:

'The recluse Gotama is not black,
the recluse Gotama is deep brown.'

Some men spoke thus:

'The recluse Gotama is not black,
he is not even deep brown,
the recluse Gotama is of a sallow colour.'

To such an extent, Bhāradvāja, was my clear pure complexion
spoilt because I ate so little.

This, Bhāradvāja, occurred to me:

'Some recluses and brahmans
in the past
have experienced feelings that were acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe;
but this is paramount,
nor is there worse than this.'

And some recluses and brahmans
in the future
will experience feelings that are acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe;
but this is paramount,
nor is there worse than this.

And some recluses and brahmans
are now
experiencing feelings that are acute,
painful,
sharp,
severe;
but this is paramount,
nor is there worse than this.

But I,
by this severe austerity,
do not reach states of further-men,
the excellent knowledge and vision
befitting the ariyans.

Could there be another way to awakening?

This, Bhāradvāja, occurred to me:

'I know that while my father, the Sakyan,
was ploughing,
and I was sitting in the cool shade of a rose-apple tree,
aloof from pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
entering on the first meditation,
which is accompanied by initial thought
and discursive thought,

is born of aloofness,
and is rapturous and joyful,
and while abiding therein,
I thought:

'Now could this be a way to awakening?'

Then, following on my mindfulness, Bhāradvāja,
there was the consciousness:

'This is itself the Way to awakening.'

This occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'Now, am I afraid of that happiness
which is happiness
apart from sense-pleasures,
apart from unskilled states of mind?'

This occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'I am not afraid of that happiness
which is happiness
apart from sense-pleasures,
apart from unskilled states of mind.'

This occurred to me, Bhāradvāja:

'Now it is not easy to reach that happiness
by thus subjecting the body
to extreme emaciation.

Suppose I were to take material nourishment -
boiled rice
and sour milk?'

So I, Bhāradvāja, took material nourishment - boiled rice
and sour milk.

Now at that time, Bhāradvāja,
five monks were attending me
and (they thought):

'When the recluse Gotama wins dhamma
he will announce it to us.'

But when I, Bhāradvāja, took material nourishment - boiled rice
and sour milk -
then these five monks turned on me in disgust,
saying:

'The recluse Gotama lives in abundance,
he is wavering in his striving,
he has reverted to a life of abundance.'

But when I, Bhāradvāja, had taken some material nourishment,<sup>16</sup> having picked up strength,
aloof from pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
I entered on
and abided in
the first meditation
which is accompanied by initial thought
and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness,
and is rapturous and joyful.

By allaying initial thought
and discursive thought,
with the mind subjectively tranquillised

and fixed on one point, I entered on
and abided in
the second meditation
which is devoid of initial and discursive thought,
is born of concentration,
and is rapturous and joyful.

By the fading out of rapture
I dwelt with equanimity,
attentive and clearly conscious,
and I experienced in my person
that joy of which the ariyans say:
'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,'
and I entered on
and abided in the third meditation.<sup>17</sup>

By getting rid of joy
and by getting rid of anguish,
by the going down of former pleasures and sorrows,
I entered into
and abided in
the fourth meditation
which has neither anguish nor joy
and which is entirely purified
by equanimity and mindfulness.

---

With the mind composed thus,
quite purified,
quite clarified,

without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
fixed,
immovable,
I directed my mind
to the knowledge and recollection
of former habitations:

I remembered a variety of former habitations, thus:
one birth,
two births,
three births,
four births,
five births,
ten births,
twenty births,
thirty births,
forty births,
fifty births,
a hundred births,
a thousand births,
a hundred thousand births,
and many an eon of integration
and many an eon of disintegration
and many an eon of integration-disintegration;
such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I came to be in another state
where such a one was I by name,

having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so was I nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I arose here.

Thus I remember divers former habitations
in all their modes and detail.

This, Bhāradvāja,
was the first knowledge attained by me
in the first watch of the night;
ignorance was dispelled,
knowledge arose,
darkness was dispelled,
light arose,
even as I abided diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute.

■

Then with the mind composed,
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
fixed,
immovable,
I directed my mind
to the knowledge of the passing hence
and the arising of beings.

With the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
I see beings as they pass hence
or come to be;
I comprehend that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going,
according to the consequences of their deeds,
and I think:

Indeed these worthy beings
who were possessed of wrong conduct in body,
who were possessed of wrong conduct of speech,
who were possessed of wrong conduct of thought,
scoffers at the ariyans,
holding a wrong view,
incurring deeds consequent on a wrong view -
these, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a sorrowful state,
a bad bourn,
the abyss,
Niraya Hell.

But these worthy beings
who were possessed of good conduct in body,
who were possessed of good conduct in speech,
who were possessed of good conduct in thought,
who did not scoff at the ariyans,
holding a right view,
incurring deeds consequent on a right view -
these, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

Thus with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
do I see beings as they pass hence,
as they arise;
I comprehend that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going
according to the consequences of their deeds.

This, Bhāradvāja,
was the second knowledge attained by me
in the middle watch of the night;
ignorance was dispelled,
knowledge arose,
darkness was dispelled,
light arose,
even as I abided diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute.

Then with the mind composed
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
fixed,
immovable,
I directed my mind
to the knowledge of the destruction of the cankers.

I understood as it really is:

This is anguish,
this is the arising of anguish,
this is the stopping of anguish,
this is the course leading to the stopping of anguish.

I understood as it really is:

These are the cankers,
this is the arising of the cankers,
this is the stopping of the cankers,
this is the course leading to the stopping of the cankers.

Knowing this thus,
seeing thus,
my mind was freed
from the canker of sense-pleasures, and my mind was freed
from the canker of becoming,
and my mind was freed
from the canker of ignorance.

In freedom
the knowledge came to be:

I am freed;

and I comprehended:

Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close is the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or such.

This, Bhāradvāja,
was the third knowledge attained by me in the last watch of the night;
ignorance was dispelled,

knowledge arose,
darkness was dispelled,
light arose
even as I abided diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute.

When this had been said,
the brahman youth Saṅgārava spoke thus to the Lord:

"Indeed the good Gotama's striving was steadfast,<sup>18</sup> indeed it was that of a true man<sup>19</sup> such as that of a perfected one,
a fully Self-Awakened One.

But now, good Gotama, are there devas?"<sup>20</sup>

"Certainly, Bhāradvāja, it is known to me that there are devas."

[402] "But why do you, good Gotama, on being asked if there are devas say that it is certainly known to you that there are devas?

Even if this is so, good Gotama, is it not a vain falsehood?"

"If on being asked, Bhāradvāja,
'Are there devas?
one should say:
'There are devas'
and should say:
'Certainly they are known to me,' then the conclusion to be reached by an intelligent person is indubitable,

namely that there are devas."

"But why did not the revered Gotama explain this to me at the beginning?"

"It is commonly<sup>21</sup> agreed in the world, Bhāradvāja, that there are devas."

When this had been said, the brahman youth Saṅgārava
spoke thus to the Lord:

"It is excellent, good Gotama,
excellent, good Gotama.

It is as if, good Gotama,
one might set upright what had been upset,
or might disclose what was covered,
or point out the way
to one who had gone astray,
or might bring an oil-lamp into the darkness
so that those with vision might see material shapes -
even so is dhamma made clear
in many a figure by the good Gotama.

I am going to the Lord<sup>22</sup> Gotama for refuge,
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the revered Gotama accept me
as a lay-follower,
one gone for refuge from today forth
for as long as life lasts."

Discourse to Saṅgārava:
The Tenth
Division on Brahmans:
The Fifth

TOLD ARE THE MIDDLE FIFTY

---

<sup>1</sup> Six other Saṅgārava suttas are given in DPPN., but probably not all were addressed to the Saṅgārava of this M. Sta.

<sup>2</sup> See S. i. 160; and K.S. i. 199, n. 1, 2.

<sup>3</sup> There are several v.l., for this name, MA. iii. 451 for example reading Maṇḍalakappa. It was a little village.

<sup>4</sup> The text reading is upakkhalitvā, which means having tripped or stumbled; S. i. 160 (in a rather different context) reads upakkamitvā, having approached or gone on to, with v.l. upakkhalitvā; MA. iii. 451 reads pakkhalitvā, which can mean either "having washed" or "having stumbled." Brahmans often wash before a ceremonial event, but I have chosen to render by "tripped" in conformity with the textual meaning. The udāna (solemn utterance) would then be an expression used for warding off the ill-luck which might otherwise ensue after stumbling. Cf. Mhvu. iii. 223.

<sup>5</sup> As at M. ii. 133.

<sup>6</sup> bhadramukha, as at M. ii. 53. See above, p. 249, n. 1.

<sup>7</sup> sīlapaññāṇa, as at D. i. 124. See note at Dial. i. 156.

<sup>8</sup> Todeyyānaṃ brāhmaṇānaṃ. These brahmans were so-called because they lived in Tudi (-gāma), Only the one was called Todeyya because he was the head of these; see above, p. 386, n. 1.

<sup>9</sup> MA. iii. 453 says of ādibrahmacariyaṃ: brahmacariyassa ādibhūtā uppādakā jānakā ti, which seems to mean that they were producers and generators of the Brahma-faring; but the grammar is against this. I think it more likely that the "fundamentals of the Brahma-faring" refer to "the practices that have been pointed out by me for disciples," enumerated in M. Sta. 77.

<sup>10</sup> abhiññāvosaṇapāramippatta. Cf. M. ii. 11 ff. (see above, p. 211, n. 2).

<sup>11</sup> Cf. M. i. 520, anussavika.

<sup>12</sup> Cf. M. i. 520, takkī-vīmaṃsī.

<sup>13</sup> I.e. not learning it or hearing it from others; cf. Vin. i. 8, na me ācariyo atthi, "I have no teacher."

<sup>14</sup> As at A. iii. 9; cf. D. ii. 33; S. ii. 9, 105. "Truths" is dhammesu, which AA. iii. 225 explains as catu-saccadhammesu. Dhammā can also mean things; or mental states, elements or ultimates.

<sup>15</sup> As at M. i. 240.

<sup>16</sup> As at M. i. 247.

<sup>17</sup> The fourth meditation, not mentioned here, is I think omitted in error.

<sup>18</sup> aṭṭhita. This is a case of tmesis, for aṭṭhita is to be taken with padhāna. The meaning may more properly be that the striving was that of (or, worthy of) a steadfast man.

<sup>19</sup> sappurisa, also a case of tmesis.

<sup>20</sup> Cf. M. ii. 130 (above, p. 311).

<sup>21</sup> ucce. MA. iii. 464 says uccena saddena sammataṃ (v.l. samma) pākataṃ mataṃ lokasmim, with a loud noise agreed upon by the usual thought of the world.

22 Reading here is bhagavantarī.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
1. Devadaha Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
1. The Devadaha Division

101. Discourse at Devadaha

Devadaha Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying among the Sakyans.

A market town of the Sakyans was called Devadaha.<sup>1</sup>

While he was there
the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"There are, monks, some recluses and brahmans who speak thus
and are of these views:

'Whatever this individual experiences,
whether pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
all is due to what was previously done.

Thus by burning up,<sup>2</sup> by making and end
of ancient deeds,
by the non-doing of new deeds,
there is no overflowing into the future.

From there being no overflowing into the future
comes the destruction of deeds;
from the destruction of deeds
comes the destruction of anguish;
from the destruction of anguish
comes the destruction of feeling;
from the destruction of feeling
all anguish will become worn away.'

Jains speak thus, monks.

I, monks, speak thus-having approached Jains, I speak thus:

'Is it true, as is said, reverend Jains, that you speak thus
and are of these views:

'Whatever this individual experiences,
whether pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
all is due to what was previously done.

Thus by burning up,
by making and end
of ancient deeds,
by the non-doing of new deeds,
there is no overflowing into the future.

From there being no overflowing into the future
comes the destruction of deeds;
from the destruction of deeds
comes the destruction of anguish;
from the destruction of anguish
comes the destruction of feeling;
from the destruction of feeling
all anguish will become worn away!'

If, monks, these Jains on being asked this by me acknowledge it,
saying 'Yes',
then I speak thus:

'But do you, reverend Jains, know<sup>2</sup> that you yourselves were in the past, that you were not not?'

'Not this, your reverence.'

'But do you, reverend Jains, know that you yourselves did this evil deed in the past, that you did not not do it?'

'Not this, your reverence.'

'But do you, reverend Jains, know that you did not do an evil deed like this or like that?'

'Not this, your reverence.'

'But do you, reverend Jains, know that so much anguish is worn [4] away, or that so much anguish is to be worn away,
or that when so much anguish is worn away,
all anguish will become worn away?'

'Not this, your reverence.'

'But do you, reverend Jains, know
the getting rid of unskilled states of mind
here and now,
the arising of skilled states?'

'Not this, your reverence.'

'From what you say, reverend Jains, you do not know whether you yourselves were in the past, or whether you were not not;
you do not know whether in the past you yourselves did this evil deed, or whether you did not not do it; you do not know whether you did an evil deed like this or like that;
you do not know that so much anguish is worn away,
or that so much anguish is to be worn away,
or that when so much anguish is worn away,
all anguish will become worn away;
you do not know the getting rid of unskilled states of mind here and now, or the arising of skilled states.'

This being so,
it would not be suitable that the reverend Jains should explain,
saying:

'Whatever this individual experiences,
whether pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
all is due to what was previously done.

Thus by burning up,
by making an end
of ancient deeds,
by the non-doing of new deeds,
there is no overflowing into the future.

From there being no overflowing into the future
comes the destruction of deeds;
from the destruction of deeds
comes the destruction of anguish;
from the destruction of anguish
comes the destruction of feeling;
from the destruction of feeling
all anguish will become worn away.'

But if you, reverend Jains, were to know:

"We ourselves were in the past, we were not";
if you were to know:
"We ourselves did this evil deed in the past,
we did not do it";
if you were to know:
"We did not do an evil deed like this or like that";
if you were to know:
"So much anguish is worn away,
or so much anguish is to be worn away,
or when so much anguish is worn away,
all anguish will become worn away";
if you were to know

the getting rid of unskilled states of mind
here and now,
or the arising of skilled ones -
this being so,
it would be suitable
that the reverend Jains should explain,
saying:

'Whatever this individual experiences,
whether pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
all is due to what was previously done.

Thus by burning up,
by making an end
of ancient deeds,
by the non-doing of new deeds,
there is no overflowing into the future.

From there being no overflowing into the future
comes the destruction of deeds;
from the destruction of deeds
comes the destruction of anguish;
from the destruction of anguish
comes the destruction of feeling;
from the destruction of feeling
all anguish will become worn away.'

Reverend Jains,
it is as if a man were pierced by an arrow that was thickly smeared with poison.<sup>3</sup>

And because he has felt the arrow he might experience a feeling that was painful,

severe,
sharp.

His [5] friends and acquaintances,
kith and kin
might procure a physician and surgeon.

That physician and surgeon
might cut round the opening of his wound with a knife, but on account of cutting round the opening of the wound with the knife the man might experience a feeling that was painful, severe,
sharp.

That physician and surgeon might probe him for the arrow with a (surgeon's) probe,<sup>4</sup> but on account of his being probed for the arrow with the (surgeon's) probe
he might also experience a feeling that was painful,
severe,
sharp.

That physician and surgeon
might extract the arrow from him, but on account of having the arrow extracted
he might also experience a feeling that was painful,
severe,
sharp.

The physician and surgeon might dress the opening of his wound with medicated powder,<sup>5</sup> but on account of having the opening of the wound dressed with medicated powder
he might also experience a feeling that was painful,

severe,
sharp.

After a time when the skin had healed on the wound he would be well,
at ease,
independent,
his own master,
going wherever he liked.<sup>6</sup>

This might occur to him:

"Once upon a time I was pierced by an arrow that was thickly smeared with poison.

And because I felt the arrow
I experienced a feeling that was painful,
severe,
sharp.

My friends and acquaintances,
kith and kin
procured a physician and surgeon.

That physician and surgeon
cut round the opening of my wound with a knife, but on account of cutting round the opening of the wound with the knife
I experienced a feeling that was painful,
severe,
sharp.

That physician and surgeon probed me for the arrow with a (surgeon's) probe, but on account of my being probed for the arrow
with the (surgeon's) probe

I experienced a feeling that was painful,
severe,
sharp.

That physician and surgeon extracted the arrow from me,
but on account of having the arrow extracted
I experienced a feeling that was painful,
severe,
sharp.

The physician and surgeon dressed the opening of my wound with medicated powder,
but on account of having the opening of the wound
dressed with medicated powder
I experienced a feeling that was painful,
severe,
sharp.

But now that the skin has healed on the wound
I am well,
at ease,
independent,
my own master,
going wherever I like.

Even so, reverend Jains,
if you were to know:

"We ourselves were in the past,
we were not not";
if you were to know:
"We ourselves did this evil deed in the past,
we did not not do it";
if you were to know:

"We did not do an evil deed like this or like that";
if you were to know:

"So much anguish is worn away,
or so much anguish is to be worn away,
or when so much anguish is worn away,
all anguish will become worn away";
if you were to know
the getting rid of unskilled states of mind
here and now,
or the arising of skilled ones -
this being so,
it would be suitable
that the reverend Jains should explain,
saying:

'Whatever this individual experiences,
whether pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
all is due to what was previously done.

Thus by burning up,
by making an end
of ancient deeds,
by the non-doing of new deeds,
there is no overflowing into the future.

From there being no overflowing into the future
comes the destruction of deeds;
from the destruction of deeds
comes the destruction of anguish;
from the destruction of anguish
comes the destruction of feeling;
from the destruction of feeling
all anguish will become worn away.'

'But as you, reverend Jains, do not know:

"We ourselves were in the past,
we were not not";

if you were to know:

"We ourselves did this evil deed in the past,
we did not not do it";

if you were to know:

"We did not do [6] an evil deed like this or like that";

if you were to know:

"So much anguish is worn away,
or so much anguish is to be worn away,
or when so much anguish is worn away,
all anguish will become worn away";

if you were to know

the getting rid of unskilled states of mind
here and now,

or the arising of skilled ones - therefore it would not be suitable that the reverend Jains should explain,
saying:

'Whatever this individual experiences,
whether pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
all is due to what was previously done.

Thus by burning up,
by making an end
of ancient deeds,
by the non-doing of new deeds,
there is no overflowing into the future.

From there being no overflowing into the future
comes the destruction of deeds;

from the destruction of deeds
comes the destruction of anguish;
from the destruction of anguish
comes the destruction of feeling;
from the destruction of feeling
all anguish will become worn away.'

When this had been said, monks, these Jains spoke to me thus:

'Your reverence, Nāṭaputta the Jain is all-knowing,
all-seeing;<sup>7</sup> he claims all-embracing knowledge-and-vision,
saying:

"Whether I am walking
or standing still or asleep
or awake,
knowledge-and-vision is permanently and continuously before me."

He speaks thus:

"If there is, reverend Jains, an evil deed that was formerly done by you, wear it away by this severe austerity.

That which is the non-doing of an evil deed in the future is from control of body, control of speech,
control of thought
here, now.

Thus by burning up,
by making an end
of ancient deeds,
by the non-doing of new deeds,
there is no overflowing into the future.

From there being no overflowing into the future
comes the destruction of deeds;
from the destruction of deeds
comes the destruction of anguish;
from the destruction of anguish
comes the destruction of feeling;
from the destruction of feeling
all anguish will become worn away."

And because that is approved of by us as well as being pleasing to us, therefore we are delighted.'

When this had been said
I, monks, spoke thus to those Jains:

'These five conditions here-now, reverend Jains, have a twofold result.

What five?

Faith,
inclination,
tradition,
consideration of reasons,
reflection on and approval of some view.<sup>8</sup>

These, reverend Jains, are five conditions here-now that have a twofold result.

As to this,
what was the faith
that in the past
the reverend Jains had in a teacher, what was their inclination, what the tradition,
what the [7] consideration of reasons, what the reflection on
and approval of some view?'

I, monks, speaking thus, beheld no reasoned response<sup>9</sup> among the Jains.

---

And again, monks, I spoke to these Jains thus:

What do you think about this, reverend Jains?

At a time when there is severe effort for you,
severe striving,
do you at that time
experience a feeling that is severe,
acute,
painful,
severe,
sharp?

But at a time when there is no severe effort for you,
no severe striving,
do you at that time
experience a feeling that is not severe
acute,

painful,
severe,
sharp?'

■

'Reverend Gotama, at a time when there is severe effort for us severe striving,
at that time
we experience a feeling that is severe,
acute,
painful,
severe,
sharp.

But at a time when there is no severe effort for us,
no severe striving,
at that time we do not experience a feeling that is severe,
acute,
painful,
severe,
sharp.

'So really it is, reverend Jains:

At a time when there is severe effort for you,
severe striving,
you at that time
experience a feeling that is severe,
acute,
painful,
severe,
sharp.

But at a time when there is no severe effort for you,
no severe striving,

you at that time
you do not experience a feeling that is severe
acute,
painful,
severe,
sharp.'

This being so,
it would be suitable
that the reverend Jains should explain,
saying:

'Whatever this individual experiences,
whether pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
all is due to what was previously done.

Thus by burning up,
by making an end
of ancient deeds,
by the non-doing of new deeds,
there is no overflowing into the future.

From there being no overflowing into the future
comes the destruction of deeds;
from the destruction of deeds
comes the destruction of anguish;
from the destruction of anguish
comes the destruction of feeling;
from the destruction of feeling
all anguish will become worn away.'

■

If, reverend Jains, at a time when there is severe effort for you,
severe striving,
at that very time
there might be a feeling that is acute,
painful,
severe,
sharp;
but at the time
when there is no severe effort for you,
no severe striving,
at that very time
there might (also) be a feeling that is acute,
painful,
severe,
sharp —
this being so,
it would be suitable that the reverend Jains should explain,
saying:

'Whatever this individual experiences,
whether pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
all is due to what was previously done.

Thus by burning up,
by making an end
of ancient deeds,
by the non-doing of new deeds,
there is no overflowing into the future.

From there being no overflowing into the future
comes the destruction of deeds;
from the destruction of deeds
comes the destruction of anguish;

from the destruction of anguish
comes the destruction of feeling;
from the destruction of feeling
all anguish will become worn away.'

■

But inasmuch reverend Jains, as at a time
when there is severe effort for you:
severe striving,
at that time
you experience a feeling that is severe
acute,
painful,
severe,
sharp;
but at a time
when there is no severe effort for you,
no severe striving,
at that time
you do not experience a feeling that is severe,
acute,
painful,
severe
sharp -
then it is precisely you yourselves who, while experiencing a feeling that is severe acute,
painful,
severe,
sharp,
are deceived by ignorance, nescience,
confusion,
saying:

'Whatever this individual experiences,
[8] whether pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
all is due to what was previously done.

Thus by burning up,
by making and end
of ancient deeds,
by the non-doing of new deeds,
there is no overflowing into the future.

From there being no overflowing into the future
comes the destruction of deeds;
from the destruction of deeds
comes the destruction of anguish;
from the destruction of anguish
comes the destruction of feeling;
from the destruction of feeling
all anguish will become worn away.'

Again, monks, I, speaking thus, beheld no reasoned response among the Jains.

---

And again, monks, I spoke to these Jains thus:

'What do you think about this, reverend Jains?

Is it possible to say:

"Let that deed<sup>10</sup> which is to be experienced here and now

be, through effort or striving, one to be experienced in a future state (instead)<sup>11</sup>"?"

'Not this, your reverence.'

'Is it possible to say:

"Let that deed
which is to be experienced in a future state
be, through effort or striving,
one to be experienced here and now (instead)"?"

'Not this, your reverence.'

'What do you think about this, reverend Jains?

Is it possible to say:

"Let that deed
which is to be experienced as pleasant
be, through effort or striving,
one to be experienced as painful?"

'Not this, your reverence.'

'But is it possible to say:

"Let that deed
which is to be experienced as painful
be, through effort or striving,
one to be experienced as pleasant?"

'Not this, your reverence.'

'What do you think about this, reverend Jains?

Is it possible to say:

"Let that deed
which is to be experienced as thoroughly ripened<sup>12</sup>
be, through effort or striving,
one to be experienced as not thoroughly ripened?"<sup>13</sup>

[9] 'Not this, your reverence.'

'But is it possible to say:

"Let that deed
which is to be experienced as not thoroughly ripened
be, through striving or effort,
one to be experienced as thoroughly ripened"?'

'Not this, your reverence.'

'What do you think about this, reverend Jains?

Is it possible to say:

"Let that deed which is to be much experienced
be, through effort or striving,
to be little experienced"?'

'Not this, your reverence.'

'But is it possible to say:

"Let that deed
which is to be little experienced
be, through effort or striving,
one to be much experienced"?'

'Not this, your reverence.'

'What do you think about this, reverend Jains?

Is it possible to say:

"Let that deed which is to be experienced<sup>14</sup>
be, through effort or striving,
one not to be experienced"?'

'Not this, your reverence.'

'But is it possible to say:

"Let that deed which is not to be experienced
be, through effort or striving,
one to be experienced"?'

'Not this, your reverence.'

'So really it is, reverend Jains:

It is not possible to say:

"Let that deed
which is to be experienced here and now
be, through effort or striving,
one to be experienced in a future state (instead);

Let that deed
which is to be experienced in a future state
be, through effort or striving,
one to be experienced here and now (instead);

Let that deed
which is to be experienced as pleasant
be, through effort or striving,
one to be experienced as painful;

Let that deed
which is to be experienced as painful
be, through effort or striving,
one to be experienced as pleasant;

Let that deed
which is to be experienced as thoroughly ripened
be, through effort or striving,
one to be experienced as not thoroughly ripened;

Let that deed
which is to be experienced as not thoroughly ripened
be, through striving or effort,
one to be experienced as thoroughly ripened;

Let that deed which is to be much experienced
be, through effort or striving,
to be little experienced;

Let that deed
which is to be little experienced
be, through effort or striving,
one to be much experienced;

Let that deed which is to be experienced
be, through effort or striving,
one not to be experienced;

Let that deed which is not to be experienced
be, through effort or striving,
one to be experienced;

This being so,
the effort of the reverend Jains is fruitless,
their striving fruitless.'

Monks, Jains speak thus;
monks, the ten reasoned theses of the Jains
who speak thus give occasion for contempt.<sup>15</sup>

---

[10] If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo are due to what was previously done;<sup>16</sup> certainly, monks, the Jains were formerly doers of deeds that were badly done
in that they now experience such painful,
severe,
sharp feelings.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo are due to creation by an overlord,<sup>16</sup> certainly, monks, the Jains
were created by an evil overlord in that they now experience such painful,
severe,
sharp feelings.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo are due to necessary conditions.<sup>17</sup> certainly, monks, the Jains are evil of necessity
in that they now experience such painful,
severe,
sharp feelings.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo are due to the species<sup>18</sup> (to which they belong), certainly, monks, the Jains are of an evil species

in that they now experience such painful,
severe,
sharp feelings.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
are due to effort here and now, certainly, monks, the Jains are of evil effort here and now in that they now experience such painful,
severe,
sharp feelings.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
are due to what was previously done,
the Jains are contemptible;
and if the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
is not due to what was previously done
the Jains are contemptible.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain which creatures undergo are due to an overlord,
the Jains are contemptible;
and if the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo is not due to an overlord
the Jains are contemptible.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain which creatures undergo are due to necessary conditions,
the Jains are contemptible;
and if the pleasure and pain

which creatures undergo
is not due to necessary conditions
the Jains are contemptible.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain which creatures undergo are due to the species (to which they belong),
the Jains are contemptible;
and if the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo is not due to the species (to which they belong)
the Jains are contemptible.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain which creatures undergo are due to effort here and now, the Jains are contemptible;
and if the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
is not due to effort here and now
the Jains are contemptible.

Monks, Jains speak thus;
monks, these ten reasoned theses of the Jains
who speak thus
give occasion for contempt.

Even so, monks, is fruitless effort, fruitless striving.

---

And how, monks,
is effort fruitful,
striving fruitful?

Herein, monks,
a monk does not let his unmastered self be mastered by anguish, and he does not cast out rightful happiness and is undefiled [11] by<sup>19</sup> that happiness.

He comprehends thus:

'While I am striving against the aggregate<sup>20</sup> of this source of anguish,<sup>21</sup> from striving against the aggregate there is detachment for me.

But while I am indifferent
to that source of anguish, through (my) developing equanimity
there is detachment for me.'

While (a monk) is striving against the aggregate
of this source of anguish,
from striving against the aggregate
there is detachment for him - accordingly<sup>22</sup> he strives against the aggregate;
but while he is indifferent
to that source of anguish, through (his) developing equanimity
there is detachment for him - accordingly he develops equanimity.

While he is striving
against the aggregate
of that source of anguish,
from striving against the aggregate
there is detachment (for him).

Even so is that anguish worn away for him.

While he is indifferent to that<sup>23</sup> source of anguish, through (his) developing equanimity
there is detachment for him.

Even so is that anguish
also worn away for him.

Monks, it is like a man, passionately in love with a woman
his desire acute,
his longing acute.

He might see that woman
standing and talking,
joking and laughing
with another man.

What do you think about this, monks?

Would it not be
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
did not rise up in that man when he saw that woman
standing and talking,
joking and laughing
with another man?"

"Yes, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

It is that that man is passionately in love with that woman,
his desire acute,
his longing acute.

Therefore, seeing that woman
standing and talking,
joking and laughing
with another man,
grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
rise up (in him)."

"But then, monks,
that man might think thus:

'I am passionately in love with this woman, my desire acute,
my longing acute;
grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
rise up in me when I see this woman
standing and talking,
joking and laughing
with another man.

Suppose I were to get rid of my desire and attachment for that woman?'

So he may get rid of his desire and attachment
for that woman.

After a time
he may see that woman
standing and talking,
joking and laughing
with another [12] man.

What do you think about this, monks?

Would it be
that grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
rose up in that man on seeing that woman
standing and talking,
joking and laughing
with another man?"

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

It is, revered sir, that this man is (now) without passion for this woman.

Therefore on seeing that woman
standing and talking,
joking and laughing
with another man,
grief,
sorrow,

suffering
lamentation
and despair
do not rise up (in him)."

"Even so, monks,
one does not let his unmastered self be mastered by anguish and he does not cast out rightful happiness and is undefiled by that happiness.

He comprehends thus:

'While I am striving against the aggregate of this source of anguish,
from striving against the aggregate
there is detachment for me.

But while I am indifferent
to that source of anguish,
through (my) developing equanimity
there is detachment for me.'

While (a monk) is striving
against the aggregate
of this source of anguish,
from striving against the aggregate
there is detachment for him - accordingly he strives against the aggregate;
but while he is indifferent
to that source of anguish,
through (his) developing equanimity
there is detachment for him -
accordingly he develops equanimity.

While he is striving
against the aggregate
of that source of anguish,

from striving against the aggregate
there is detachment (for him).

Even so is that anguish worn away for him.

While he is indifferent to that source of anguish,
through (his) developing equanimity
there is detachment for him.

Even so is that anguish
also worn away for him.

Thus, monks, is effort fruitful, is striving fruitful.

And again, monks, a monk reflects thus:

'Dwelling as I please,
unskilled states grow much,
skilled states decline'
but while striving against my self through anguish<sup>24</sup> unskilled states decline,
skilled states grow much.

Suppose I were to strive against self
through anguish!'

He strives against self through anguish;
striving against self through anguish
his unskilled states decline,
skilled states grow much.

After a time
he does not strive against self
through anguish.

What is the reason for this?

Monks, the purposes<sup>25</sup> of that monk who might strive against self through anguish
is accomplished,
therefore after a time
he does not strive against self
through anguish.

Monks, it is like a fletcher who heats and scorches a shaft
between two fire-brands to make it straight
and serviceable.

But when, monks, the fletcher's shaft has been heated and scorched
between the two fire-brands and made straight
and serviceable,
he no longer heats
and scorches
the shaft
between the two fire-brands
to make it straight
and serviceable.

What is the reason for this?

Monks, the purpose for which the fletcher might heat and scorch the shaft
between the two fire-brands

to make it straight and serviceable
is accomplished;
therefore he no longer heats and scorches it
between the two fire-brands
to make it straight and serviceable.

Even so, monks, a monk reflects thus:

'Dwelling as I please,
unskilled states grow much,
skilled states decline'
but while striving against my self
through anguish
unskilled states decline,
skilled states grow much.

Suppose I were to strive against self
through anguish?'

He strives against self through anguish;
striving against self through anguish
his unskilled states decline,
skilled states grow much.

After a time
he does not strive against self
through anguish.

What is the reason for this?

Monks, the purposes of that monk might [13]strive against self through anguish
is accomplished,
therefore after a time
he docs not strive against self
through anguish.

So too, monks, is effort fruitful,
is striving fruitful.

And again, monks, a Tathāgata arises in the world,
a perfected one,
a fully Self-awakened one
endowed with right knowledge and conduct,
well-farer,
knower of the worlds,
the matchless charioteer of men to be tamed,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.

He makes known this world
with the devas,
with Māra,
with Brahmā,
creation
with its recluses and brahmans,
its devas and men,
having realised them by his own super-knowledge.

He teaches dhamma which is lovely at the beginning,
lovely in the middle,
lovely at the ending,
with the spirit and the letter;
he proclaims the Brahma-faring
wholly fulfilled,
quite purified.

A householder
or a householder's son
or one born in another family
hears that dhamma.

Having heard that dhamma,
he gains faith in the Tathāgata.

Endowed with this faith
that he has acquired,
he reflects in this way:

'The household life is confined and dusty;
going forth is of the open;
it is not easy for one who lives in a house
to fare the Brahma-faring
wholly fulfilled,
wholly pure,
polished like a conch-shell.

Suppose now that I,
having cut off hair and beard,
having put on saffron robes,
should go forth from home
into homelessness?'

After a time,
getting rid of his wealth,
be it small or great,
getting rid of his circle of relations,
be it small or great,
having cut off his hair and beard,
having put on saffron robes,
he goes forth from home
into homelessness.

He, being thus one who has gone forth
and who is endowed with the training
and the way of living of monks,
abandoning onslaught on creatures,
is one who abstains from onslaught on creatures;

the stick laid aside,
the knife laid aside,
he lives kindly,
scrupulous,
friendly
and compassionate
towards all breathing things and creatures.

Abandoning the taking of what is not given,
he is one who abstains from taking what is not given;
being one who takes (only) what is given,
who waits for what is given,
not by stealing he lives with a self become pure.

Abandoning unchastity,
he is one who is chaste,
keeping remote (from unchastity),
abstaining from dealings with women.

Abandoning lying speech,
he is one who abstains from lying speech,
a truth-speaker,
a bondsman to truth,
trustworthy,
dependable,
no deceiver of the world.

Abandoning slanderous speech,
he is one who abstains from slanderous speech;
having heard something here
he is not one for repeating it elsewhere
for (causing) variance among these (people),
or having heard something elsewhere
he is not one to repeat it there
for (causing) variance among these (people).

In this way
he is a reconciler of those who are at variance,
and one who combines those who are friends.

Concord is his pleasure,
concord his delight,
concord his joy,
concord is the motive of his speech.

Abandoning harsh speech,
he is one who abstains from harsh speech.

Whatever speech is gentle,
pleasing to the ear,
affectionate,
going to the heart,
urbane,
pleasant to the manyfolk,
agreeable to the manyfolk -
he comes to be one who utters speech like this.

Abandoning frivolous chatter,
he is one who abstains from frivolous chatter.

He is a speaker at a right time,
a speaker of fact,
a speaker on the goal,
a speaker on dhamma,
a speaker on discipline,
he speaks words that are worth treasuring,
with similes at a right time
that are discriminating,
connected with the goal.

He comes to be one who abstains
from what involves destruction to seed-growth,
to vegetable growth.

He comes to be one who eats one meal a day,
refraining at night,
abstaining from eating at a wrong time.

He comes to be one who abstains
from watching shows of dancing,
singing,
music.

He comes to be one who abstains
from using garlands,
scents,
unguents,
adornments,
finery.

He comes to be one who abstains
from using high beds,
large beds.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting gold and silver.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting raw grain.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting raw meat.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting women and girls.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting women slaves and men slaves.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting goats and sheep.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting fowl and swine.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting elephants, cows, horses, mares.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting fields and sites.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting messages or going on such.

He comes to be one who abstains from buying and selling.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting from cheating with weights.

He comes to be one who abstains
from accepting from cheating with bronzes.

He comes to be one who abstains
from cheating with measures.

He comes to be one who abstains
from the crooked ways of bribery, fraud and deceit.

He comes to be one who abstains
from maiming, murdering, manacling, highway robbery.

He comes to be contented
with the robes for protecting his body,
with the almsfood for sustaining his stomach.

Wherever he goes
he takes these things with him as he goes.

As a bird on the wing
wherever it flies

takes its' wings with it as it flies,
so a monk,
contented with the robes for protecting his body,
with the almsfood for sustaining his stomach,
wherever he goes
takes these things with him as he goes.

He, possessed of the ariyan body of moral habit,
subjectively experiences unsullied well-being.

Having seen a material shape with the eye,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of sight uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of sight,
he comes to control over the organ of sight.

Having heard a sound with the ear,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of hearing uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of hearing,
he comes to control over the organ of hearing.

Having smelt a smell with the nose,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of smell uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of smell,
he comes to control over the organ of smell.

Having savoured a taste with the tongue,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of taste uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of taste,
he comes to control over the organ of taste.

Having felt a touch with the body,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he dwells with this organ of touch uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind,
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of touch,

he comes to control over the organ of touch.

Having cognised a mental object with the mind,
he is not entranced by the general appearance,
he is not entranced by the detail.

If he lives with this organ of mind uncontrolled,
covetousness and dejection,
evil unskilled states of mind
might predominate.

So he fares along controlling it;
he guards the organ of mind,
he comes to control over the organ of mind.

If he is possessed of this ariyan control of the (sense-) organs,
he subjectively experiences unsullied well-being.

Whether he is setting out
or returning,
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is looking down
or looking round,
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is bending back
or stretching out (his arm),
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is carrying his outer cloak,
his bowl,
his robe,
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is munching,
drinking,
eating,
savouring,
he is one who comports himself properly;

whether he is obeying the calls of nature,
he is one who comports himself properly;
whether he is walking,
standing,
asleep,
awake,
talking,
silent,
he is one who comports himself properly.

Possessed of this ariyan body of moral habit
and possessed of this ariyan control of the (sense-) organs
and possessed of this ariyan mindfulness
and clear consciousness,
he chooses a remote lodging in a forest,
at the root of a tree,
on a mountain slope,
in a wilderness,
in a hill-cave,
in a cemetery,
in a forest haunt,
in the open
or on a heap of straw.

He, returning from alms-gathering
after his meal,
sits down cross-legged
holding the back erect,
having made mindfulness
rise up in front of him.

He, having got rid of covetousness for the world,
lives with a mind devoid of coveting,
he purifies the mind of coveting.

By getting rid of the taint of ill-will,
he lives benevolent in mind;
and compassionate for the welfare
of all creatures and beings,
he purifies the mind of the taint of ill-will.

By getting rid of sloth and torpor,
he lives devoid of sloth and torpor;
perceiving the light,
mindful and clearly conscious,
he purifies the mind of sloth and torpor.

By getting rid of restlessness and worry,
he lives calmly,
the mind subjectively tranquillised,
he purifies the mind of restlessness and worry.

By getting rid of doubt,
he lives doubt-crossed;
unperplexed as to the states that are skilled,
he purifies his mind of doubt.

He, by getting rid of these five hindrances - defilements of a mind and weakening to intuitive wisdom -
aloof from pleasure of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
enters and abides in the first meditation,
which is accompanied by initial thought and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness
and is rapturous and joyful.

Thus too, monks, is effort fruitful,
striving fruitful.

And again, monks, a monk,
by allaying initial and discursive thought,
his mind subjectively tranquillised

and fixed on one point,
enters on
and abides in
the second meditation
which is devoid of initial and discursive thought,
is born of concentration
and is rapturous and joyful.

Thus too, monks, is effort fruitful,
striving fruitful.

And again, monks, a monk,
by the fading out of rapture,
dwells with equanimity,
attentive and clearly conscious,
and experiences in his person
that joy of which the ariyans say:
'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,'
and he enters on
and abides in
the third meditation.

Thus too, monks, is effort fruitful,
striving fruitful.

And again, monks, a monk
by getting rid of joy,
by getting rid of anguish,
by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows,
enters on
and abides in
the fourth meditation
which has neither anguish nor joy,
and which is entirely purified
by equanimity and mindfulness.

Thus too, monks, is effort fruitful,
striving fruitful.

Thus with the mind composed,
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
stable,
immovable,
he directs his mind
to the knowledge and recollection of former habitations.

He recollects a variety of former habitations, thus:

One birth,
two births,
three births,
four births,
five births,
ten births,
twenty births,
thirty births,
forty births,
fifty births,
a hundred births,
a thousand births,
a hundred thousand births,
and many an eon of integration
and many an eon of disintegration
and many an eon of integration-disintegration:

'Such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,

so I was nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I came to be in another state
where I was such a one by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so I was nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I arose here.'

Thus he recollects divers former habitations
in all their modes and detail.

Thus too, monks, is effort fruitful,
striving fruitful.

■

With the mind composed thus,
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
stable,
immovable,
he directs his mind
to the knowledge of the passing hence
and the arising of beings.

With the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men,
he sees beings as they pass hence
or come to be;
he comprehends that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going,
according to the consequences of deeds,
and thinks:

'Indeed these worthy beings
who were possessed of wrong conduct in body,
speech
and thought,
scoffers at the ariyans,
holding a wrong view,
incurring deeds consequent on a wrong view -
these, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a sorrowful state,
a bad bourn,
the abyss,
Niraya Hell.

But these worthy beings
who were possessed of good conduct in body,
speech
and thought,
who did not scoff at the ariyans,
holding a right view,
incurring deeds consequent on a right view -
these at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.'

Thus with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
does he see beings as they pass hence,
as they arise;
he comprehends that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going
according to the consequences of deeds.

Thus too, monks, is effort fruitful,
striving fruitful.

■

With the mind composed thus,
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
stable,
immovable,
he directs his mind
to the knowledge of the destruction of the cankers.

He comprehends as it really is:

'This is anguish',
'this is the arising of anguish',
'this is the stopping of anguish',
'this is the course leading to the stopping of anguish'.

He comprehends as it really is:

'These are the cankers',
'this is the arising of the cankers',
'this is the stopping of the cankers',
'this is the course leading to the stopping of the cankers'.

Knowing thus,
seeing thus,
his mind is freed from the canker of sense-pleasures
and his mind is freed from the canker of becoming
and his mind is freed from the canker of ignorance.

In freedom the knowledge comes to be:

'I am freed';
and he comprehends:

'Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no [14] more of being such or so.'

Thus too, monks, is effort fruitful,
striving fruitful.

The Tathāgata speaks thus, monks;
ten reasoned theses of a Tathāgata who speaks thus, monks, give occasion for praise<sup>26</sup>:

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
are due to what was previously done, certainly, monks, the Tathāgata was formerly a doer of deeds that were well done in that he now experiences
such cankerless pleasant feelings;

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
are due to creation by an overlord, certainly, monks, the Tathāgata was created by an auspicious overlord
in that he now experiences
such cankerless pleasant feelings;

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
are due to necessary conditions, certainly, monks, the Tathāgata is lovely of necessity
in that he now experiences
such cankerless pleasant feelings.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
are due to the species (to which they belong), certainly, monks, the Tathāgata is of a lovely species
in that he now experiences
such cankerless pleasant feelings.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
are due to effort here and now, certainly, monks, the Tathāgata is of lovely effort here and now in that he now experiences such cankerless pleasant feelings.

■

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo

are due to what was previously done,
the Tathāgata
is praiseworthy;
and if the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
is not due to what was previously done,
the Tathāgata is praiseworthy.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
are due to creation by an overlord,
the Tathāgata
is praiseworthy;
and if the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo is not due to creation by an overlord,
the Tathāgata is praiseworthy.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
are due to necessary conditions,
the Tathāgata
is praiseworthy;
and if the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
is not due to necessary conditions,
the Tathāgata is praiseworthy.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
are due to the species (to which they belong),
the Tathāgata
is praiseworthy;
and if the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo

is not due to the species (to which they belong),
the Tathāgata is praiseworthy.

If, monks, the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
are due to effort here and now,
the Tathāgata
is praiseworthy;
and if the pleasure and pain
which creatures undergo
is not due to effort here and now,
the Tathāgata is praiseworthy.

Monks, the Tathāgata speaks thus;
monks, these ten reasoned theses of the Tathāgata who speaks thus give occasion for praise."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse at Devadaha:
The First

---

<sup>1</sup> Mentioned at S. iii. 5, iv, 124; Jā. i. 52; BudvA. 274. It was near the Lumbini Grove, and here the Lord was staying, MA. iv. 1.

<sup>2</sup> As at M. i. 93; see M.L.S. i. 122.

<sup>3</sup> As at M. ii, 256; cf. also M. i. 429.

<sup>4</sup> esanī, MA. iv. 2: with a probe that is a small stick, salāka (cf. Miln. 112, 149, perhaps a stick of caustic) or even with a shred of cloth, nantakavaṭṭī.

<sup>5</sup> agadaṅgāra. MA. iv, 2 says a powder, cuṅṇa, of myrobalans that was jhāna, hot, burning. Perhaps a hot compress.

<sup>6</sup> As at M. i. 506.

<sup>7</sup> This paragraph also occurs at M. i. 92-93 (M.L.S. i. 122).

<sup>8</sup> Cf. S. ii, 115, iv. 138; A. i. 189, ii, 191.

<sup>9</sup> sahadhammikam vādaparihāram; on p. 220 (text) vādapaṭihāram, also at MA. iv.4.

<sup>10</sup> M. ii. 220 reads kamma, deed, throughout. MA. iv. 4 supplies vipākadāyaka, whose fruits are produced: in this very existence.

<sup>11</sup> I.e. in a future birth, such as the second or third from this one. For the following pairs of questions, see A. iv. 382.

<sup>12</sup> I.e. in this birth (attabhāva, individuality). MA. iv. 5 says: whatever is done in youth gives its fruit, vipāka, in youth, middle or old age; if done in middle age, the fruit is in middle or old age; if done in old age it gives its fruit then - this is called what is to be experienced here and now, diṭṭha-dhamma-vedanīya. But whatever gives its fruit within seven days is called "to be experienced as thoroughly ripened," paripakkavedanīya (or, to be experienced complete). Cf. AA. iv. 175: laddha-vipākavāra.

<sup>13</sup> I.e. some of the effects or fruits overflowing into future births.

<sup>14</sup> vedanīya, explained at MA. iv. 9 as savipākakamma, a deed with a result or fruit. Cf. AA. iv. 175.

<sup>15</sup> See M. i. 368 (and M.L.S. ii, 33 for further references).

<sup>16</sup> Cf. A. i. 173.

<sup>17</sup> Cf. D. i. 53 for saṅgatibhāva, destiny or fate.

<sup>18</sup> abhijāti. MA. iv. 10 interprets as the six species or classes into which certain heretical teachers divided mankind. See M. i. 517, D. i. 53, A. iii. 383. But apparently used in a Buddhist sense above and at D. iii. 250, Netti. 158.

<sup>19</sup> anadhimucchito hoti, with loc. "undefiled" because he does not cling to the happiness.

<sup>20</sup> saṅkhāraṃ. padahato ti sampayogaṃ viriyaṃ karontassa, MA. iv. 11.

<sup>21</sup> MA. iv. II says the source of the anguish of the five khandhā is in thirst or craving, taṇhā.

<sup>22</sup> tatthā, "he strives with the striving of the Way," MA. iv. 12.

<sup>23</sup> tassa tassa. But I think the duplication is an error.

<sup>24</sup> dukkhāya pana me attānaṃ padahato.

<sup>25</sup> attha, aim, goal, purpose.

<sup>26</sup> At A. v. 120 a different ten are given.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
1. Devadaha Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
1. The Devadaha Division

102. Discourse on the Threefold Five<sup>1</sup>

Pañca-t-taya Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"There are, monks, some recluses and brahmans<sup>2</sup> who, conjecturing about the future,<sup>3</sup> speculating about the future,

in many a figure
maintain assertions concerning the future.<sup>4</sup>

[1] Some maintain<sup>5</sup> that after dying the self, unimpaired,<sup>6</sup> perceives.<sup>7</sup>

[2] Some maintain<sup>8</sup> that after dying
the self, unimpaired, does not perceive.

[3] Some maintain<sup>9</sup> that after dying
the self, unimpaired, neither perceives nor does not perceive.

[4] They lay down<sup>10</sup> the cutting off,
the destruction,
the [16] disappearance<sup>11</sup> of the essential being.<sup>12</sup>

[5] Or some maintain there is nibbāna here and now.<sup>13</sup>

[1 (1-3)] Thus they lay down that after dying the self, unimpaired, is existent.<sup>14</sup>

[2 (4)] Or they lay down the cutting off,
the destruction,
the disappearance of the essential being.

[3 (5)] Or some maintain that there is nibbāna here and now.

Thus these (theories), having been five
become three,
having been three become five.

This is the exposition of the three fives.

---

[1]

As to this, monks,
those recluses and brahmins
who lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired, perceives - these worthy recluses and brahmins

lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired, has form;<sup>15</sup>

or these worthy recluses and brahmins
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired,
has not form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmins
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired,
both has and has not form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmins
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired, neither has nor has not form.

■

Or these worthy recluses and brahmins
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired, perceives unity;<sup>16</sup>

or these worthy recluses and brahmins
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired,
perceives diversity;

or these worthy recluses and brahmins
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired, perceives the limited;<sup>17</sup>

or these worthy recluses and brahmins
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired, perceives the immeasurable.

But some of these maintain that this consciousness-device<sup>18</sup> when gone beyond
is immeasurable,
imperturbable.

■

As to this, monks, the Tathāgata comprehends that there are those worthy recluses and brahmins
who lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired, perceives;

and that these worthy recluses and brahmins either lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired,
has form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmins
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired,
has not form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired,
both has and has not form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired, neither has nor has not form.

■

Or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired, perceives unity;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired,
perceives diversity;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired, perceives the limited;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, perceiving and unimpaired, perceives the immeasurable.

■

Or (he comprehends) which of these (forms of) perception is pointed out [17] as absolutely pure, the highest,

the best,
the pre-eminent:

whether perception of fine-materiality,<sup>19</sup> perception of immateriality,<sup>20</sup> perception of unity
or perception of diversity.

■

Saying:

'There is no-thing,<sup>21</sup> some maintain that the plane of no-thing-ness

is immeasurable,
imperturbable.

Knowing that what is constructed<sup>22</sup> is gross-material,<sup>23</sup>
but that there is this that is the stopping of the constructions,<sup>24</sup>
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,<sup>25</sup>
has gone beyond it.

---

[2]

As to this, monks,
those recluses and brahmans

who lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired, does not perceive -

these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, not perceiving and unimpaired,
has form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, not perceiving and unimpaired,
has not form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, not perceiving and unimpaired,
both has and has not form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, not perceiving and unimpaired, neither has nor has not form.

■

As to this, monks,
some revile those recluses and brahmans
who lay down that after dying
the self perceives and is unimpaired.

What is the reason for this?

They say,

'Perception is an ill,
perception is an imposthume, perception is a barb;

this is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say non-perception.'

■

As to this, monks,
the Tathāgata comprehends
that there are those recluses and brahmans
who lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired, does not perceive;

and that these recluses and brahmans either lay down that after dying
the self, not perceiving and unimpaired,
has form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, not perceiving and unimpaired,
has not form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, not perceiving and unimpaired,
both has and has not form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, not perceiving and unimpaired, neither has nor has not form.

■

Monks, this situation does not occur that any recluse or brahman could say:

'Apart from material shape, apart from feeling,
apart from perception,
apart from the habitual tendencies, apart from consciousness,
I will lay [18] down a coming
or a going or a deceasing
or an uprising
or expansion
or maturity.'<sup>26</sup>

■

Knowing that what is constructed
is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

[3]

As to this, monks,
those recluses and brahmins
who lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired, neither perceives nor does not perceive -

these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, neither perceiving nor not perceiving and unimpaired,
has form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, neither perceiving nor not perceiving and unimpaired,
has not form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, neither perceiving nor not perceiving and unimpaired,
both has and has not form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmans
lay down that after dying
the self, neither perceiving nor not perceiving and unimpaired, neither has nor has not form.

■

As to this, monks,
some revile those recluses and brahmans
who lay down that after dying
the self perceives and is unimpaired, and some also revile those worthy recluses and brahmans
who lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired, does not perceive.

What is the reason for this?

They say:

'Perception is an ill,
an imposthume,

a barb;
lack of perception is confusion;
this is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say
neither-perception-nor-non-perception.'

■

As to this, monks, the Tathāgata comprehends that there are those recluses and brahmins
who lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired,
neither perceives nor does not perceive;

and that these recluses and brahmins
lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired,
neither perceiving nor not perceiving,
either has form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmins
lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired,
neither perceiving nor not perceiving,
has not form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmins
lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired,
neither perceiving nor not perceiving,
both has and has not form;

or these worthy recluses and brahmins
lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired,

neither perceiving nor not perceiving,
neither has nor has not form.

Yet whoever are the recluses and brahmins who lay down the acquiring of this plane merely through the activities<sup>27</sup> of what is to be seen,
heard,
experienced,
cognised -
this is shown, monks,
as destructive to acquiring that plane.

For it is not this plane, monks, that is shown to be attainable by attainments which have the constructions present; this plane is shown, monks, to be attainable
by attainments where no constructions remain.<sup>28</sup>

Knowing that what is constructed<sup>29</sup> is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone, beyond it.

---

[4]

As to this, monks,
those recluses and brahmins

who lay down the cutting off,
the destruction,
the disappearance of the essential being -
as to this, monks,
some revile those recluses and brahmans
who lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired, perceives;
and some also [19] revile those worthy recluses and brahmans
who lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired, does not perceive;
and some also revile those worthy recluses and brahmans
who lay down that after dying
the self, unimpaired, neither perceives nor does not perceive.

What is the reason for this?

It is that all these worthy recluses and brahmans loftily maintain attachment<sup>30</sup> itself,
saying:

'We will be such hereafter,
we will be such hereafter.'<sup>31</sup>

It is as though a merchant who has gone out trading should think,

'I will have this from there,
I will get this from that' - even so methinks

these worthy recluses and brahmans are like the merchant when they say,

'We will be such hereafter,
we will be such hereafter.'

■

As to this, monks, the Tathāgata comprehends:

Those worthy recluses and brahmins who lay down the cutting off,
the destruction,
the disappearance
of the essential being,
these,
afraid of their own body,
loathing their own body,
simply keep running
and circling round
their own body.

Just as a dog<sup>32</sup> that is tied by a leash to a strong post or stake
keeps running
and circling round
that post
or stake,
so do these worthy recluses and brahmins,
afraid of their own body,
loathing their own body,
simply keep running
and circling round
their own body.

Knowing that what is constructed
is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,

seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Whatever recluses and brahmans, monks, conjecturing about the future,
speculating about the future,
in many a figure maintain assertions concerning the future, all maintain precisely these five positions,<sup>33</sup> or one of them.

§

There are, monks,
some recluses and brahmans
who, conjecturing about the past, speculating about the past, in many a figure maintain assertions concerning the past.

[1] Some maintain,
'Eternal is self and the world,<sup>34</sup>
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[2] Some maintain,
'Not eternal is self and the world,<sup>35</sup>
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[3] Some maintain,
'Both eternal and not eternal is self and the world<sup>36</sup>
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[4] Some maintain,
[20] 'Neither eternal nor not eternal is self and the world<sup>37</sup>
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[5] Some maintain,
'Having an end is self and the world<sup>38</sup>
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[6] Some maintain,
'Not having an end is self and the world
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[7] Some maintain,
'Both having an end and not having an end is self and the world
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[8] Some maintain,
'Neither having an end nor not having an end is self and the world
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[9] Some maintain,
'Perceptive of unity is self and the world
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[10] Some maintain,
'Perceptive of diversity is self and the world
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[11] Some maintain,
'Perceptive of the limited is self and the world
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[12] Some maintain,
'Perceptive of the immeasurable is self and the world
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[13] Some maintain,
'Exclusively happy is self and the world<sup>39</sup>
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[14] Some maintain,
'Exclusively sorrowful is self and the world
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[15] Some maintain,
'Happy and sorrowful is self and the world
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

[16] Some maintain,
'Not sorrowful nor happy is self and the world
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Eternal is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one, thoroughly cleansed.<sup>40</sup>

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Not eternal is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Both eternal and not eternal,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Neither eternal nor not eternal is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Having an end is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Not having an end is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Both having and not having an end is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Neither having an end nor not having an end is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Conscious of [21] unity is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Conscious of diversity is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Conscious of the limited is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Conscious of the immeasurable is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Exclusively happy is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Exclusively sorrowful is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Happy and sorrowful is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

---

Monks, as for those recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of this view:

'Not sorrowful nor happy is self and the world,
this is indeed the truth,
all else is falsehood' -

this situation cannot occur
that, apart from faith,
apart from inclination,
apart from tradition,
apart from consideration of reasons,
apart from reflection on
and approval of some view,
knowledge will become thoroughly pure for each one,
thoroughly cleansed.

If, monks, knowledge is not thoroughly pure for each one,
not thoroughly cleansed,
even that mere fraction of knowledge
that these worthy recluses and brahmans thoroughly cleanse,
even that is pointed out as grasping
on the part of these worthy recluses and brahmans.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

In this case,<sup>41</sup> monks, some recluse or brahman by casting out speculation concerning the past
and by casting out speculation concerning the future, by not throughout fixing his mind on the fetters of the senses, entering on the rapture of aloofness,<sup>42</sup> abides therein.

He thinks,

'This is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say,
entering on the rapture of aloofness
I am abiding therein.'

But if that rapture of aloofness of his
is stopped,<sup>43</sup> from the stopping of the rapture of aloofness
sorrow arises;
from the stopping of sorrow,
the rapture of aloofness arises.

As, monks,
the heat of the sun
suffuses whatever the shade quits,
as the shade suffuses whatever the heat of the sun quits,
even so, monks,
from the stopping of the rapture of aloofness,
sorrow arises;
from the stopping of sorrow,
the rapture of aloofness arises.

As to this, monks,
the Tathāgata comprehends:

'This worthy recluse or brahman
by casting out speculation concerning the past
and by casting out speculation concerning the future,
by not throughout fixing his mind on the fetters of the senses,
entering on the rapture of aloofness,
abides therein.

He thinks,

'This is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say,
entering on the rapture of aloofness
I am abiding therein.'

But if that rapture of aloofness of his
is stopped,
from the stopping of the rapture of aloofness
sorrow arises;
from the stopping of sorrow,
the rapture of aloofness arises.

As, monks,
the heat of the sun
suffuses whatever the shade quits,
as the shade suffuses whatever the heat of the sun quits,
even so, monks,
from the stopping of the rapture of aloofness,
sorrow arises;
[22] from the stopping of sorrow,
the rapture of aloofness arises.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,

seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

§

But in this case, monks,
some recluse or brahman
by casting out speculation concerning the past
and by casting out speculation concerning the future,
by not throughout fixing his mind on the fetters of the senses,
by passing beyond the rapture of aloofness, entering on spiritual happiness,<sup>44</sup> abides therein.

He thinks:

'This is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say,
entering on spiritual happiness
I am abiding therein.'

But if that spiritual happiness of his is stopped,
from the stopping of spiritual happiness
there arises the rapture of aloofness;
from the stopping of the rapture of aloofness spiritual happiness arises.

As, monks,
the heat of the sun
suffuses whatever the shade quits,
as the shade suffuses whatever the heat of the sun quits,
even so, monks,

from the stopping of spiritual happiness
there arises the rapture of aloofness;
from the stopping of the rapture of aloofness
spiritual happiness arises.

As to this, monks,
the Tathāgata comprehends:

'This worthy recluse or brahman, by casting out speculation concerning the past
and by casting out speculation concerning the future,
by not throughout fixing his mind on the fetters of the senses,
by passing beyond the rapture of aloofness,
entering on spiritual happiness,
abides therein.

He thinks:

'This is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say,
entering on spiritual happiness
I am abiding therein.'

But if that spiritual happiness of his is stopped,
from the stopping of spiritual happiness
there arises the rapture of aloofness;
from the stopping of the rapture of aloofness spiritual happiness arises.

As, monks,
the heat of the sun
suffuses whatever the shade quits,
as the shade suffuses whatever the heat of the sun quits,
even so, monks,
from the stopping of spiritual happiness
there arises the rapture of aloofness;

from the stopping of the rapture of aloofness
spiritual happiness arises.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

§

In this case, monks,
some recluse or brahman
by casting out speculation concerning the past
and by casting out speculation concerning the future, by not fixing his mind throughout on the fetters of the senses,
by passing beyond the rapture of aloofness,
by passing beyond spiritual happiness, entering on feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,<sup>45</sup> abides therein.

He thinks:

'This is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say,
entering on feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant
I am abiding therein.'

But if that feeling of his
that is neither painful nor pleasant is stopped, from the stopping of the feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant there arises spiritual happiness;

from the stopping of spiritual happiness
there arises a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant.

As, [23] monks,
the heat of the sun
suffuses whatever the shade quits,
as the shade suffuses whatever the heat of the sun quits,
even so, monks,
from the stopping of feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant
there arises spiritual happiness;
from the stopping of spiritual happiness
feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant arises.

As to this, monks, the Tathāgata comprehends:

This worthy recluse or brahman
by casting out speculation concerning the past
and by casting out speculation concerning the future, by not fixing his mind throughout on the fetters of the senses,
by passing beyond the rapture of aloofness,
by passing beyond spiritual happiness,
entering on feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
abides therein.

He thinks:

'This is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say,
entering on feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant
I am abiding therein.'

But if that feeling of his
that is neither painful nor pleasant is stopped,
from the stopping of the feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant
there arises spiritual happiness;

from the stopping of spiritual happiness
there arises a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant.

As, the heat of the sun
suffuses whatever the shade quits,
as the shade suffuses whatever the heat of the sun quits,
even so, monks,
from the stopping of feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant
there arises spiritual happiness;
from the stopping of spiritual happiness
feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant arises.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

§

But in this case, monks,
some recluse or brahman,
by casting out speculation concerning the past
and by casting out speculation concerning the future,
by not throughout fixing his mind on the fetters of the senses,
by passing beyond the rapture of aloofness,
by passing beyond spiritual happiness,
by passing beyond feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
beholds,

'Tranquil am I,
allayed am I,

without grasping am I!

As to this, monks, the Tathāgata comprehends:

This worthy recluse or brahman,
by casting out speculation concerning the past
and by casting out speculation concerning the future,
by not throughout fixing his mind on the fetters of the senses,
by passing beyond the rapture of aloofness,
by passing beyond spiritual happiness,
by passing beyond feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
beholds,

'Tranquil am I,
allayed am I,
without grasping am I.' — certainly this venerable one maintains the very course that is suitable for nibbāna.<sup>46</sup>

On the other hand,
that worthy recluse or brahman, grasping,
either grasps after speculation concerning the past<sup>47</sup>
or, grasping,
grasps after speculation concerning the future<sup>48</sup>
or, grasping,
grasps after a fetter of the senses
or, grasping,
grasps after the rapture of aloofness
or, grasping,
grasps after spiritual happiness
or, grasping,
grasps after feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant.

And inasmuch as this venerable one beholds,

'Tranquil am I,
allayed am I,
without grasping am I,'

this too is shown as a grasping on the part of that [24] worthy recluse or brahman.

Knowing that what is constructed is gross-material,
but that there is this
that is the stopping of the constructions,
the Tathāgata,
seeing the escape from it,
has gone beyond it.

§

But now, monks,
this incomparable matchless path to peace<sup>49</sup> was awakened to by the Tathāgata,
that is to say,
having known the arising
and the setting
and the satisfaction
and the peril
of the six fields of sensory impingement
and the escape as it really is, there is deliverance without grasping.<sup>50</sup>

And as, monks,
this incomparable matchless path to peace

was awakened to by the Tathāgata,
that is to say,
having known the arising
and the setting
and the satisfaction
and the peril
of the six fields of sensory impingement
and the escape as it really is, there is deliverance without grasping."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on the Threefold Five:
The Second

---

<sup>1</sup> This Discourse, an exposition of heretical views, should be read in conjunction with the Brahmajāla-Suttanta (to which the Comy. refers) and also with the Mahānidāna-Suttanta §23 et seq. (D. Stas. Nos. 1 and 15.)

<sup>2</sup> MA. iv. 5: recluses because they have gone forth, brahmans by birth; or, they are called "recluses" and "brahmans" by the world. So samaṇa-brāhmaṇā should be translated either "recluses and brahmans" or "brahman recluses." But since the phrase samaṇo vā brāhmaṇo vā is found later in the Sta., I have chosen the former rendering.

<sup>3</sup> aparantakappika, or, "supposing there is a future." On the two kappas of craving, taṇhā, and views, diṭṭhi, see Nd. I. 112-113. The former is associated with thoughts of "mine," the latter with false views about one's own body (see below, p. 19), other false views and with taking up extreme views. Cf. D. i. 30 f.

<sup>4</sup> As at D. i. 30, which adds "on forty-four grounds."

<sup>5</sup> In sixteen ways, MA. iv. 16. For these see D. i. 31.

<sup>6</sup> aroga, not ill, hale, healthy; but MA. iv. 16, DA. 119 give nicca, enduring, permanent. Rhys Davids, at Dial. i. 44 ff., translated as "not subject to decay."

<sup>7</sup> saññin, is perceptive, perceiving. I keep to this rather than to "consciousness" which Rhys Davids uses, because I use "perception" for saññā (as one of the khandha) and "consciousness" for viññāṇa (also a khandha, etc.).

<sup>8</sup> In eight ways, MA. iv. 16. For these see D. i. 32.

<sup>9</sup> Also in eight ways, MA. iv. 16. For these see D. i. 33.

<sup>10</sup> On seven grounds, see D. i. 34-35. Bṛhad. Up. II. 4. 12-14 states the problem of consciousness, viññāna, and the lack of it, in a clear manner. Cf. also Kaṭha Up. I. 1. 20: "there is doubt about a man who has 'departed,' prete, some saying he is and others that he is not," and see Radhakrishnan, The Principal Upanishads, p. 603.

<sup>11</sup> As at D. i. 34; on seven grounds. MA. iv. 16, DA. 120 say that these three terms are synonymous, but they gloss vināsa by adassana and vibhava by bhavavigama.

<sup>12</sup> As at M. i. 140, where this thesis was wrongly ascribed to Gotama.

<sup>13</sup> On five grounds. See D. i. 36. MA. iv. 17, DA. 121 say that this is the allaying of anguish in this very existence.

<sup>14</sup> santam, i.e. in reference to the three modes of consciousness.

<sup>15</sup> See D. i. 31.

<sup>16</sup> See D. i. 31. MA. iv. 18, DA. 119 appear to refer this to the samāpatti, the nine meditative attainments, while "diversity" or multiformity is incomplete attainment.

<sup>17</sup> DA. 119 refers "limited," the small, paritta, and "the immeasurable" to the kasīṇa-devices.

<sup>18</sup> viññāṇakasīṇa. See M. ii. 14-15, A. v. 60, where each of the ten "devices" is to be understood in five ways, the fifth way being as "immeasurable."

<sup>19</sup> This refers to the fourth jhānu. Cf. Expos. i. 210 ff.

<sup>20</sup> This refers to the planes of infinite ākāsa and infinite consciousness, MA. iv. 18. Cf. Expos. i. 269 ff.

<sup>21</sup> At A. v. 63, according to the perception of some beings this is the topmost perception.

<sup>22</sup> MA. iv. 19 says that all this - perception together with views - is constructed and formed by the coming together of conditions, paccaya.

<sup>23</sup> oḷārika, material, gross, coarse.

<sup>24</sup> saṃkhārā, or activities. This is nibbāna, according to MA. iv. 19. At S. iv. 217 the stopping of the saṃkhārā, is spoken of as gradual. See M.L.S. i. Intr., p. xxiv.

<sup>25</sup> I.e. from the compounded. On the stopping of whatever is the compounded being the escape from it, see D. iii. 275, Iti. p. 61, and cf. Iti. p. 37, Ud. 80.

<sup>26</sup> A statement ascribed at MA. iv. 20 to sophists, viṭaṇḍavādī.

<sup>27</sup> saṃkhāramattena, referring to oḷārika, the gross or material saṃkhārā, MA. iv. 20. "This plane" is of course that of neither-perception-nor-not-perception.

<sup>28</sup> This plane is subtle, sukhuma.

<sup>29</sup> saṅkhata.

<sup>30</sup> āsatti, sticking to, craving.

<sup>31</sup> A noble warrior or a brahman, MA. iv, 21.

<sup>32</sup> Cf. S. iii. 150.

<sup>33</sup> āyatana, here glossed at MA. iv. 22 by kāraṇāni. Now, after having spoken of the 44 assertions concerning the future, the 18 concerning the past will be spoken of (beginning with the next paragraph).

<sup>34</sup> Cf. D. i. 13, 43; the views of the Eternalists.

<sup>35</sup> The views of the Annihilationists.

<sup>36</sup> The views of the partial-eternalists, see D. i. 17.

<sup>37</sup> The views of the "eel-wrigglers," see D. i. 24-27, Pts i. 155.

<sup>38</sup> See D. i. 31.

<sup>39</sup> Cf. M. ii. 35 f.

<sup>40</sup> Cf. S. ii. 115 where the monk Musīla knew, apart from faith, etc., that "the stopping of becoming is nibbana," and was classed among the arahants.

<sup>41</sup> MA. iv. 25 says that up to here the 62 views have been handed down in the Brahmajāla: the four eternalist views, the four partial-eternalist, the four about "end" and "no end," the four eel-wrigglings, the two concerned with "attainment," the sixteen views on the "perceiving" person, the eight on the non-perceiving person, the eight on the person who neither perceives nor does not perceive, the seven annihilationist views, and the five views of nibbāna here and now. But in this Discourse (i.e. M. Sta. 102) views of "own body" are also spoken of (see above, p. 19).

<sup>42</sup> pavivekam pītim. The rapture, pīti, of the first two jhāna in which it is an element.

<sup>43</sup> With the stopping of these two jhāna.

<sup>44</sup> I.e. the third jhāna. The word nirāmisā, as the opposite of the "physical," is hard to translate here. In some contexts "ghostly" is not too far away from the meaning. Chalmers gives "bliss immaterial"; but I have used "immaterial" for arūpa.

<sup>45</sup> The fourth jhāna.

<sup>46</sup> Cf. S. iv. 133.

<sup>47</sup> Eighteen views.

<sup>48</sup> Forty-four views which, with the above eighteen, together constitute the sixty-two heretical views.

<sup>49</sup> Cf. M. i. 163.

<sup>50</sup> Cf. A. v. 64; also D. i. 17. Anupāda is "without clinging" or grasping, and therefore without further "fuel" for samsāra. MA. iv. 28 says that this elsewhere is nibbāna, but here it is the attainment of the fruit of arahantship.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
1. Devadaha Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
1. The Devadaha Division

103. Discourse on "What Then?"

Kinti Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Kusinārā in the Wood of the Offerings.<sup>1</sup>

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"What then is there for you, monks, in me?

Is it that the recluse Gotama teaches dhamma for the sake of robe-material or that the recluse Gotama teaches dhamma

for the sake of almsfood
or that the recluse Gotama teaches dhamma
for the sake of lodgings
or that the [25] recluse Gotama teaches dhamma for the sake of success or decline<sup>2</sup> in this or that?"

"No, Lord; we do not think:
"The recluse Gotama teaches dhamma
for the sake of almsfood
or that the recluse Gotama teaches dhamma
for the sake of lodgings
or that the recluse Gotama teaches dhamma
for the sake of success or decline in this or that."

"Certainly, monks, there is not this for you in me: that the recluse Gotama teaches dhamma
for the sake of almsfood
or that the recluse Gotama teaches dhamma
for the sake of lodgings
or that the recluse Gotama teaches dhamma
for the sake of success or decline in this or that.

So what then is there, monks, for you in me?"

"It is thus, Lord, in the Lord for us:

The Lord, compassionate,
seeking welfare,
teaches dhamma out of compassion."

"Certainly, monks, it is thus for you in me:

The Lord, compassionate,
seeking welfare,
teaches dhamma out of compassion.

Wherefore, monks, those things taught to you by me out of superknowledge,<sup>3</sup>
that is to say
the four applications of mindfulness,
the four right efforts,
the four bases of psychic power,
the five controlling faculties,
the five powers,
the seven links in awakening,
the ariyan eightfold Way -
all together,
in harmony
and without contention
you should train yourselves in each and all of these.

---

But when you, monks, all together,
in harmony
and without contention
have trained yourselves in these,
there might be two monks speaking differently about Further-dhamma.<sup>4</sup>

If it should occur to you concerning this:

'Between these venerable ones
there is a difference as to denotation
and a difference as to connotation,' then, approaching that monk whose speech you deem the more pleasing,

you should speak thus to him:

'Between the venerable ones
there is a difference as to denotation
and a difference as to connotation,
on account of which these venerable ones should know that there is a difference as to denotation
and a difference as to connotation.

Do not let the venerable ones fall into contention.'

After this,
having approached whatever monk on the other side of the factious monks
whose speech you deem the more pleasing,
you should speak thus to him:

'Between the venerable ones
there is a difference as to denotation
and a [26] difference as to connotation,
on account of which these venerable ones should know
that there is a difference as to denotation
and a difference as to connotation.

Do not let the venerable ones fall into contention.'

In this way what is hard to grasp should be remembered as hard to grasp;
having remembered what is hard to grasp
as hard to grasp,
that which is dhamma,
that which is discipline
should be spoken.

■

If it should occur to you concerning this, 5

'Although there is a difference between these venerable ones as to denotation, there is agreement as to connotation,' then having approached that monk whose speech you deem to be the more pleasing,

you should speak to him thus:

'Although these venerable ones differ as to denotation,
there is agreement as to connotation,
therefore these venerable ones should know
that although they differ as to denotation,
there is agreement as to connotation.

Do not let the venerable ones fall into contention.'

After this,
having approached whatever monk on the other side
of the factious monks
whose speech you deem the more pleasing,
you should speak thus to him:

'Although these venerable ones
differ as to denotation,
there is agreement as to connotation,
therefore these venerable ones should know
that although they differ as to denotation,
there is agreement as to connotation.

Do not let the venerable ones fall into contention.'

In this way what is hard to grasp
should be remembered as hard to grasp;
having remembered what is hard to grasp
as hard to grasp,
that which is dhamma,

that which is discipline
should be spoken.

■

If it should occur to you concerning this,

'Although there is agreement between these venerable ones as to denotation, there is difference as to connotation,'

then having approached that monk
whose speech you deem to be the more pleasing,
you should speak thus to him:

'Between the venerable ones
there is agreement as to denotation,
there is difference as to connotation,
on account of which these venerable ones should know that there is agreement as to denotation, difference as to connotation.

But this is a mere trifle,
that is to say connotation.

Do not let the venerable ones fall into contention over a mere trifle.'

After this,
having approached whatever monk on the other side
of the factious monks
whose speech you deem the more pleasing,
you should speak thus to him:

'Between these venerable ones
there is agreement as to denotation,
there is difference as to connotation,
on account of which these venerable ones should know that there is agreement as to denotation, difference as to connotation.

But this is a mere trifle,
that is to say connotation.

Do not let the venerable ones fall [27] into contention over a mere trifle.'

In this way what is easy to grasp should be remembered as easy to grasp;
what is hard to grasp should be remembered as hard to grasp;
having remembered what is easy to grasp
as easy to grasp,
having remembered what is hard to grasp
as hard to grasp,
that which is dhamma,
that which is discipline
should be spoken.

■

If it should occur to you concerning this:

'Between these venerable ones
there is agreement as to denotation
and there is agreement as to connotation,'

then having approached that monk
whose speech you deem the more pleasing,
you should speak thus to him:

'Between the venerable ones
there is agreement as to denotation
and there is agreement as to connotation,
on account of which
these venerable ones should know

that there is agreement as to denotation
and agreement as to connotation.

Do not let the venerable ones fall into contention.'

After this,
having approached whatever monk on the other side
of the factious monks
whose speech you deem the more pleasing,
you should speak thus to him:

'Between the venerable ones
there is agreement as to denotation
and there is agreement as to connotation,
on account of which
these venerable ones should know
that there is agreement as to denotation
and agreement as to connotation.

Do not let the venerable ones fall into contention.'

In this way what is easy to grasp
should be remembered as easy to grasp;
what is hard to grasp should be remembered as hard to grasp;
having remembered what is easy to grasp
as easy to grasp,
having remembered what is hard to grasp
as hard to grasp,
that which is dhamma,
that which is discipline
should be spoken.

---

And when you, monks,
all together,
in harmony
and without contention
are trained in these,
a certain monk might have an offence, might have a transgression.

As to this, monks,
one should not hasten with reproof - the individual must be examined.

(You may think):

'There will be no vexation for me nor annoyance for the other individual;
for if the other individual is without wrath,
without rancour,
is of quick view
and easy to convince,
I have the power
to raise this individual from unskill
and establish him in what is skill.'

If it occurs to you thus, monks, it is right to speak.

■

But if you think, monks,

'There will be no vexation for me but (there will be) annoyance for the other individual; for though the other individual is wrathful, rancorous,
of slow view
(but) easy to convince,

I have the power
to raise this individual from unskill
and establish him in what is skill.

For this is a mere trifle,
that is to say
the other individual's annoyance.

And this is of the greater moment,
that I have the power
to raise this individual from unskill
and establish him in what is skill.'

If it occurs to you thus, monks,
it is right to speak.

■

But if you think, monks:

'There will be vexation for me but no annoyance for the other individual;
for if the other individual is [28] without wrath,
without rancour,
is of quick view
though hard to convince,
I have the power
to raise this individual from unskill
and establish him in what is skill.

For this is a mere trifle,
that is to say my vexation.

And this is of the greater moment,
that I have the power
to raise this individual from unskill
and establish him in what is skill.'

If it occurs to you thus, monks,
it is right to speak.

■

But if you think, monks:

'There will be vexation for me
and annoyance for the other individual;
yet though the other individual is wrathful,
rancorous,
of slow view
and hard to convince,
I have the power
to raise this individual from unskill
and establish him in what is skill.

For this is a mere trifle,
that is to say
my vexation
and the other individual's annoyance.

And this is of the greater moment,
that I have the power
to raise this individual from unskill
and establish him in what is skill.'

If it occurs to you thus, monks,
it is right to speak.

■

But if you think, monks:

'There will be vexation for me
and annoyance for the other individual;
for the other individual is wrathful,

rancorous,
of slow view
and hard to convince,
and I have not the power
to raise this individual from unskill
and establish him in what is skill'
-equanimity, monks, should not be disdained for such an individual.

---

And when you, monks,
all together,
in harmony
and without contention
have trained yourselves in these there might arise between you an activity of speech,<sup>6</sup> an offensive view,
malice in thought,
discontent,
dissatisfaction.

■

In that case, having approached that monk whom you deem the more easy
of the factious monks
to speak to,
you should speak to him thus:

'Although, your reverence,
we were trained all together,
in harmony
and without contention,
there has arisen between us
an activity of speech,
an offensive view,
malice in thought,
discontent,
dissatisfaction
for which the Recluse,<sup>7</sup> knowing of it,
would blame us.'

Answering aright, monks,
the monk would answer thus:

'Although, your reverence,
we were trained all together,
in harmony
and without contention,
there has arisen between us
an activity of speech,
an offensive view,
malice in thought,
discontent,
dissatisfaction
for which the Recluse,
knowing of it,
would blame us.

But without getting rid of this condition,<sup>8</sup> your reverence, could nibbāna be realised?'

Answering aright, monks,
the monk would answer thus:

'Without getting rid of this condition,
your reverence,
nibbāna could not be realised.'

After this,
having approached whatever monk on the other side
of the factious monks
whose speech you deem the more pleasing,
you should speak thus [29] to him:

'Although, your reverence,
we were trained all together,
in harmony
and without contention,
there has arisen between us
an activity of speech,
an offensive view,
malice in thought,
discontent,
dissatisfaction
for which the Recluse,
knowing of it,
would blame us.'

Answering aright, monks,
the monk would answer thus:

'Although, your reverence,
we were trained all together,
in harmony
and without contention,
there has arisen between us
an activity of speech,
an offensive view,
malice in thought,
discontent,

dissatisfaction
for which the Recluse,
knowing of it,
would blame us.

But without getting rid of this condition, your reverence, could nibbāna<sup>9</sup> be realised?

Answering aright, monks,
the monk in answering<sup>10</sup> would answer thus:

'Without getting rid of this condition,
your reverence,
nibbāna could not be realised.'

If, monks, others should ask that monk,
saying:

'Were these monks raised up from unskill and established in skill by the venerable one?

answering aright, monks,
the monk would answer thus:

'I, your reverences,
approached the Lord;
the Lord taught me his dhamma;
when I had heard that dhamma, I spoke it to those monks; when those monks had heard that dhamma they rose up from unskill and established themselves in what is skill.'

Answering thus, monks, the monk neither exalts himself nor disparages another, he is explaining in accordance with dhamma, and no one of his fellow dhamma-men,

of his way of speaking, gives grounds for reproach."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on "What then?"

The Third

---

<sup>1</sup> Baliharāṇa, so called because they bring oblations here for creatures. Mentioned also at A. i. 174, v. 79. See G.S. i. 251, v. 55 for notes.

<sup>2</sup> iti bhavābhava. MA. iv. 28 says "depending on the working of good puñña, according to this teaching, I will experience happiness in this or that becoming." DA. Iti. 1021, AA. Iti. 12 give bhavābhava as oil, honey, ghee, etc.; these would thus take the place of the fourth requisite, medicines for the sick, which normally would have been expected here; see Dial. Iti. 220, n. 3 and G.S. ii. 11, n. 1. But at ItA. ii. 256, and other Comys., bhava is given as growth or success, and abhava as failure or decline. At D. Iti. 228, A. ii. 10, 248 and Iti. p. 109 these four items are called the production of craving.

<sup>3</sup> M. ii. 245. Cf. M. ii. 9.

<sup>4</sup> abhidhamma, here meaning the 37 things helpful to awakening, MA. iv. 29.

<sup>5</sup> tatra, this too refers to the 37 things helpful to awakening, MA. iv. 20.

<sup>6</sup> vacīsaṃkhāra, speech activity, see Vism. 531, and also cf. A. iii. 350.

<sup>7</sup> The Teacher, so MA. iv. 31.

<sup>8</sup> I.e. of quarrelling.

<sup>9</sup> Here however two MSS. include na, reading na nibbāam sacchikareyya, while above in the same passage only one MS. adds na. Taking it that na should not be there, it seems necessary to turn the sentence into a question; by so doing it is shown that the monks were still seeking harmony and obtaining it.

<sup>10</sup> vyākaramāno, added here, is absent above.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
1. Devadaha Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
1. The Devadaha Division

104. Discourse at Sāmagāma

Sāmagāma Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying among the Sakyans at Samagāma.<sup>1</sup>

At that time Nātaputta the Jain had [30] recently died at Pāvā.

On his death the Jains broke up;
splitting into two,
striving, quarrelling, disputing, they lived wounding one another with the weapons of the tongue, saying:

'You<sup>2</sup> do not understand this dhamma and discipline,
I understand this dhamma and discipline.

How can you understand this dhamma and discipline?

You are one who fares wrongly,
I am one who fares aright.

There is sense in what I say,
no sense in what you say;
you say at the end what should be said at the beginning and say at the beginning what should be said at the end.

What you pondered<sup>3</sup> so long<sup>4</sup> is reversed; your words are refuted;<sup>5</sup>
you are shown up.

Get away, think out the argument,<sup>6</sup> or unravel it if you can.<sup>7</sup>

It seems that death verily stalked among the Jains who were Nātaputta's pupils.<sup>8</sup>

Even the white-clad householders who were followers of Nātaputta the Jain were disgusted, disaffected, put off<sup>9</sup> by the Jains who were Nātaputta's pupils
in that the dhamma and discipline were badly set forth, badly expounded,
not leading onwards,
not conducing to peace,
expounded by one who was not fully self-awakened,
the foundations wrecked,
without an arbiter.

Then Cunda the novice,<sup>10</sup> having kept the rains at Pāvā, approached the venerable Ānanda at Sāmagāma;
having approached and greeted the venerable Ānanda,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance,
Cunda the novice spoke thus to the venerable Ānanda:

"Revered sir, Nātaputta the Jain has recently died at Pāvā.

On his death the Jains broke up;
splitting into two,
striving, quarrelling, disputing,
they lived wounding one another with the weapons of the tongue, saying:

'You do not understand this dhamma and discipline,
I understand this dhamma and discipline.

How can you understand this dhamma and discipline?

You are one who fares wrongly,
I am one who fares aright.

There is sense in what I say,
no sense in what you say;
you say at the end what should be said at the beginning and say at the beginning what should be said at the end.

What you pondered so long is reversed;
your words are refuted;
you are shown up.

Get away, think out the argument,
or unravel it if you can.'

It seems that death verily stalked among the Jains who were Nātaputta's pupils.

Even the white-clad householders who were followers of Nātaputta the Jain were disgusted, disaffected, put off by the Jains who were Nātaputta's pupils
in that the dhamma and discipline were badly set forth,
badly expounded,
not leading onwards,
not conducing to peace,
expounded by one who was not fully self-awakened,

the foundations wrecked,
without an arbiter.

When this had been said, the venerable Ānanda spoke [31] thus to Cunda the novice:

"Certainly this, reverend Cunda, is a subject on which to see the Lord.

Come, reverend Cunda, we will approach the Lord;
having approached,
we will tell this matter to the Lord."

"Yes, revered sir,"
Cunda the novice answered the venerable Ānanda in assent.

Then the venerable Ānanda and Cunda the novice
approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
they sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance the venerable Ānanda spoke thus to the Lord:

"This novice Cunda, revered sir, speaks thus:

"Revered sir, Nātaputta the Jain has recently died at Pāvā.

On his death the Jains broke up;
splitting into two,
striving, quarrelling, disputing,
they lived wounding one another with the weapons of the tongue, saying:

'You do not understand this dhamma and discipline,
I understand this dhamma and discipline.

How can you understand this dhamma and discipline?

You are one who fares wrongly,
I am one who fares aright.

There is sense in what I say,
no sense in what you say;
you say at the end what should be said at the beginning and say at the beginning what should be said at the end.

What you pondered so long is reversed;
your words are refuted;
you are shown up.

Get away, think out the argument,
or unravel it if you can.'

It seems that death verily stalked among the Jains who were Nātaputta's pupils.

Even the white-clad householders who were followers of Nātaputta the Jain were disgusted, disaffected, put off by the Jains who were Nātaputta's pupils
in that the dhamma and discipline were badly set forth,
badly expounded,
not leading onwards,
not conducing to peace,
expounded by one who was not fully self-awakened,
the foundations wrecked,
without an arbiter.

It occurs to me, revered sir, that we should take care lest,
after the Lord's passing, dispute arises in the Order - dispute for the woe of the manyfolk, for the grief of the manyfolk,

for the misfortune of the populace,
for the woe,
the sorrow of devas and mankind."<sup>11</sup>

"What do you think about this, Ānanda?

Those things taught by me to you
out of super-knowledge,<sup>12</sup>
that is to say
the four applications of mindfulness,
the four right efforts,
the four bases of psychic power,
the five controlling faculties,
the five powers,
the seven links in awakening,
the ariyan eightfold Way - do you, Ānanda, see even two monks professing differently about these things?"<sup>13</sup>

"Revered sir, those things taught to me by the Lord out of his super-knowledge,
that is to say
the four applications of mindfulness,
the four right efforts,
the four bases of psychic power,
the five controlling faculties,
the five powers,
the seven links in awakening,
the ariyan eightfold Way - I do not see even two monks professing differently about these things.

Yet, revered sir, those people who dwell dependent on the Lord might, after the Lord's passing, stir up dispute in the Order concerning either the mode of living or the Obligations<sup>14</sup> - this dispute would be for the woe of the manyfolk,

for the grief of the manyfolk,
for the misfortune of the populace, for the sorrow of devas and mankind."

[32] "That dispute which concerns either the mode of living or the Obligations is a trifle, Ānanda.

But, Ānanda, if there should arise in the Order a dispute either concerning the Way or concerning the course, this dispute would be for the woe of the manyfolk,
the grief of the manyfolk,
the misfortune of the populace,
the sorrow of devas and mankind.

These six are the sources of dispute,<sup>15</sup> Ānanda.

What six?

As to this, Ānanda, a monk is angry and bears ill-will.

Ānanda, whatever monk is angry and bears ill-will,
he lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
he lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,
he lives without deference and respect towards the Order,
and he does not complete the training.

Ānanda, whatever monk lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,
lives without deference and respect towards the Order,
and does not complete the training,
he stirs up dispute in the Order,
and that dispute is for the woe of the manyfolk,
the grief of the manyfolk,

the misfortune of the populace,
the sorrow of devas and mankind.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive a source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should strive therein
to get rid of precisely that evil source of disputes.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive no source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should therein follow a course
so that there be no overflowing into the future
of precisely that evil source of disputes.

There is thus the getting rid
of that evil source of disputes,
there is thus no overflowing into the future
of that evil source of disputes.

■

As to this, Ānanda, a monk is harsh,
unmerciful.

Ānanda, whatever monk is harsh,
unmerciful,
he lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
he lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,
he lives without deference and respect towards the Order,
and he does not complete the training.

Ānanda, whatever monk lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,
lives without deference and respect towards the Order,

and does not complete the training,
he stirs up dispute in the Order,
and that dispute is for the woe of the manyfolk,
the grief of the manyfolk,
the misfortune of the populace,
the sorrow of devas and mankind.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive a source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should strive therein
to get rid of precisely that evil source of disputes.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive no source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should therein follow a course
so that there be no overflowing into the future
of precisely that evil source of disputes.

There is thus the getting rid
of that evil source of disputes,
there is thus no overflowing into the future
of that evil source of disputes.

■

As to this, Ānanda, a monk is envious and grudging.

Ānanda, whatever monk is harsh,
unmerciful,
he lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
he lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,
he lives without deference and respect towards the Order,
and he does not complete the training.

Ānanda, whatever monk lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,
lives without deference and respect towards the Order,
and does not complete the training,
he stirs up dispute in the Order,
and that dispute is for the woe of the manyfolk,
the grief of the manyfolk,
the misfortune of the populace,
the sorrow of devas and mankind.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive a source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should strive therein
to get rid of precisely that evil source of disputes.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive no source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should therein follow a course
so that there be no overflowing into the future
of precisely that evil source of disputes.

There is thus the getting rid
of that evil source of disputes,
there is thus no overflowing into the future
of that evil source of disputes.

■

As to this, Ānanda, a monk is crafty and deceitful.

Ānanda, whatever monk is harsh,
unmerciful,
he lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
he lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,

he lives without deference and respect towards the Order,
and he does not complete the training.

Ānanda, whatever monk lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,
lives without deference and respect towards the Order,
and does not complete the training,
he stirs up dispute in the Order,
and that dispute is for the woe of the manyfolk,
the grief of the manyfolk,
the misfortune of the populace,
the sorrow of devas and mankind.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive a source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should strive therein
to get rid of precisely that evil source of disputes.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive no source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should therein follow a course
so that there be no overflowing into the future
of precisely that evil source of disputes.

There is thus the getting rid
of that evil source of disputes,
there is thus no overflowing into the future
of that evil source of disputes.

■

As to this, Ānanda, a monk is of evil desires and wrong views.

Ānanda, whatever monk is harsh,
unmerciful,
he lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
he lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,
he lives without deference and respect towards the Order,
and he does not complete the training.

Ānanda, whatever monk lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,
lives without deference and respect towards the Order,
and does not complete the training,
he stirs up dispute in the Order,
and that dispute is for the woe of the manyfolk,
the grief of the manyfolk,
the misfortune of the populace,
the sorrow of devas and mankind.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive a source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should strive therein
to get rid of precisely that evil source of disputes.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive no source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should therein follow a course
so that there be no overflowing into the future
of precisely that evil source of disputes.

There is thus the getting rid
of that evil source of disputes,
there is thus no overflowing into the future
of that evil source of disputes.

■

As to this, Ānanda, a monk is infected with worldliness.

Ānanda, whatever monk is harsh,
unmerciful,
he lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
he lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,
he lives without deference and respect towards the Order,
and he does not complete the training.

Ānanda, whatever monk lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,
lives without deference and respect towards the Order,
and does not complete the training,
he stirs up dispute in the Order,
and that dispute is for the woe of the manyfolk,
the grief of the manyfolk,
the misfortune of the populace,
the sorrow of devas and mankind.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive a source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should strive therein
to get rid of precisely that evil source of disputes.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive no source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should therein follow a course
so that there be no overflowing into the future
of precisely that evil source of disputes.

There is thus the getting rid
of that evil source of disputes,

there is thus no overflowing into the future
of that evil source of disputes.

■

As to this, Ānanda, a monk is obstinate and stubborn.

Ānanda, whatever monk is harsh,
unmerciful,
he lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
he lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,
he lives without deference and respect towards the Order,
and he does not complete the training.

Ānanda, whatever monk lives without deference and respect towards the Teacher,
lives without deference and respect towards dhamma,
lives without deference and respect towards the Order,
and does not complete the training,
he stirs up dispute in the Order,
and that dispute is for the woe of the manyfolk,
the grief of the manyfolk,
the misfortune of the populace,
the sorrow of devas and mankind.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive a source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should strive therein
to get rid of precisely that evil source of disputes.

If you, Ānanda, should perceive no source of dispute like this among yourselves
or among others,
you, Ānanda, should therein follow a course
so that there be no overflowing into the future
of precisely that evil source of disputes.

There is thus the getting rid
of that evil source [33]of disputes,
there is thus no overflowing into the future
of that evil source of disputes.

These, Ānanda, are the six sources of dispute.

---

These four, Ānanda, are the legal questions.<sup>16</sup>

What four?

A legal question arising out of disputes, a legal question arising out of censure, a legal question arising out of offences, a legal question arising out of obligations.

These, Ānanda, are the four legal questions.

---

But these seven (rules<sup>17</sup>) which are for deciding legal questions are for the deciding and the settlement of legal questions arising from time to time:

a verdict in the presence of<sup>18</sup> may be given, a verdict of innocence may be given, a verdict of past insanity may be given,
it may be carried out on (his) acknowledgement, (there is) the decision of the majority,

the decision for specific depravity, the covering up (as) with grass.

■

And what, Ānanda, is the
'verdict in the presence of'?<sup>19</sup>

As to this, Ānanda, monks dispute, saying:

'It is dhamma'

or

'It is not dhamma'

or

'It is discipline'

or

'It is not discipline.'<sup>20</sup>

Ānanda, one and all of these monks should assemble in a complete Order;
having assembled,
what belongs to dhamma<sup>21</sup> should be threshed out;
having threshed out what belongs to dhamma
according to how it corresponds here,
so should that legal question be settled.

Thus, Ānanda, is the
'verdict in the presence of';
but here there is the settlement of a particular type of legal question, namely by the verdict in the presence of.

■

And what, Ānanda, is the 'decision of the majority'?<sup>22</sup>

If these monks, Ānanda, are not able to settle that legal question in this residence,

then, Ānanda, these monks must go to a residence where there are more monks,<sup>23</sup> and there one and all must assemble in a complete Order;
having assembled,
what belongs to dhamma must be threshed out;
having threshed out what belongs to dhamma
according to how it corresponds here,
so should that legal question be settled.

Thus, Ānanda, is
'the decision of the majority';
but here there is the settlement of a particular type of legal question, namely by the decision of the majority.

■

[34] And what, Ānanda, is the 'verdict of innocence'?<sup>24</sup>

As to this, Ānanda, monks reprove a monk for a serious offence like this:
one involving defeat<sup>25</sup> or one bordering on defeat, saying:

'Does the venerable one remember having fallen into a serious offence like this:
one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat?'

If he says:

'I, your reverences, do not remember having fallen into a serious offence like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat,'

to that monk, Ānanda, a verdict of innocence should be given.

Thus, Ānanda, is the
'verdict of innocence';
but here there is the settlement of a particular type of legal question, namely by the verdict of innocence.

■

And what, Ānanda, is the 'verdict of past insanity'?<sup>26</sup>

As to this, Ānanda, monks reprove a monk for a serious offence like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat.'

If he says:

'I, your reverences, do not remember having fallen into a serious offence
like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat,'

then, denying this,
he is pressed (by the monks), saying:

'Please, venerable one,
do find out properly
whether you remember having fallen into a serious offence like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat.'

If he says:

'I, your reverences, had become crazy and had lost my mental balance;<sup>27</sup> while I was crazy,
much was perpetrated and said by me that was not worthy of a recluse.

I do not remember that.

That was done by me while I was insane,' to that monk, Ānanda, a verdict of past insanity should be given.

Thus, Ānanda, is the

'verdict of past insanity';

but here there is the settlement of a particular type of legal question, namely by the verdict of past insanity.

■

And what, Ānanda, is the

'carrying out (of a formal act) on the acknowledgement of (a monk)'<sup>28</sup>

As to this, Ānanda, a monk whether reproved or not reproved remembers an offence, reveals it,

discloses it.

That monk, Ānanda,

having approached an older monk,

having arranged his upper robe over one shoulder,

having saluted the older monk's feet, having sat down on his haunches, raising his joined palms, should speak thus to him:

'I, revered sir, have fallen into such and such an offence which I confess.'

He speaks thus:

'Do you see it?'

'I see it.'

'Will you be restrained in the future?'

I will be restrained.'

Thus, Ānanda, is the 'carrying out [35] (of a formal act) on the acknowledgement of a monk';
but here there is the settlement of a particular type of legal question, namely by the carrying out (of a formal act) on the acknowledgement (of a monk).

■

And what, Ānanda, is the
'decision for specific depravity'?<sup>29</sup>

As to this, Ānanda, monks reprove a monk for a serious offence like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat,
saying:

'Does the venerable one remember having fallen into a serious offence like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat?'

If he says:

'I, your reverences, do not remember having fallen into a serious offence
like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat,' then, denying it,

he is pressed (by the monks) who say:

'Please, venerable one,
do find out properly

whether you remember having fallen into a serious offence like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat.'

If he says:

'I, your reverences,
do not remember having fallen into a serious offence like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat;
but I remember, your reverences, having fallen into such and such a slight offence,'

then, denying this,
he is pressed (by the monks) who say:

'Please, venerable one,
do find out properly
if you remember having fallen into a serious offence like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat.'

If he speaks thus:

'Certainly, your reverences, although I have not been asked,
I will acknowledge having fallen into this slight offence;
then how could I,
since I have been asked,
not acknowledge having fallen into a serious offence like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat?'

Someone<sup>30</sup> says to him:

'If you, your reverence, when not asked,

will not acknowledge having fallen into this slight offence, how will you,
when asked whether you have fallen into a serious offence like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat,
acknowledge it?

Please, venerable one, do find out properly whether you remember having fallen into a serious offence like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat.'

He then says:

'I do remember, your reverence, having fallen into a serious offence like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat.'

When I said:

'I do not remember having fallen into a serious offence like this,
either one involving defeat
or one bordering on defeat -
I was speaking thus for fun,
I spoke in jest.'

Thus, Ānanda, is the
'decision for specific depravity';
but here there is the settlement [36] of a particular type of legal question, namely by the decision for specific depravity.

■

And what, Ānanda, is the
'covering up (as) with grass'?<sup>31</sup>

As to this, Ānanda, while monks live striving,
quarrelling,
disputing,
much is perpetrated and spoken that is not worthy of a recluse.

Ānanda, one and all of these monks should gather together in a complete Order; having gathered together, an experienced monk from one of the factions of monks,
rising from his seat,
having arranged his upper robe over one shoulder,
having joined his palms in salutation, should inform the Order,
saying:

'Revered sirs, let the Order listen to me.

While we were striving,
quarrelling,
disputing,
much was perpetrated and spoken
that was not worthy of a recluse.

If it seems right to the Order,
I would confess whatever is the offence of the venerable ones
as well as whatever is my own offence, both for the sake of the venerable ones
and for my own sake,
unless it is a heavy sin,<sup>32</sup> unless it is connected with the laity,<sup>33</sup> (so as to obtain) a covering up (as) with grass.'

After that, an experienced monk from the other faction of monks,
rising from his seat,
having arranged his upper robe over one shoulder,

having joined his palms in salutation,
should inform the Order,
saying:

'Revered sirs, let the Order listen to me.

While we were striving,
quarrelling,
disputing,
much was perpetrated and spoken
that was not worthy of a recluse.

If it seems right to the Order,
I would confess whatever is the offence of the venerable ones
as well as whatever is my own offence,
both for the sake of the venerable ones
and for my own sake,
unless it is a heavy sin, unless it is connected with the laity,
(so as to obtain) a covering up (as) with grass.'

Thus, Ānanda, is the
'covering up (as) with grass';
but here there is the settlement of a particular type of legal question, namely by the covering up (as) with grass.

---

Ānanda, these six things are to be remembered;<sup>34</sup> making for affection,
making for respect,
they conduce to concord,
to lack of contention,

to harmony
and unity.

What six?

Herein, Ānanda, a monk should offer his fellow Brahma-farers a friendly act of body
both in public and in private.

This is a thing to be remembered,
making for affection,
making for respect,
which conduces to concord,
to lack of contention,
to harmony
and unity.

■

And again, Ānanda, a monk should offer his fellow Brahma-farers a friendly act of speech
both in public and in private.

This is a thing to be remembered,
making for affection,
making for respect,
which conduces to concord,
to lack of contention,
to harmony
and unity.

■

And again, Ānanda, a monk should offer his fellow Brahma-farers a friendly act of thought both in public and in private.

This is a thing to be remembered,
making for affection,
making for respect,
which conduces to concord,
to lack of contention,
to harmony
and unity.

■

And again, Ānanda, whatever are those lawful acquisitions, lawfully acquired,
if they be even but what is put into the begging bowl - a monk should be one to enjoy sharing such acquisitions, to enjoy them in common with his virtuous fellow [37] Brahma-farers.

This is a thing to be remembered,
making for affection,
making for respect,
which conduces to concord,
to lack of contention,
to harmony
and unity.

■

And again, Ānanda, whatever are those moral habits that are faultless, without flaw,
spotless,
without blemish,
freeing,
praised by wise men,
untarnished,
conducive to concentration - a monk should dwell united in moral habits such as these with his fellow Brahma-farers,

both in public and in private.

This is a thing to be remembered,
making for affection,
making for respect,
which conduces to concord,
to lack of contention,
to harmony
and unity.

■

And again, Ānanda, whatever view is ariyan, leading onwards,
leading him who acts according to it to the complete destruction of anguish - a monk should dwell united in such a view as this
with his fellow Brahma-farers,
both in public and in private.

This is a thing to be remembered,
making for affection,
making for respect,
which conduces to concord,
to lack of contention,
to harmony
and unity.

Ānanda, these are the six things to be remembered,
making for affection,
making for respect,
which conduce to concord,
to lack of contention,
to harmony
and unity.

If you, Ānanda, undertaking these six things to be remembered should practise them, would you, Ānanda, see any way of speech, subtle or gross, that you could not endure?<sup>35</sup>

"No, revered sir."

"Wherefore, Ānanda, undertaking these six things to be remembered, practise them; for a long time it will be for your welfare and happiness."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the venerable Ānanda rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse at Samagaina:
The Fourth

---

<sup>1</sup> The introductory part of this Sta. is the same as D. iii 117-118 (Pāsādika Suttanta). The strifes following Nātaputta's death are also repeated at D. iii 210. Another Discourse given by Gotama while he was staying by the lotus-pool near Sāmagāma is recorded at A. iii. 309.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. M. ii. 3, D. i. 8, and see notes at Dial. i. 14-15.

<sup>3</sup> aviciṇṇa. Most contexts have v.l. adhiciṇṇa.

<sup>4</sup> MA. iv. 33 gives cirakālasevanavasena.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. Vin. i. 60, M. ii. 122, S. i. 160.

<sup>6</sup> cara vādappamokkhāya. MA. iv. 33 says, "Taking a bag with food, and approaching this (person) and that, go along seeking further for thinking out the argument," vādappamokkhatthāya. But DA. i. 91 says, "Go away so as to free yourself from anger, train yourself having gone here and there." Cf. cara at Vin. iv. 139, and also see Dial. i. 15, n. 3.

<sup>7</sup> "Free yourself from the speech that has been refuted by me," MA. iv. 33.

<sup>8</sup> Nātaputtiyesu, among Nāta's sons, explained at MA. iv. 33 as Nātaputta's antevāsika, his (resident) pupils.

<sup>9</sup> paṭivāṇarūpa, no longer respectful.

<sup>10</sup> samañuddesa defined by sāmaṇera at Vin. iv. 139. Cunda was, according to MA. iv. 36, Sāriputta's younger brother, called "the novice" before he was ordained. Thag. 141-142 ascribes verses to Mahā-Cunda, also said to be Sāriputta's younger brother; see Pss. Breath. p. 119, n. 1.

<sup>11</sup> Last phrase also at Vin. ii. 89, D. iii. 246, S. ii. 255, A. i. 19.

<sup>12</sup> As above, p. 25.

<sup>13</sup> MA. iv. 37 honourably points out that the dispute between two monks (recorded in the Kosambakkhandhaka, Vin. i. 352 ff.) grew to such great proportions that the people split into two factions.

<sup>14</sup> adhipātimokkha. MA. iv. 38 gives rather an elaborate explanation: a monk who claims a state of further-men falls into a Pārājika offence (No. IV); beginning with this, six rules of training are laid down in the Parivāra; with the exception of these, all the remaining rules of training are called adhipātimokkha.

<sup>15</sup> Cf. Vin. ii. 89 with the following, and see B.D. v. 118; also D. iii. 246.

<sup>16</sup> adhikaraṇa, or adjudication. The four adhikaraṇa are explained at Vin. ii. 88. See also Vin. iii. 164, iv. 126, 238.

<sup>17</sup> dhammā at Vin. iv. 207, but dhamma as "rule" is more or less Vinaya in usage. Cf. also D. iii. 254, A. iv. 144.

<sup>18</sup> On these ways of settling legal questions, see Vin. iv. 207 and B.D. iii. 153 f. for notes and further references.

<sup>19</sup> See Vin. ii. 93.

<sup>20</sup> Cf. Vin. ii. 88.

<sup>21</sup> dhammanetti. P.E.D. says netti = niyāma.

<sup>22</sup> Here the usual order is altered. On yebhuyyasikā see Vin. ii. 93 ff.

<sup>23</sup> Even two or three more, MA. iv. 48.

<sup>24</sup> sativinaya. See Vin. i. 325, ii. 79 f., 99 f.; and G.S. i. 85, n. 7.

<sup>25</sup> A pārājika offence.

<sup>26</sup> amūḷhavinaya. See Vin. ii. 80 f. 100, and cf. Vin. i. 123.

<sup>27</sup> The words here are slightly different from those at Vin. ii. 81. Cf. S. i. 126.

<sup>28</sup> patiññālakaraṇa. See Vin. i. 325, ii. 83.

<sup>29</sup> tassapāpiyyasikā. See Vin. ii. 85 f., A. iv. 347.

<sup>30</sup> so. Chalmers: "the spokesman," Neumann: "jener."

<sup>31</sup> tiṇavatthāraka. Cf. Vin. ii. 86 f.

<sup>32</sup> MA. iv. 50, a pārājika or saṅghādisesa offence.

<sup>33</sup> MA. iv. 50 says that this refers to a monk reviling or insulting householders.

<sup>34</sup> As at M. i. 322.

<sup>35</sup> For the last sentence, cf. M. i. 129.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
1. Devadaha Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
1. The Devadaha Division

105. Discourse to Sunakkhatta

Sunakkhatta Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Vesālī in the Great Grove in the hall of the Gabled House.

Now at that time a number of monks declared
in the Lord's presence
that they had profound knowledge,
saying:

"We comprehend that destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is [38] what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so."

Sunakkhatta the son of a Licchavi<sup>1</sup> heard that a number of monks declared

in the Lord's presence
that they had profound knowledge,
saying:

"We comprehend that destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so."

Then Sunakkhatta the son of a Licchavi approached the Lord;
having approached
and greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Sunakkhatta the son of a Licchavi spoke thus to the Lord:

"I have heard, revered sir,
that a number of monks declared
in the Lord's presence
that they had profound knowledge,
saying:

'We comprehend that destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.'

Revered sir, did those monks who declared in the Lord's presence that they had profound knowledge, saying:

'We comprehend that destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so' - did they declare properly

that they had profound knowledge, or were there perhaps some monks there who, out of over-conceit,<sup>2</sup> declared that they had profound knowledge?"

"Sunakkhatta, among the monks who in my presence
declared that they had profound knowledge,
saying:

'We comprehend that destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so,'
there were some monks there who declared properly
that they had profound knowledge, but there were also some monks there who, out of over-conceit,
declared that they had profound knowledge.

As to this, Sunakkhatta, those monks who declared properly
that they had profound knowledge, for them it is so.

But as to those monks, Sunakkhatta,
who, out of over-conceit,
declared that they had profound knowledge,
it occurs to the Tathāgata:

'I should teach these dhamma.'

And so it is in this case, Sunakkhatta, that it occurs to the Tathāgata:

'I should teach these dhamma.'

But there are moreover some foolish persons here who, having constructed a question, approach the Tathāgata and ask (him).

In this case, Sunakkhatta, this too occurs to the Tathāgata:

'I should teach these dhamma,' and it does not occur to him (to think) otherwise."

"It is the right time for this, Lord,
it is the right time for this, Well-farer.

The monks, having heard from the Lord whatever dhamma the Lord may teach, will remember it."

"Well then, Sunakkhatta, listen,
attend carefully
and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
Sunakkhatta the son of a Licchavi answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus: [39]

"These five, Sunakkhatta, are the strands of sense-pleasure.<sup>3</sup>

What five?

Material shapes cognisable by the eye,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,

enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

Sounds cognisable by the ear,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

Smells cognisable by the nose,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

Tastes cognisable by the tongue,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

Touches cognisable by the body,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

These, Ānanda, are the five strands of sense-pleasures.

But this situation exists, Sunakkhatta,
when some individual here may be set on the material things of the world,<sup>4</sup> and the talk of the individual who is set on the material things of the world
follows a pattern
in accordance with which he reflects and ponders,
and he associates with that man
under whom he finds felicity; but when there is talk<sup>5</sup> connected with imperturbability
he does not listen,
does not lend ear,
does not arouse his mind to profound knowledge,<sup>6</sup>
and he does not associate with that man
under whom he does not find felicity.

Sunakkhatta, it is like a man who may have been absent a long time from his own village or market town and may see a man recently come from that village or market town; he would ask him about the safety of that village or market town and about the plentifulness of the food and absence of sickness; that man might speak to him about the safety of that village or market town and about the plentifulness of the food and absence of sickness.

What do you think about this, Sunakkhatta?

Would not that man listen,
lend ear,
arouse his mind to profound knowledge, and would he not associate with that man under whom he found felicity?"

"Yes, revered sir."

"Even so, Sunakkhatta, the situation exists when some individual here may be set on the material things of the world, and the talk of the individual
who is set on the material things of the world
follows a pattern
in accordance with which he reflects and ponders,
and he associates with that man
under whom he finds felicity;
but when there is talk connected with imperturbability
he does not listen,
does not lend ear,
does not arouse his mind to profound knowledge,
and he does not associate with that man
under whom he does not find felicity.

He should be spoken of as an individual who is set on the material things of the world.

[40] But this situation exists, Sunakkhatta,
when some individual here
may be set on imperturbability, and the talk of the individual, Sunakkhatta,
who is set on imperturbability
follows a pattern
in accordance with which he reflects and ponders,
and he associates with that man
under whom he finds felicity;
but when there is talk connected with the material things of the world
he does not listen,
does not lend ear,
does not arouse his mind to profound knowledge,
and he does not associate with that man
under whom he does not find felicity.

Sunakkhatta, as a sere leaf, loosened from its stalk, cannot become green again,<sup>7</sup>

even so, Sunakkhatta,
when the fetter of the material things of the world is loosened by that individual who is set on imperturbability
he should be spoken of
as an individual who is set on imperturbability for he is released from the material things of the world.

But this situation exists, Sunakkhatta,
when some individual here
may be set on no-thing,
and the talk of the individual, Sunakkhatta,
who is set on the plane of no-thing
follows a pattern
in accordance with which he reflects and ponders,
and he associates with that man
under whom he finds felicity;
but when there is talk connected with imperturbability
he does not listen,
does not lend ear,
does not arouse his mind to profound knowledge,
and he does not associate with that man
under whom he does not find felicity.

Sunakkhatta, as a rock that is broken in two cannot become whole again,<sup>8</sup> even so, Sunakkhatta, when the fetter of imperturbability is broken by that individual who is set on the plane of no-thing,
he should be spoken of
as an individual who is set on the plane of no-thing for he is released from the fetter of imperturbability.

But this situation exists, Sunakkhatta,
when some individual here
may be set on the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception,
and the talk of the individual, Sunakkhatta, who is set on the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception
follows a pattern
in accordance with which he reflects and ponders,
and he associates with that man
under whom he finds felicity;
but when there is talk connected with the plane of no-thing
he does not listen,
does not lend ear,
does not arouse his mind to profound knowledge,
and he does not associate with that man
under whom he does not find felicity.

It is like a man, Sunakkhatta, who after eating a meal of dainties might throw away (the remains).

What do you think about this, Sunakkhatta?

Would that man have any further desire for that meal?"

[41] "No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

That meal, revered sir, is considered to be objectionable."

"Even so Sunakkhatta,
when that fetter of the plane of no-thing is laid aside by the individual who is set on the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception,
he should be spoken of
as an individual who is set on the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-
perception

for he is released from the fetter of the plane of no-thing.

But this situation exists, Sunakkhatta,
when some individual here
may be set on perfect nibbāna,<sup>9</sup>
and the talk of the individual, Sunakkhatta, who is set on perfect nibbāna
follows a pattern
in accordance with which he reflects and ponders;
and he associates with that man
under whom he finds felicity;
but when there is talk connected with the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception
he does not listen,
does not lend ear,
does not arouse his mind to profound knowledge,
and he does not associate with that man
under whom he does not find felicity.

Sunakkhatta, as a palm-tree whose crown has been cut off cannot grow again,
even so, Sunakkhatta,
when the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception is cut off for an individual who is set on perfect nibbāna, cut off at the root,
made like a palm-tree that, eradicated, is not liable to rise up again in the future, he should be spoken of as an individual who is set on perfect nibbāna for he is released from the fetter of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.

But this situation exists, Sunakkhatta, when it occurs to some monk here that:

'Craving has been called a dart<sup>10</sup> by the Recluse<sup>11</sup> the virus of ignorance wracks (a man) with desire, attachment
and ill will.

The dart of craving
has been got rid of by me, drained off is the virus of ignorance,
I am set on perfect nibbāna' -

he may be thus proud of his existing goal.

He may give himself up
to such things as are deleterious
to one who is set on perfect nibbāna:
he may give himself up to deleterious vision of material shapes through the eye,
he may give himself up to deleterious sounds through the ear
he may give himself up to deleterious smells through the nose he may give himself up to deleterious tastes through the tongue he may give himself up to deleterious touches through the body he may give himself up [42] to deleterious mental states through the mind.

While he is given up to deleterious vision of material shapes through the eye,
while he is given up to deleterious sounds through the ear while he is given up to deleterious smells through the nose while he is given up to deleterious tastes through the tongue while he is given up to deleterious touches through the body while he is given up to deleterious mental states through the mind, attachment may assail his thought;
with his thought assailed by attachment
he may come to death
or to pain like unto death.

It is as if, Sunakkhatta, a man were pierced by an arrow<sup>12</sup> that was thickly smeared with poison;
his friends and acquaintances,
kith and kin,
might procure a physician and surgeon;
that physician and surgeon
might cut round the opening of his wound with a knife;
having cut round the opening of the wound with the knife,
he might probe for the arrow with a (surgeon's) probe;
having probed for the arrow with the (surgeon's) probe,
he might extract the arrow,
he might drain off the virus leaving some behind but thinking none remained,
and he might speak thus:

'My good man,
the arrow has been extracted from you,
the virus drained off
so that none is left,
there is no<sup>13</sup> danger for you, but you should eat only beneficial foods
and take care
lest, eating deleterious foods,
your wound discharges.

And from time to time
you should bathe the wound,
from time to time
you should anoint the opening of the wound,
but take care
lest, bathing the wound from time to time, anointing the opening of the wound from time to time,
the old blood cakes on the wound.

And take care
if you are anxious to go out into the wind and the heat of the sun,
for unless you are careful when you go out into the wind and the heat of the sun, dust and dirt<sup>14</sup> may assail the opening of the wound.

But if you, my good man,
take care of the wound,
the wound will heal.'

It may occur to him:

'The arrow has been extracted,
the virus drained off so that none remains,
and there is no danger for me,'

and so he may eat only deleterious foods, and while doing so his wound may discharge; and he may not bathe the wound from time to time nor anoint the opening of the wound from time to time; not bathing the wound from time to time nor anointing the opening of the wound from time to time, the old blood may cake on the opening of the wound;
and if he is anxious to go out into the wind and the heat of the sun, dust and dirt may assail the opening of the wound; and if he should not take care of the opening of the wound the wound does not heal.

Both because he does precisely the deleterious things [43] and because,
although when the noisome virus was drained off some remained,
the wound may increase in size.<sup>15</sup>

With the wound increased in size
he may come to death
or to pain like unto death -
even so, Sunakkhatta, the situation exists when it might occur to some monk here that

'Craving has been called a dart by the Recluse;
the virus of ignorance wracks (a man) with desire,
attachment
and ill-will.

That dart of craving has been got rid of by me,
drained off is the virus of ignorance,
I am set on perfect nibbāna' -

he may be thus proud of his existing goal.

He may give himself up
to such things as are deleterious
to one who is set on perfect nibbāna:
he may give himself up to deleterious vision of material shapes through the
eye,
he may give himself up to deleterious sounds through the ear
he may give himself up to deleterious smells through the nose
he may give himself up to deleterious tastes through the tongue
he may give himself up to deleterious touches through the body
he may give himself up to deleterious mental states through the mind.

While he is given up to deleterious vision of material shapes through the
eye,
while he is given up to deleterious sounds through the ear
while he is given up to deleterious smells through the nose
while he is given up to deleterious tastes through the tongue
while he is given up to deleterious touches through the body while he is given up to deleterious mental states through the mind, attachment may assail his thought;

with his thought assailed by attachment
he may come to death
or to pain like unto death.

For this, Sunakkhatta, is death in the discipline for an ariyan: when, disavowing the training, he returns to the secular life;
and this, Sunakkhatta, is pain like unto death:
when he falls into a grievous<sup>16</sup> offence.

But this situation exists, Sunakkhatta, when it may occur to some monk here:

'Craving has been called a dart by the Recluse;
the virus of ignorance wracks (a man) with desire,
attachment
and ill-will.

That dart of craving has been got rid of by me,
drained off is the virus of ignorance,
I am set on perfect nibbāna' -

Precisely because he is set on perfect nibbāna
he may not give himself up to those things which are deleterious to one set on perfect nibbāna:
he may not give himself up to deleterious vision of material shapes through
the eye,
he may not give himself up to deleterious sounds through the ear he may not give himself up to deleterious smells through the nose he may not give himself up to deleterious tastes through the tongue he may not give himself up to deleterious touches through the body he may not give himself up to deleterious mental states through the mind.

Attachment may not assail the thought of one not given up to deleterious vision of material shapes through the eye of one not given up to deleterious sounds through the ear of one not given up to deleterious smells through the nose of one not given up to deleterious tastes through the tongue of one not given up to deleterious touches through the body of one not given up to deleterious mental states through the mind;

while his thought is not assailed by attachment,
he may not come to death
or to pain like unto death.

It is as if Sunakkhatta,
a man were pierced by an arrow
that was thickly smeared with poison;
his friends and acquaintances,
his kith and kin
might procure a physician and surgeon;
that physician and surgeon
might cut round the opening of his wound with a knife;
having cut round the opening of the wound with the knife,
he might probe for the arrow with a (surgeon's) probe;
having probed for the arrow with the (surgeon's) probe,
he might extract the arrow,
he might drain off the virus
with none remaining,
and he might speak thus:

'My good man,
the arrow has been extracted from you,
the virus drained off
so that none is left,
there is no danger for you,
but you should eat only beneficial foods
and take care
lest, eating deleterious foods,
your wound discharges.

And from time to time
you should bathe the wound,

from time to time
you should anoint the opening of the wound,
but take care
lest, bathing the wound from time to time,
anointing the opening of the wound from time to time,
the old blood cakes on the wound.

And take care
if you are anxious to go out into the wind and the heat of the sun,
for unless you are careful
when you go out into the wind and the heat of the sun, dust and dirt
may assail the opening of the wound.

But if you, my good man,
take care of the wound,
the wound will heal.'

It may occur to him:

The arrow has been extracted,
the virus drained off
so that none remains,
and there is no danger for me,' but he may eat only beneficial foods, and while doing so

his wound may not discharge; and he may bathe the wound from time to time and anoint the opening of the wound from time [44] to time; since he bathes the wound from time to time and anoints the opening of the wound from time to time, the old blood will not cake on the opening of the wound;
and if he is not anxious to go out into the wind and the heat of the sun, dust and dirt will not assail the opening of the wound;

and if he should take care of the opening of the wound, the wound heals.

Both because he does only the beneficial things and because the noisome virus is drained off with none remaining, the wound will close up; when the wound is closed by the skin he will not come to death
or to pain like unto death -
even so, Sunakkhatta, the situation exists when it might occur to some monk here:

'Craving has been called a dart by the Recluse;
the virus of ignorance wracks (a man) with desire,
attachment
and ill-will.

That dart of craving has been got rid of by me,
drained off is the virus of ignorance,
I am set on perfect nibbāna' -

Precisely because he is set on perfect nibbāna
he may not give himself up to those things
which are deleterious to one set on perfect nibbāna:
he may not give himself up to deleterious vision of material shapes through
the eye,
he may not give himself up to deleterious sounds through the ear
he may not give himself up to deleterious smells through the nose
he may not give himself up to deleterious tastes through the tongue
he may not give himself up to deleterious touches through the body he may not give himself up to deleterious mental states through the mind.

Attachment may not assail the thought
of one not given up to deleterious vision of material shapes through the eye of one not given up to deleterious sounds through the ear of one not given up to deleterious smells through the nose

of one not given up to deleterious tastes through the tongue
of one not given up to deleterious touches through the body of one not given up to deleterious mental states through the mind;
while his thought is not assailed by attachment,
he may not come to death
or to pain like unto death.

I have made this simile, Sunakkhatta, for the sake of clarifying the meaning.

Just this is the meaning here:

'The wound,' Sunakkhatta, is a synonym for the six inner (sense-) fields.

'The virus,' Sunakkhatta, is a synonym for ignorance.

'The arrow,' Sunakkhatta, is a synonym for craving.

'The (surgeon's) probe,' Sunakkhatta, is a synonym for mindfulness.

'The knife' Sunakkhatta, is a synonym for the ariyan wisdom.

'The physician and surgeon,' Sunakkhatta, is a synonym for the Tathāgata,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

Indeed, Sunakkhatta,
a monk who restrains himself among the six fields of (sensory) impingement,
thinking:

'Clinging is the root of anguish,' and having understood it so,

is without clinging,
freed by the destruction of clinging.<sup>17</sup>

That he should focus his body on clinging
or devote his thought to it,
this situation does not exist.

It is as if, Sunakkhatta,
there were a bronze goblet, fair and [45] fragrant, but charged with poison;
then a man might come along,
anxious to live,
anxious not to die,
anxious for happiness,
recoiling from pain.

What do you think about this, Sunakkhatta?

Would that man drink out of this bronze goblet if he knew:

'Having drunk from this,
I will come to death
or to pain like unto death'?"

"No, revered sir."

"Even so, Sunakkhatta,
that monk who restrains himself among the six fields of (sensory) impingement,
thinking:

'Clinging is the root of anguish,' having understood it so

is without clinging,
freed by the destruction of clinging.

That he should focus his body on clinging
or devote his thought to it -
this situation does not exist.

Sunakkhatta, it is like a deadly poisonous snake; and a man might come along anxious to live,<sup>18</sup> anxious not to die,
anxious for happiness,
recoiling from pain.

What do you think about this, Sunakkhatta?

Would that man proffer<sup>19</sup> his hand or toe<sup>20</sup> to that deadly poisonous snake if he knew:

'If I am bitten by this,
I will come to death
or pain like unto death?'

"No, revered sir."

"Even so, Sunakkhatta,
that monk who restrains himself among the six fields of (sensory) impingement,
thinking:

'Clinging is the root of anguish,'

having understood it so
is without clinging,
freed by the destruction of clinging.

That he should focus his body on clinging
or devote his thought to it -
this situation does not exist."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, Sunakkhatta the son of a Licchavi rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse to Sunakkhatta:
The Fifth

---

<sup>1</sup> See M. Sta. 12.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. A. v. 102 ff.

<sup>3</sup> As at M. i. 85, etc.

<sup>4</sup> loktāmisa; cf. M. i. 12, 155 f.

<sup>5</sup> kathāya kacchāmanāya, lit. when talk is being talked. Kacchamāna, pass. pres. part, of katheti, also at A. iii. 181.

<sup>6</sup> Cf. Vin. i. 10; D. i. 230-231.

<sup>7</sup> Cf. Vin. i. 96, iii. 47.

<sup>8</sup> Cf. Vin. i. 97.

<sup>9</sup> sammā-nibbāna, an unusual expression on which MA. iv. on the above passage makes no comment. It is by no means a foregone conclusion that the individual who is intent on it will win it, see below. It is possibly comparable to the final meditative stage: that where perceiving and feeling are stopped.

<sup>10</sup> Cf. S. i. 140.

<sup>11</sup> MA. iv. 55, Buddhasamana.

<sup>12</sup> salla is arrow as well as dart. For this simile, cf. M. ii. 216.

<sup>13</sup> Text reads alañ ca, but MA. iv. 65 reads analañ ca as does M. text nine lines lower down.

<sup>14</sup> rajosuka. MA. iv. 55 says rajo ca vīhisukādi ca sukam. Has suka any connection with awns of barley or paddy?

<sup>15</sup> puṭhuttam. MA. iv. 55 explains by mahantabhāvam, greatness.

<sup>16</sup> saṅkiliṭṭha usually means tarnished, soiled, corrupt. MA. iv. 55 gives garuka, serious, weighty.

<sup>17</sup> Cf. M. i. 454, A. ii. 24.

<sup>18</sup> Cf. M. i. 315.

<sup>19</sup> dajjā.

<sup>20</sup> aṅguṭṭha is more correctly "thumb," but this is included under hattha, hand.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
1. Devadaha Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
1. The Devadaha Division

106. Discourse on Beneficial Imperturbability

Āṇaṅjasappāya Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying among the Kuru people in the township of the Kurus called Kammāssadhamma.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Impermanent,<sup>2</sup> monks, are pleasures of the senses, hollow,<sup>3</sup> lying,<sup>4</sup> of the nature of falsehood;<sup>5</sup> this chatter of fools, monks, is made of illusion.

Those pleasures of the senses that are here and now<sup>6</sup> and those pleasures of the senses that are hereafter,<sup>7</sup> and those perceptions of pleasures of the senses
that are here and now
and those perceptions of pleasures of the senses
that are hereafter -
both<sup>8</sup> are of Māra's realm;
this is Māra's sphere,
this is Māra's crop,<sup>9</sup> this is Māra's pasturage.<sup>10</sup>

Here these evil unskilled intentions<sup>11</sup> conduce to covetousness
and ill-will
and destruction,
and these create a stumbling-block here in the training of an ariyan disciple.

As to this, monks,
an ariyan disciple reflects thus:

'Those pleasures of the senses
that are here and now
and those pleasures of the senses that are hereafter, and those perceptions of pleasures of the senses
that are here and now
and those perceptions of pleasures of the senses
that are hereafter -
both are of Māra's realm;
this is Māra's sphere,

this is Māra's crop,
this is Māra's pasturage.

Here these evil unskilled intentions conduce to covetousness
and ill-will
and destruction,
and these create a stumbling-block here
in the training of an ariyan disciple.

Suppose I were to abide with thought that is far-reaching,
wide-spread,
with a determined<sup>12</sup> mind, having overcome the world.<sup>13</sup>

For if I abide with my thought far-reaching,
wide-spread,
with my mind determined, having over- [47] come the world, these that are unskilled evil intentions:
covetousness,
ill-will
and destruction,
will not come to be;
and by my getting rid of these my thought<sup>14</sup> will not be limited<sup>15</sup> (but) immeasurable,<sup>16</sup> well-developed.<sup>17</sup>

While he is faring along thus,
abiding given over to this,
his thought is peaceful in its sphere;<sup>18</sup>
if he is serene
either he comes to imperturbability now or he is intent on wisdom.<sup>19</sup>

At the breaking up of the body after dying
this situation exists,
that that evolving consciousness<sup>20</sup> may accordingly<sup>21</sup> reach imperturbability.

This, monks, is pointed to as the first course in beneficial imperturbability.

---

And again, monks, an ariyan disciple reflects thus:<sup>22</sup>

'There are those pleasures of the senses
that are here and now
and those pleasures of the senses
that are hereafter,
and there are those perceptions of pleasures of the senses that are here and now and those perceptions of pleasures of the senses that are hereafter, and whatever is material shape is material shape (consisting of) the four great elementals and derived from them.'

While he is faring along thus,
abiding given over to this,
his thought is peaceful in its sphere;
if he is serene
either he comes to imperturbability now<sup>23</sup>
or he is intent on wisdom.

At the breaking up of the body after dying
this situation exists,

that that evolving consciousness
may accordingly reach imperturbability.

This, monks, is pointed to as the second course in beneficial imperturbability.

---

And again, monks, an ariyan disciple reflects thus:<sup>24</sup>

There [48] are those pleasures of the senses
that are here and now
and those pleasures of the senses that are hereafter,
and there are those perceptions of pleasures of the senses
that are here and now
and those perceptions of pleasures of the senses
that are hereafter,
and there are those material shapes
that are here and now
and those material shapes
that are hereafter,
and there are those perceptions of material shapes
that are here and now
and those perceptions of material shapes
that are hereafter;

and those perceptions of material shapes that are here and now<sup>25</sup> and those perceptions of material shapes that are hereafter - both are impermanent.

What is impermanent is not worth rejoicing over nor worth approval
nor worth cleaving to.'

While he is faring along thus,
abiding given over to this,
his thought is peaceful in its sphere;
if he is serene
either he comes to imperturbability now<sup>26</sup>
or he is intent on wisdom.

At the breaking up of the body after dying
this situation exists,
that that evolving consciousness
may accordingly reach imperturbability.

This, monks, is pointed to as the third course in beneficial imperturbability.

---

And again, monks, an ariyan disciple reflects thus:<sup>27</sup>

There are those pleasures of the senses
that are here and now
and those pleasures of the senses that are hereafter,
and there are those perceptions of pleasures of the senses
that are here and now
and those perceptions of pleasures of the senses
that are hereafter,
and there are those material shapes
that are here and now
and those material shapes
that are hereafter,
and there are those perceptions of material shapes
that are here and now
and those perceptions of material shapes

that are hereafter,
and there are those perceptions of imperturbability -
where all those perceptions are stopped without remainder,
that is the real,
that the excellent,<sup>28</sup> that is to say the plane of no-thing!

While he is faring along thus,
abiding given over to this,
his thought is peaceful in its sphere;
if he is serene
either he comes to the plane of no-thing now
or he is intent on wisdom.

At the breaking up of the body after dying
this situation exists,
that that evolving consciousness
may accordingly reach the plane of no-thing.

This, monks, is pointed to as the first course for the beneficial plane of no-thing.

---

And again, monks, an ariyan disciple, forest-gone
or gone to the root of a tree, reflects thus:<sup>29</sup>

'Empty<sup>30</sup> is this of self or of what belongs to self.'<sup>31</sup>

While he is faring along thus,
abiding given over to this,

his thought is peaceful in its sphere;
if he is serene
either he comes to the plane of no-thing now
or he is intent on wisdom.

At the breaking [49] up of the body after dying
this situation exists,
that that evolving consciousness
may accordingly reach the plane of no-thing.

This, monks, is pointed to as the second course for the beneficial plane of no-thing.

---

And again, monks, an ariyan disciple reflects thus:<sup>32</sup>

'I am naught of anyone anywhere
nor is there anywhere aught of mine.'<sup>33</sup>

While he is faring along thus,
abiding given over to this,
his thought is peaceful in its sphere;
if he is serene
either he comes to the plane of no-thing now
or he is intent on wisdom.

At the breaking up of the body after dying
this situation exists,
that that evolving consciousness
may accordingly reach the plane of no-thing.

This, monks, is pointed to as the third course for the beneficial plane of no-thing.

---

And again, monks, an ariyan disciple reflects thus :34

There are those pleasures of the senses
that are here and now
and those pleasures of the senses that are hereafter,
and there are those perceptions of pleasures of the senses
that are here and now
and those perceptions of pleasures of the senses
that are hereafter,
and there are those material shapes
that are here and now
and those material shapes
that are hereafter,
and there are those perceptions of material shapes
that are here and now
and those perceptions of material shapes
that are hereafter,
and there are those perceptions of imperturbability,
and there are those perceptions of the plane of no-thing -
where all those perceptions are stopped without remainder,
that is the real,
that the excellent,
that is to say the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.'

While he is faring along thus,
abiding given over to this,
his thought is peaceful in its sphere;
if he is serene

either he comes to the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception now or he is intent on wisdom.

At the breaking up of the body after dying
this situation exists,
that that evolving consciousness
may accordingly reach the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.

This; monks, is pointed to as the course for the beneficial plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception."

---

When this had been said
the venerable Ānanda, spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, if a monk is here faring along thus and thinks:

'Had it not been
it would not be mine;
if it be not
it will not be mine;<sup>35</sup>
I am getting rid of what is,
of what has come to be' -

he is [50] thus acquiring equanimity.<sup>36</sup>

Has not this monk, revered sir, attained final nibbāna?"

"It may be, Ānanda, that some monk here attains final nibbāna.

It may be that another monk here does not attain final nibbāna."

"What is the cause, revered sir,
what the reason
that some monk here
may attain final nibbāna, but that some other monk here may not attain final nibbāna?"<sup>37</sup>

"As to this, Ānanda,
if a monk is here faring along thus
and thinks:

'Had it not been
it would not be mine;
if it be not
it will not be mine;
I am getting rid of what is,
of what has come to be'-

he is thus acquiring equanimity.

He rejoices in this equanimity, approves of it
and cleaves to it.

While he rejoices in this equanimity, approves of it
and cleaves to it,
consciousness is dependent on it, grasping after it.

A monk who has grasping, Ānanda, does not attain final nibbāna."<sup>38</sup>

"But where,<sup>39</sup> revered sir, does a monk grasp who is grasping?"<sup>40</sup>

"The plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception, Ānanda."

"Indeed, revered sir, the monk who is grasping grasps after the best of graspings."<sup>41</sup>

"That monk who is grasping grasps after the best of graspings, Ānanda.

For this is the best of graspings, Ānanda,
that is to say
the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.

Ānanda, if a monk is here faring along thus<sup>42</sup>
and thinks:

'Had it not been
it would not be mine;
if it be not
it will not be mine;
I am getting rid of what is,
of what has come to be' -

he is thus acquiring equanimity.

He does not rejoice in that equanimity, does not approve of it or cleave to it.

Not rejoicing in that equanimity, not approving of it or cleaving to it,

consciousness is not dependent on it, not grasping after it.

A monk who is without grasping, Ānanda, attains final nibbāna."

"It is wonderful, revered sir,
it is marvellous, revered sir.

Indeed it is by means of this and that,<sup>43</sup> revered sir, that the crossing of the [51] flood has been pointed out to us by the Lord.<sup>44</sup>

But which, revered sir, is the ariyan Deliverance?"

"As to this, Ānanda,
an ariyan disciple<sup>45</sup> reflects thus:

There are those pleasures of the senses
that are here and now
and those pleasures of the senses that are hereafter,
and there are those perceptions of pleasures of the senses
that are here and now
and those perceptions of pleasures of the senses
that are hereafter,
and there are those material shapes
that are here and now
and those material shapes
that are hereafter,
and there are those perceptions of material shapes
that are here and now
and those perceptions of material shapes
that are hereafter,
and there are those perceptions of imperturbability,
and there are those perceptions of the plane of no-thing, and there are those perceptions of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-

perception -
whatever is 'own body'
this is 'own-body.'<sup>46</sup>

But this is deathlessness,<sup>47</sup> that is to say the deliverance of thought without grasping.<sup>48</sup>

So, Ānanda,
taught by me has been the course for beneficial imperturbability, taught the course for the beneficial plane of no-thing, taught the course for the beneficial plane of neither-perception-nor-non-
perception,
taught by means of this and that has been the crossing of the flood, taught the ariyan Deliverance.

Whatever, Ānanda, is to be done from compassion by a Teacher seeking the welfare of disciples, this has been done by me out of compassion for you.

These, Ānanda,
are the roots of trees,
these are empty places.

Meditate, Ānanda,
be not slothful,
be not remorseful later.

This is our instruction to you."<sup>49</sup>

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the venerable Ānanda rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on Beneficial Imperturbability:
The Sixth<sup>50</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> This "peculiarity of ... spelling" (āṇaṅja) with v.ll. is noticed in P.E.D., s.v. ānejja; cf. M. ii. 229, 253.

<sup>2</sup> As at A. v. 84.

<sup>3</sup> tuccha, empty of the essence of permanence, of stability, of self, MA. iv. 56.

<sup>4</sup> musa, which MA. iv. 56 explains by nassanaka, perishable.

<sup>5</sup> moghadhamma, v.l. mosadhamma, which is also the reading at A. v. 84 and MA. iv. 56.

<sup>6</sup> The five strands of human sense-pleasures, MA. iv. 57.

<sup>7</sup> Referring to those that are not "here and now."

<sup>8</sup> The sense-pleasures and the perceptions of them, MA. iv. 57.

<sup>9</sup> nivāpa; cf. Nivāpa-sutta, M. Sta. No. 26.

<sup>10</sup> Cf. S. v. 218 and v. 148-149.

<sup>11</sup> mānasā; see P.E.D.

<sup>12</sup> Having determined on jhāna.

<sup>13</sup> The world of the five senses, MA. iv. 58.

<sup>14</sup> In jhāna.

<sup>15</sup> aparitta. The mind that is small, limited, pamāṇa or paritta, has to do with pleasures of the senses. Cf. A. i. 249, paritto appātumo appadukkhavihārī ... aparitto mahattā appamāṇavihārī.

<sup>16</sup> Having to do with the spheres of form (or fine-materiality) and formlessness (or immateriality).

<sup>17</sup> subhāvita, having to do with what is transcendental, supermundane.

<sup>18</sup> āyatana, which is arahantship or the vision of arahantship or the fourth jhāna or access to it, MA. iv. 59. Āyatana can also mean performance, doing, kāraṇa.

<sup>19</sup> This may lead to arahantship or cultivating the way to it or to the fourth or third jhāna. If he fails to win arahantship, then the next sentence applies.

<sup>20</sup> saṃvattanika viññāṇa, or conducive consciousness. MA. iv. 61 says "that monk tends, arises, because of that consciousness of (good) result."

<sup>21</sup> yam. MA. iv. 61 gives yena kāraṇena, for this reason.

<sup>22</sup> I.e. when he has attained the fourth jhāna, MA. iv. 62.

<sup>23</sup> The imperturbability of the plane of infinite ākāsa, MA. iv. 62.

<sup>24</sup> I.e. when he has attained the plane of infinite ākāsa, MA. iv. 63. He has greater wisdom than have the two former monks.

<sup>25</sup> These two clauses are in Chalmers's text.

<sup>26</sup> In the plane of infinite consciousness.

<sup>27</sup> I.e. when he has attained the plane of infinite consciousness, MA. iv. 63.

<sup>28</sup> As at M. i. 436, ii. 235, A. iv. 423, v. 8, 110, 320, etc.

<sup>29</sup> While he is still at the plane of infinite consciousness.

<sup>30</sup> The text's saññam should be corrected to suññam.

<sup>31</sup> Of thoughts of "I" and "mine," thus the emptiness is twofold, MA. iv. 64.

<sup>32</sup> While he is still at the plane of infinite consciousness. But he is wiser than the five monks already referred to.

<sup>33</sup> This is the fourth "brahman truth" made known by Gotama at A. ii. 177. See also A. i. 206 and cf. Ud. 79, Dhp. 421. The emptiness is here fourfold, MA. iv. 64-65.

<sup>34</sup> I.e. when he has attained the plane of no thing.

<sup>35</sup> As at S. iii. 55, 99, 183. MA. iv. 65 explains: had it not been for my past fivefold circle of deeds (referring to the khandha) this present fivefold circle of results would not be for me; if this present fivefold circle of effects did not come to be, there would therefore be no fivefold circle of results for me in the future.

<sup>36</sup> Due to insight, vipasaanā.

<sup>37</sup> Cf. M. iii. 4-6.

<sup>38</sup> Cf. S. iv. 168, anupādiyam ... parinibbāyati.

<sup>39</sup> kaham, explained by kattha at MA. iv. 66, both meaning where, where to, where unto, whither.

<sup>40</sup> Grasping after paṭisandhi, re-linking, re-instatement, MA. iv. 67.

<sup>41</sup> He tries for re-instatement in the best state.

<sup>42</sup> Now speaking of a monk's arahantship.

<sup>43</sup> nissāya nissāya, on account of this attainment and that, MA. iv. 67.

<sup>44</sup> MA. iv. 67, 68 makes the point that in this Sta. "dry-visioned arahantship" is being spoken of.

<sup>45</sup> Again, a "dry-visioned" ariyan disciple.

<sup>46</sup> In the three spheres of kāma, rūpa, arūpa; beyond these there is no "own-body," MA. iv. 67.

<sup>47</sup> MA. iv. 67, "this is the real, this the excellent."

<sup>48</sup> Elsewhere called nibbāna (e.g. Vin. v. 164, Pts. ii. 46; cf. A. v. 64). But here the arahantship of the "dry-visioned" one is meant, MA. iv. 68.

<sup>49</sup> As at M. i. 46, etc.

<sup>50</sup> Here ends Chalmers's Majjhima-Nikāya, vol. II.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
1. Devadaha Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
1. The Devadaha Division

107. The Discourse to Ganaka-Moggallāna

Ganaka-Moggallāna Sutta

---

Thus I have heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvatti in the palace of Migara's mother in the Eastern Monastery. Then the brahman Ganaka-Moggallāna approached the Lord; having approached he exchanged greetings with the Lord; having conversed in a friendly and courteous way, he sat down at a respectful distance. As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Ganaka-Moggallāna the brahman spoke thus to the Lord: "Just as, good Gotama, in this palace of Migara's mother there can be seen a gradual training, a gradual doing, a gradual practice, that is to say as far as the last flight of stairs,<sup>1</sup> so, too, good Gotama, for these brahmans there can be seen a gradual training, a gradual doing, a gradual practice, that is to say in the study [of the Vedas];<sup>2</sup> so too, good Gotama, for these archers there can be seen a gradual... practice, that is to say in archery; so too, good Gotama, for us whose livelihood is calculation<sup>3</sup> there can be seen a gradual training, a gradual practice, that is to say in accountancy. For when we get a pupil, good Gotama, we first of all make him calculate: 'One one, two twos, three threes, four fours, five fives, six sixes, seven sevens, eight eights, nine nines, ten tens,' and we, good Gotama, also make him calculate a hundred. Is it not possible, good Gotama, to lay down a similar gradual training, gradual doing, gradual practice in respect of this dhamma and discipline?"

"It is possible, brahman, to lay down a gradual training, a gradual doing, a gradual practice in respect of this dhamma and discipline, Brahman, even a skilled trainer of horses, having taken on a beautiful thoroughbred first of all gets it used to the training in respect of wearing the bit. Then he gets it used to further training — even so brahman, the Tathāgata, having taken on a man to be tamed, first of all disciplines him thus:

Morality

"Come you, monk, be of moral habit, live controlled by the control of the Obligations, endowed with [right] behaviour and posture, seeing peril in the slightest fault and, undertaking them, train yourself in the rules of training.' As soon, brahman, as the monk is of moral habit, controlled by the control of the Obligations, endowed with [right] behaviour and posture; seeing peril in the slightest fault and, undertaking them, trains himself in the rules of training, the Tathāgata disciplines him further saying:

Sense-control

"Come you monk, be guarded as to the doors of the sense-organs; having seen a material shape with the eye, do not be entranced with the general appearance, do not be entranced with the detail; for if one dwells with the organ of sight uncontrolled, covetousness and dejection, evil, unskillful states of mind, may flow in. So fare along controlling it, guard the organ of sight, achieve control over the organ of sight. Having heard a sound with the ear... Having smelt a smell with the nose... Having savoured a taste with the tongue... Having felt a touch with the body... Having cognized a mental state with the mind, do not be entranced with the detail. For if one dwells with the organ of mind uncontrolled, covetousness and dejection, evil, unskillful states of mind, may flow in. So fare along controlling it; guard the organ of mind, achieve control over the organ of mind.'

Moderation in eating

"As soon, brahman, as a monk is guarded as to the doors of the sense-organs, the Tathāgata disciplines him further, saying: 'Come you, monk, be moderate in eating; you should take food reflecting carefully, not for fun or indulgence or personal charm or beautification, but taking just enough for maintaining this body and keeping it going, for keeping it unharmed, for furthering the Brahma-faring,<sup>4</sup> with the thought: Thus will I crush out an old feeling, and I will not allow a new feeling to arise, and then there will be for me subsistence and blamelessness and abiding in comfort.'

Vigilance

"As soon, brahman, as a monk is moderate in eating, the Tathāgata disciplines him further, saying: 'Come you, monk, dwell intent on vigilance; during the day while pacing up and down, while sitting down, cleanse the mind of obstructive mental states; during the middle watch of the night, lie down on the right side in the lion posture, foot resting on foot, mindful, clearly conscious, reflecting on the thought of getting up again; during the last watch of the night, when you have arisen, while pacing up and down, while sitting down, cleanse the mind of obstructive mental states.'

Mindfulness and clear consciousness

"As soon, brahman, as a monk is intent on vigilance, the Tathāgata disciplines him further, saying: 'Come you, monk, be possessed of mindfulness and clear consciousness, acting with clear consciousness whether you are approaching or departing, acting with clear consciousness whether you are looking ahead or looking round, acting with clear consciousness whether you are bending in or stretching out [the arms], acting with clear consciousness whether you are carrying the outer cloak, the bowl or robe, acting with clear consciousness whether you are eating, drinking, munching, savouring, acting with clear consciousness whether you are obeying the calls of nature, acting with clear consciousness whether you are walking, standing, sitting, asleep, awake, talking or being silent.'

Overcoming of the five hindrances

"As soon, brahman, as he is possessed of mindfulness and clear consciousness, the Tathāgata disciplines him further, saying: 'Come you, monk, choose a remote lodging in a forest, at the root of a tree, on a mountain slope, in a glen, a hill cave, a cemetery, a woodland grove, in the open, or on a heap of straw.' On returning from alms-gathering after the meal, the monk sits down cross-legged, holding the back erect, having made mindfulness rise up in front of him. He, getting rid of covetousness for the world, dwells with a mind devoid of covetousness, he cleanses the mind of covetousness. Getting rid of the taint of ill-will, he dwells benevolent in mind; compassionate and merciful towards all creatures and beings, he cleanses the mind of ill-will. Getting rid of sloth and torpor, he dwells without sloth or torpor; perceiving the light, mindful and clearly conscious he cleanses the mind of sloth and torpor. Getting rid of restlessness and worry, he dwells calmly; the mind inward tranquil, he cleanses the mind of restlessness and worry. Getting rid of doubt, he dwells doubt-crossed; unperplexed as to the states that are skilled,<sup>5</sup> he cleanses his mind of doubt.

Jhana

"He, by getting rid of these five hindrances,<sup>6</sup> which are defilements of the mind and deleterious to intuitive wisdom, aloof from pleasures of the senses, aloof from unskilled states of mind, enters and abides in the first meditation which is accompanied by initial thought and discursive thought, is born of aloofness and is rapturous and joyful. By allaying initial thought and discursive thought, his mind subjectively tranquilized and fixed on one point, he enters and abides in the second meditation which is devoid of initial thought and discursive thought, is born of concentration and is rapturous and joyful. By the fading out of rapture, he dwells with equanimity, attentive and clearly conscious, and experiences in his person that joy of which the ariyans<sup>7</sup> say: 'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,' and he enters and abides in the third meditation. By getting rid of anguish, by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows, he enters and abides in the fourth meditation which has neither anguish nor joy, and which is entirely purified by equanimity and mindfulness.

"Brahman, such is my instruction for those monks who are learners who, perfection being not yet attained, dwell longing for the incomparable security from the bonds. But as for those monks who are perfected ones, the cankers destroyed, who have lived the life, done what was to be done, shed the burden, attained to their own goal, the fetters of becoming utterly destroyed, and who are freed by perfect profound knowledge — these things conduce both to their abiding in ease here and now as well as to their mindfulness and clear consciousness."

When this had been said, the brahman Ganaka-Moggallāna spoke thus to the Lord:

"Now, on being exhorted thus and instructed thus by the good Gotama, do all the good Gotama's disciples attain the unchanging goal<sup>8</sup> — nibbana or do some not attain it?"

"Some of my disciples, brahman, on being exhorted and instructed thus by me, attain the unchanging goal — nibbana; some do not attain it."

"What is the cause, good Gotama, what the reason that; since nibbana does exist, since the way leading to nibbana exists, since the good Gotama exists as adviser, some of the good Gotama's disciples on being exhorted thus and instructed thus by the good Gotama, attain the unchanging goal — nibbana, but some do not attain it?"

"Well then, brahman, I will question you on this point in reply. As it is pleasing to you, so you may answer me. What do you think about this, brahman? Are you skilled in the way leading to Rājagaha?"

"Yes, sir, skilled am I in the way leading to Rājagaha."

"What do you think about this? A man might come along here wanting to go to Rājagaha. Having approached you, he might speak thus: 'I want to go to Rājagaha, sir; show me the way to this Rājagaha.' You might speak thus to him: "Yes, my good man, this road goes to Rājagaha; go along it for a while. When you have gone along it for a while you will see a village; go along for a while; when you have gone along for a while you will see a market town; go for a while. When you have gone along for a while you will see Rājagaha with its delightful parks, delightful forests, delightful fields, delightful ponds. But although he has been exhorted and instructed thus by you, he might take the wrong road and go westwards. Then a second man might come along wanting to go to Rājagaha...(as above)... you will see Rājagaha with its delightful... ponds.' Exhorted and instructed thus by you he might get to Rājagaha safely. What is the cause, brahman, what the reason that, since Rājagaha does exist, since the way leading to Rājagaha exists, since you exist as adviser, the one man, although being exhorted and instructed thus by you, may take the wrong road and go westwards while the other may get to Rājagaha safely?"

"What can I, good Gotama, do in this matter? A shower of the way, good Gotama, am I."

"Even so, brahman, nibbana does exist, the way leading to nibbana exists and I exist as adviser. But some of my disciples, on being exhorted and instructed thus by me attain the unchanging goal — nibbana, some do not attain it. What can I, brahman, do in this matter? A shower of the way, brahman, is a Tathāgata."

When this had been said, the brahman Ganaka-Moggallāna spoke thus to the Lord:

"Good Gotama, as for those persons who, in want of a way of living, having gone forth from home into homelessness without faith, who are crafty, fraudulent, deceitful, who are unbalanced and puffed up, who are shifty, scurrilous and of loose talk, the doors of whose sense-organs are not guarded, who do not know moderation in eating, who are not intent on vigilance, indifferent to recluseship, not of keen respect for the training, who are ones for abundance, lax, taking the lead in backsliding, shirking the burden of seclusion, who are indolent, of feeble energy, of confused mindfulness, not clearly conscious, not concentrated but of wandering minds, who are weak in wisdom, drivellers — the good Gotama is not in communion with them. But as for those young men of respectable families who have gone forth from home into homelessness from faith, who are not crafty, fraudulent or deceitful, who are not unbalanced or puffed up, who are not shifty, scurrilous or of loose talk, the doors of whose sense-organs are guarded, who know moderation in eating, who are intent on vigilance, longing for recluship, of keen respect for the training, who are not ones for abundance, not lax, shirking, backsliding, taking the lead in seclusion, who are of stirred up energy, self-resolute, with mindfulness aroused, clearly conscious, concentrated, their minds one-pointed, who have wisdom, are not drivellers — the good Gotama is in communion with them. As, good Gotama, black gum is pointed to as chief of root-scents, as red sandalwood is pointed to as chief of the pith-scents, as jasmine is pointed to as chief of the flower scents — even so is the exhortation of the good Gotama highest among the teachings of today. Excellent, good Gotama, excellent, good Gotama. As, good Gotama, one might set upright what had been upset, or disclose what had been covered, or show the way to one who had gone astray, or bring an oil-lamp into the darkness so that those with vision might see material shapes — even so in many a figure is dhamma made clear by the good Gotama. I am going to the revered Gotama for refuge and to dhamma and to the Order of monks May the good Gotama accept me as a lay-follower going for refuge from today forth for as long as life lasts."

---

<sup>1</sup> A seven-storied palace is not to be built in one day [Commentary].

<sup>2</sup> It is not possible to learn the three Vedas by heart in one day [Commentary].

<sup>3</sup> Ganana. From this profession of his, the distinguishing addition to the brahman's name is derived [Ed., The Wheel].

<sup>4</sup> Brahmacariyam. This refers to the pure life of a celibate recluse [Ed., The Wheel].

<sup>5</sup> Kusala. Sometimes translated by "salutary, profitable, karmically wholesome." [Ed., The Wheel].

<sup>6</sup> On these, see The Wheel No. 26.

<sup>7</sup> Ariya refers here, according to the Visuddhimagga, to the Enlightened Ones.

<sup>8</sup> Accantanittha. Accanta can also mean "utmost, culminating, supreme."

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
1. Devadaha Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
1. The Devadaha Division

108. The Discourse to Ganaka-Moggallāna

Ganaka-Moggallāna Sutta

---

Thus I have heard:

At one time, not long after the Lord's parinibbāna, the venerable Ānanda<sup>1</sup> was staying near Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels' feeding place.

Now at that time King Ajātasattu of Magadha, the son of the lady of Videha, distrusting King Pajjota,<sup>2</sup> was having Rājagaha strengthened.

Then the venerable Ānanda, dressing early in the morning, taking his bowl and robe, entered Rājagaha for almsfood.

Then it occurred to the venerable Ānanda:

"It is still too early to walk for alms in Rājagaha.

Suppose that I were to approach the brahman Gopaka-Moggallāna and his place of work?"<sup>3</sup>

Then the venerable Ānanda approached the brahman Gopaka-Moggallāna and his place of work.

The brahman Gopaka-Moggallāna saw the venerable Ānanda coming in the distance; seeing him he spoke thus to him:

"Let the good Ānanda come, there is a welcome for the good Ānanda.

It is long since the good Ānanda made this opportunity, that is for coming here.

Let the good Ānanda sit down, this seat is made ready."

And the venerable Ānanda sat down on the appointed seat.

The brahman Gopaka-Moggallāna,
taking a low seat,
sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance
the brahman Gopaka-Moggallāna spoke thus to the venerable Ānanda:

"Is there even one monk, Ānanda, who is possessed in every way
and in every part
of all those things
of which the good Gotama,
perfected one,

fully Self-Awakened One,
was possessed?"

"There is not even one monk, brahman,
who is possessed in every way
and in every part
of all those things
of which the Lord was possessed,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

For, brahman, this Lord
was one to make arise a Way that had not arisen (before), [59] to bring about a Way
not brought about (before),
to show a Way
not shown (before);
he was a knower of the Way,
an understander of the Way,
skilled in the Way.

But the disciples are now Way-followers following after him."<sup>4</sup>

---

But this conversation between the venerable Ānanda and the brahman Gopaka-Moggallāna was interrupted, for the brahman Vassakāra,<sup>5</sup>
the chief minister in Magadha, while inspecting the works near Rājagaha, approached the venerable Ānanda

at the brahman Gopaka-Moggallāna's place of work;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the venerable Ānanda;
having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance
the brahman Vassakāra, the chief minister in Magadha, spoke thus to the venerable Ānanda:

"What now, Ānanda, was the talk for which you were sitting here?"

And what was that talk of yours
that was interrupted?"

"As to this, brahman,
the brahman Gopaka-Moggallāna said this to me:

"Is there even one monk, Ānanda,
who is possessed in every way
and in every part
of all those things
of which the good Gotama,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
was possessed?"

When this had been said,
I, brahman, spoke thus to the brahman Gopaka-Moggallāna:

"There is not even one monk, brahman,
who is possessed in every way
and in every part
of all those things

of which the Lord was possessed,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

For, brahman, this Lord
was one to make arise a Way
that had not arisen (before),
to bring about a Way
not brought about (before),
to show a Way
not shown (before);
he was a knower of the Way,
an understander of the Way,
skilled in the Way.

This, brahman, was the conversation that was interrupted between the brahman Gopaka-Moggallāna and myself.

For then you arrived."

■

"Is there, good Ānanda, even one monk who was designated by the good Gotama
saying:

'After my passing
this one will be your support,<sup>6</sup>
and to whom you might have recourse now?"

"There is not even one monk, brahman, who was designated by the Lord
who knew and saw,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
saying:

'After my passing
this one will be your support,'
and to whom we might have recourse now."

■

[60] "But is there even one monk, Ānanda, who is agreed upon by the Order
and designated by a number of monks
who are elders, saying:

'After the Lord's passing
this one will be our support,'
and to whom you might have recourse now?"

"There is not even one monk, brahman,
who is agreed upon by the Order
and designated by a number of monks
who are elders, saying:

'After the Lord's passing
this one will be our support,'
and to whom you might have recourse now?"

■

"But as you are thus without a support, good Ānanda, what is the cause of your unity?"

"We, brahman, are not without support;
we have a support, brahman.

dhamma is the support."<sup>7</sup>

■

"When you were asked:

'Is there, good Ānanda, even one monk who was designated by the good Gotama
saying:

"After my passing
this one will be your support", and to whom you might have recourse now?

you said:

'There is not even one monk, brahman,
who was designated by the Lord
who knew and saw,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
saying:

"After my passing
this one will be your support,"
and to whom we might have recourse now.'

When you were asked:

'But is there even one monk, Ānanda,
who is agreed upon by the Order
and designated by a number of monks
who are elders, saying:

"After the Lord's passing
this one will be our support,"
and to whom you might have recourse now?

you said:

'There is not even one monk, brahman,
who is agreed upon by the Order

and designated by a number of monks
who are elders, saying:

"After the Lord's passing
this one will be our support,"
and to whom you might have recourse now?"

When you were asked:

'But as you are thus without support, good Ānanda, what is the cause of your unity?'

you said:

'We, brahman, are not without a support;
we have a support, brahman.

dhamma is the support.'

Good Ānanda, what meaning is to be ascribed to what has been said?"

■

"There is, brahman, a rule of training laid down, an Obligation appointed for monks by that Lord who knows and sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

On every Observance Day we who live depending on the same field and village each and all gather together on the same day, and when we have gathered together we inquire what has happened to each one.

While this is being told if there was an offence, a transgression on the part of a monk, we have him dealt with according to the rule,<sup>8</sup> according to the instruction.

Indeed the revered ones do not deal with us, it is the rule<sup>9</sup> that deals with us."

---

"Now is there, good Ānanda, even one monk whom you revere, [61] reverence,
esteem
and honour
and on whom,
revering and reverencing him,
you live in dependence?"

"There is, brahman, even one monk whom we revere reverence,
esteem
and honour
and on whom,
revering and reverencing him, you live in dependence."<sup>10</sup>

■

"When you were asked:

'Is there, good Ānanda, even one monk who was designated by the good Gotama

saying:

"After my passing
this one will be your support", and to whom you might have recourse now?

you said:

'There is not even one monk, brahman,
who was designated by the Lord
who knew and saw,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
saying:

"After my passing
this one will be your support,"
and to whom we might have recourse now.'

When you were asked:

'But is there even one monk, Ānanda,
who is agreed upon by the Order
and designated by a number of monks
who are elders, saying:

"After the Lord's passing
this one will be our support,"
and to whom you might have recourse now?

you said:

'There is not even one monk, brahman,
who is agreed upon by the Order
and designated by a number of monks
who are elders, saying:

"After the Lord's passing
this one will be our support,"
and to whom you might have recourse now?"

When you were asked:

'But as you are thus without support, good Ānanda, what is the cause of your unity?'

you said:

'We, brahman, are not without a support;
we have a support, brahman.

dhamma is the support.'

When you were asked:

'Now is there, good Ānanda, even one monk whom you revere, reverence,
esteem
and honour
and on whom,
revering and reverencing him,
you live in dependence?'

you said:

'There is, brahman, even one monk whom we revere
reverence,
esteem
and honour
and on whom,
revering and reverencing him,
you live in dependence.'

Good Ānanda, what meaning is to be ascribed to what has been said?"

"There are, brahman, ten satisfying things<sup>11</sup> that have been pointed out by the Lord who knows and sees, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

In whomsoever of us these things exist, him do we revere, reverence, esteem and honour and on him, revering and reverencing him, do we live in dependence.

What are the ten?

Herein, brahman, a monk is moral,<sup>12</sup> he lives controlled by the control of the Obligations, endowed with (right) behaviour and pasture, seeing peril in the slightest faults and, undertaking them, he trains himself in the rules of training.

He is one who has heard much, remembers what he has heard, stores up what he has heard; those things which are lovely at the beginning, lovely in the middle and lovely at the ending and which, with the meaning and the spirit, declare the Brahma-faring

wholly fulfilled,
perfectly purified,
such things are much heard by him,
borne in mind,
familiarised by speech,
pondered over in the mind,
well penetrated by right view.

He is content with the requisites of robe-material,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick.

He is one who acquires at will,
without trouble,
without difficulty
the four meditations
which are of the purest mentality, abidings in ease here and now.

He experiences the various forms of psychic power:

having been one
he becomes manifold, having been manifold he becomes one;

manifest or in- [62] visible
he goes unhindered through a wall, a rampart
or a mountain
as if through air;

he plunges into the ground and shoots up again
as if in water;

he walks upon the water
without parting it
as if on the ground;

sitting cross-legged
he travels through the air
like a bird on the wing;

with his hand
he rubs and strokes
this moon and sun
although they are of such mighty power and majesty;

and even as far as the Brahma-world
he has power in respect of his person.

With the purified deva-like hearing
surpassing that of men he hears both (kinds of) sounds - deva-like ones
and human ones,
whether they be far or near.

■

He knows intuitively by mind
the minds of other beings,
of other individuals
so that he comprehends
of a mind that is full of attachment, that it is full of attachment; or he comprehends of a mind that is without attachment that it is without attachment; or he comprehends of a mind that is full of aversion, that it is full of aversion; or he comprehends of a mind that is without aversion that it is without aversion; or he comprehends of a mind that is full of confusion, that it is full of confusion;

or he comprehends of a mind that is without confusion;
or he comprehends of a mind that is contracted,
that it is contracted;
or he comprehends of a mind that is distracted, that it is distracted;
or he comprehends of a mind that has become great,
that it has become great;
or he comprehends of a mind that has not become great,
that it has not become great;
or he comprehends of a mind that has (some other mental state) superior to it,
that it has (some other mental state) superior to it;
or he comprehends of a mind that has no (other mental state) superior to it, that it has no (other mental state) superior to it;
or he comprehends of a mind that is composed,
that it is composed;,
or he comprehends of a mind that is not composed,
that it is not composed;
or he comprehends of a mind that is freed, that it is freed;
or he comprehends of a mind that is not freed, that it is not freed.

■

He recollects a variety of former habitations,
that is to say

One birth,
two births,
three births,
four births,
five births,
ten births,

twenty births,
thirty births,
forty births,
fifty births,
a hundred births,
a thousand births,
a hundred thousand births,
and many an eon of integration
and many an eon of disintegration
and many an eon of integration-disintegration:

'Such a one was I by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so I was nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I came to be in another state
where I was such a one by name,
having such and such a clan,
such and such a colour,
so I was nourished,
such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine,
so did the span of life end.

Passing from this,
I arose here.'

Thus he recollects divers former habitations
in all their modes and detail.

■

With the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men,

he sees beings as they pass hence
or come to be;
he comprehends that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going,
according to the consequences of deeds,
and thinks:

'Indeed these worthy beings
who were possessed of wrong conduct in body,
speech
and thought,
scoffers at the ariyans,
holding a wrong view,
incurring deeds consequent on a wrong view -
these, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a sorrowful state,
a bad bourn,
the abyss,
Niraya Hell.

But these worthy beings
who were possessed of good conduct in body,
speech
and thought,
who did not scoff at the ariyans,
holding a right view,
incurring deeds consequent on a right view -
these at the breaking up of the body after dying,
have arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.'

Thus with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
does he see beings as they pass hence,
as they arise;
he comprehends that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going
according to the consequences of deeds.

By the destruction of the cankers, having realised by his own super-knowledge
here and now
the freedom of mind
and the freedom through intuitive wisdom
that are cankerless,
entering thereon he abides therein.

These, brahman, are the ten satisfying things that have been pointed out by the Lord who knows and sees,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

In whomsoever of us these things exist, him do we revere,
reverence,
esteem
and honour
and on him,
revering and reverencing him,
do we live in dependence."

[63] When this had been said,
the brahman Vassakāra, the chief minister in Magadha, spoke thus to General Upananda;<sup>13</sup>

"What do you think about this?

If it is thus, General, that these good sirs revere what should be revered, reverence what should be revered, esteem what should be esteemed,
honour what should be honoured, then these good sirs most certainly revere what should be revered,
esteem what should be esteemed,
honour what should be honoured.

For if these good sirs were not to revere, reverence,
esteem
or honour
this (monk),
then who on earth could these good sirs revere,
reverence,
esteem
and honour
and on whom,
revering and reverencing him,
could they live in dependence?"

Then Vassakāra, the chief minister in Magadha,
spoke thus to the venerable Ānanda:

"But where is the good Ānanda staying at present?"

"I, brahman, am at present staying in the Bamboo Grove."

"I hope, good Ānanda, that the Bamboo Grove is pleasant,

with little sound,
little noise,
sheltered from the winds,
secluded from the haunts of men and suitable for solitary meditation?"

"Most certainly, brahman, the Bamboo Grove is pleasant,
with little sound,
little noise,
sheltered from the winds,
secluded from the haunts of men,
suitable for solitary meditation
as befits a guardian and warden like yourself."

"Most certainly, good Ānanda,
the Bamboo Grove is pleasant,
with little sound,
little noise,
sheltered from the winds,
secluded from the haunts of men,
suitable for solitary meditation
as befits meditators and those disposed to meditation like the revered ones.

The revered ones are both meditators and disposed to meditation.

At one time, good Ānanda, the revered Gotama was staying near Vesālī in the Great Wood
in the hall of the Gabled House.

Then I, good Ānanda, approached the revered Gotama

in the Great Wood
in the hall of the Gabled House.

While he was there
the revered Gotama in many a figure talked a talk on meditation.

A meditator was the revered Gotama and he was disposed to meditation; and the revered Gotama praised every (form of) meditation."

"No, brahman,
the Lord did not praise every (form of) meditation, nor did the Lord not praise every (form of) meditation.

What kind of meditation, brahman, did the Lord not praise?

As to this, brahman,
someone dwells with his thought obsessed by attachment to pleasures of the senses, overcome by attachment to pleasures [64] of the senses, and he does not comprehend
as it really is the escape from the attachment to the pleasures of the senses that has arisen;
he, having made attachment to the pleasures of the senses the main thing,<sup>14</sup>
meditates on it,
meditates absorbed,
meditates more absorbed,
meditates quite absorbed.<sup>15</sup>

He dwells with his thought obsessed by ill-will, overcome by ill-will,

and he does not comprehend as it really is the escape from ill-will
that has arisen;
he, having made ill-will the main thing
meditates on it,
meditates absorbed,
meditates more absorbed,
meditates quite absorbed.

He dwells with his thought obsessed by sloth and torpor, overcome by sloth and torpor,
and he does not comprehend as it really is the escape from sloth and torpor
that has arisen;
he, having made sloth and torpor the main thing
meditates on it,
meditates absorbed,
meditates more absorbed,
meditates quite absorbed.

He dwells with his thought obsessed by restlessness and worry, overcome by restlessness and worry,
and he does not comprehend as it really is the escape from restlessness and worry
that has arisen;
he, having made restlessness and worry the main thing
meditates on it,
meditates absorbed,
meditates more absorbed,
meditates quite absorbed.

He dwells with his thought obsessed by doubt, overcome by doubt,
and he does not comprehend as it really is the escape from doubt
that has arisen;

he, having made doubt the main thing
meditates on it,
meditates absorbed,
meditates more absorbed,
meditates quite absorbed.

The Lord does not praise this kind of meditation, brahman.

And what kind of meditation, brahman, does the Lord praise?

As to this, brahman, a monk,
aloof from the pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
entering into the first meditation
which is accompanied by initial thought
and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness,
and is rapturous and joyful,
abides in it.

And again, brahman, a monk,
by allaying initial and discursive thought,
his mind subjectively tranquillised
and fixed on one point,
enters on
and abides in
the second meditation
which is devoid of initial and discursive thought,
is born of concentration
and is rapturous and joyful.

And again, brahman, a monk,
by the fading out of rapture,
dwells with equanimity,
attentive and clearly conscious,

and experiences in his person
that joy of which the ariyans say:
'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,'
and he enters on
and abides in
the third meditation.

And again, brahman, a monk
by getting rid of joy,
by getting rid of anguish,
by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows,
enters on
and abides in
the fourth meditation
which has neither anguish nor joy,
and which is entirely purified
by equanimity and mindfulness.

The Lord praises this kind of meditation, brahman."

"Indeed, good Ānanda, the good Gotama contemned the meditation that is contemptible, commended that which is commendable.

But now, if you please, good Ānanda, we must be going.

We are very busy,
there is much to be done."

"You, brahman, do that for which you deem it is now the right time."

Then Vassakāra, the chief minister in Magadha, rejoicing in what the venerable Ānanda had said,
giving thanks,
rising from his seat departed.

Then soon after the brahman Vassakāra,
the chief minister in Magadha,
had departed,
the brahman Gopaka-Moggallāna spoke thus to the venerable Ānanda:

"The good Ānanda has not<sup>ed1</sup> explained to us what we asked him."

[65] "Did we not say to you, brahman:

"There is not even one monk, brahman,
who is possessed in every way
and in every part
of all those things
of which the Lord was possessed,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One.

For, brahman, this Lord
was one to make arise a Way
that had not arisen (before),
to bring about a Way
not brought about (before),
to show a Way
not shown (before);
he was a knower of the Way,
an understander of the Way,
skilled in the Way.

Discourse to Gopaka-Moggallāna:
The Eighth

---

<sup>1</sup> āyasmā, venerable, omitted in the text, no doubt in error. After the distribution of the relics Ānanda was at Rājagaha to go through the recital of dhamma, MA. iv. 70.

<sup>2</sup> This king was a friend of Bimbisara who was killed by his son Ajātasattu. At Vin. i. 276 ff. (referred to at MA. iv. 71) Bimbisāra sent his physician, Jīvaka, to tend Pajjota once when he was ill.

<sup>3</sup> Outside the city, MA. iv. 71.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. S. i. 191, iii. 66. The words pacchā samannāgatā, are not commented on by MA. here. *SA.*i. 277 however explains: paṭhama-gatassa Bhagavato pacchā samanugatā, they are following after (sam-anugatā from sam-anu-gacchati) the Lord who has gone first. Samannāgata is therefore here in its sense of "followed" or "following" rather than in its more usual sense of "possessed of, endowed with." Both these meanings of the word are noted by P.E.D.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. Vin. iii. 43, and see B.D. i. 68, n. 1.

<sup>6</sup> paṭisarāṇa, called avassaya at MA. iv. 72. I also recommend the word "mainstay" which J. J. Jones uses in his translation of the Mhvu., vol. iii.

<sup>7</sup> Cf. D. ii. 154.

<sup>8</sup> yathādhamma. For examples see s.v. "Rule, according to the" in Indexes to B.D. iv, v.

<sup>9</sup> dhamma. The context here seems to require "rule" in translation, which only shows the close inner bond of dhamma as teaching and dhamma as rule.

<sup>10</sup> Cf. M. ii. 5.

<sup>11</sup> Cf. A. ii. 22-23 for four things which make an Elder, thera.

<sup>12</sup> Cf. M. i. 355.

<sup>13</sup> This may be the sole reference to him in the Pali Canon. He was "commander-in-chief of the Magadha kingdom," D.P.P.N.

14 antaram karitvā; MA. iv. 73: abbhanlaram karitvā. See C.P.D., and cf. M. iii. 38.

15 As at M. i. 334.

---

ed1 Ms. Horner has this in the positive in error.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
1. Devadaha Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
1. The Devadaha Division

109. Greater Discourse (at the Time) of a Full Moon<sup>1</sup>

Mahā Puṇṇama Sutta

---

Thus I have heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattthī in the palace of Migāra's mother in the Eastern Monastery.

Now at that time the Lord was sitting down in the open air on the night of a full moon
on an Observance day,
the fifteenth,<sup>2</sup> surrounded by an Order of monks.

Then a certain monk,
rising from his seat,
arranging his upper robe over one shoulder,

having saluted the Lord with joined palms,
spoke thus to the Lord:

"I, revered sir, would ask the Lord about a particular matter if the Lord grants me the opportunity<sup>3</sup> to set forth a question."

"Well then, monk, you, having sat down on your own seat,<sup>4</sup> ask what you desire."

Then that monk, having sat down on his own seat,
spoke thus to the Lord:

[66] "Are there not, revered sir, these five groups of grasping,
that is to say,
the group of grasping after material shape,
the group of grasping after feeling,
the group of grasping after perception,
the group of grasping after the habitual tendencies,
the group of grasping after consciousness?"

"These, monk, are the five groups of grasping,
that is to say,
the group of grasping after material shape,
the group of grasping after feeling,
the group of grasping after perception,
the group of grasping after the habitual tendencies,
the group of grasping after consciousness."

"It is good, revered sir," and this monk,

having rejoiced in what the Lord had said,
having given thanks,
asked the Lord a further question:

---

"But what, revered sir, is the root of these five groups of grasping?"

"These five groups of grasping, monk, have desire for root."

---

"Are just these five groups of grasping the whole of grasping, revered sir?"

Or is there grasping apart from these five groups of grasping?"

"Indeed, monk, these five groups of grasping are not the whole of grasping, and yet there is no grasping apart from the five groups of grasping.

Whatever, monks, is attachment to and desire for
the five groups of grasping, then that is grasping."

---

"Might it be, revered sir, that there is diversity in the attachment to
and desire for
the five groups of grasping?"

"It might be, monk,"

the Lord said.

"It occurs to someone here, monk:

'May material shape be thus in the distant future, may feeling be thus in the distant future, may perception be thus in the distant future, may the habitual tendencies be thus in the distant future, may consciousness be such in the distant future.'

Even so, monk, is there diversity in the attachment to
and desire for
the five groups of grasping."

---

"But to what extent, revered sir, is there a group-designation for the groups?"

"Whatever, monk, is material shape,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,

or whatever is far or near,
this is the group of material shape.

■

Whatever is feeling,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,
or whatever is far or near,
this is the group of feeling.

■

Whatever is perception,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,
or whatever is far or near,
this is the group of perception.

■

Whatever are the habitual tendencies,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,
or whatever is far or near,
this is the group of habitual tendencies.

■

Whatever is consciousness,
past, future or present,

internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,
or whatever is far or near,
this is the group of consciousness.

To this extent, monk,
is there a group-designation for the groups."

---

"What is the cause, revered sir,
what the reason
enabling a definition to be made of a group of material shape?

What is the cause,
what the reason enabling a definition to be made of the group [67] of feeling?

What is the cause,
what the reason enabling a definition to be made of the group of perception?

What is the cause,
what the reason enabling a definition to be made of the group of the habitual tendencies?

What is the cause,
what the reason enabling a definition to be made of the group of consciousness?"

■

"The four great elementals, monk,
are the cause,
the four great elementals are the reason
enabling a definition to be made of the group of material shape.

(Sensory) impingement<sup>5</sup> is the cause, (sensory) impingement is the reason
enabling a definition to be made
of the group of feeling.

(Sensory) impingement is the cause, (sensory) impingement is the reason
enabling a definition to be made of the group of perception.

(Sensory) impingement is the cause, (sensory) impingement is the reason
enabling a definition to be made of the group of the habitual tendencies.

Name-and-shape is the cause, name-and-shape is the reason
enabling a definition to be made of the group of consciousness."<sup>6</sup>

---

"But how, revered sir, is there (wrong) view as to 'own body'<sup>7</sup>?"

"As to this, monk, an uninstructed average person, taking no count of the pure ones,
unskilled in the dhamma of the pure ones,
untrained in the dhamma of the pure ones,

taking no count of the true men,
unskilled in the dhamma of the true men,
untrained in the dhamma of the true men,
regards material shape as self,
or self as having material shape,
or material shape as in self,
or self as in material shape.

He regards feeling as self,
or self as having feeling,
or feeling as in self,
or self as in feeling.

He regards perception as self,
or self as having perception,
or perception as in self,
or self as in perception.

He regards the habitual tendencies as self,
or self as having habitual tendencies,
or habitual tendencies as in self,
or self as in habitual tendencies.

He regards consciousness as self,
or self as having consciousness,
or consciousness as in self,
or self as in consciousness.

Thus, monk, is there (wrong) view as to 'own body.'"

---

"But how, revered sir, is there not (wrong) view as to 'own body'?"

"As to this, monk, the instructed disciple of the pure ones, taking count of the dhamma of the pure ones,
skilled in the dhamma of the pure ones,
well trained in the dhamma of the pure ones,
taking count of the true men,
skilled in the dhamma of the true men,
well trained in the dhamma of the true men,

,
does not regard material shape as self,
or self as having material shape,
or material shape as in self,
or self as in material shape.

He does not regard feeling as self,
or self as having feeling,
or feeling as in self,
or self as in feeling.

He does not regard perception as self,
or self as having perception,
or perception as in self,
or self as in perception.

He does not regard the habitual tendencies as self,
or self as having habitual tendencies,
or habitual tendencies as in self,
or self as in habitual tendencies.

He does not regard consciousness as self,
or self as having consciousness,
or consciousness as in self,
or self as in consciousness.

Thus, monk, is there not (wrong) view as to 'own body.'"

---

"And what, revered sir, is the satisfaction in material shape,
what the peril,
what is the escape from it?

What is the satisfaction in feeling,
what the peril,
what is the escape from it?

What is the satisfaction in perception,
what the peril,
what is the escape from it?

What is the satisfaction in the habitual tendencies,
what the peril,
what is the escape from it?

What is the satisfaction in consciousness,
what the peril,
what is the escape from it?"

■

[68] "Monk, whatever happiness and bliss arise on account of material shape, this constitutes the satisfaction in material shape.

Whatever impermanence,
suffering,
liability to change
are in material shape,
this constitutes the peril in material shape.

Whatever the control of attachment to and desire for material shape, the getting rid of the attachment and desire, this constitutes the escape from material shape.

■

"Whatever happiness and bliss arise
on account of feeling, this constitutes the satisfaction in feeling.

Whatever impermanence,
suffering,
liability to change
are in feeling,
this constitutes the peril in feeling.

Whatever the control of attachment to
and desire for feeling,
the getting rid of the attachment and desire, this constitutes the escape from feeling.

■

"Whatever happiness and bliss arise
on account of perception, this constitutes the satisfaction in perception.

Whatever impermanence,
suffering,
liability to change
are in perception,
this constitutes the peril in perception.

Whatever the control of attachment to and desire for perception,
the getting rid of the attachment and desire, this constitutes the escape from perception.

■

"Whatever happiness and bliss arise on account of the habitual tendencies, this constitutes the satisfaction in the habitual tendencies.

Whatever impermanence,
suffering,
liability to change
are in the habitual tendencies, this constitutes the peril in the habitual tendencies.

Whatever the control of attachment to and desire for the habitual tendencies,
the getting rid of the attachment and desire, this constitutes the escape from the habitual tendencies.

■

"Whatever happiness and bliss arise
on account of consciousness, this constitutes the satisfaction in consciousness.

Whatever impermanence,
suffering,
liability to change
are in consciousness, this constitutes the peril in consciousness.

Whatever the control of attachment to and desire for consciousness,
the getting rid of the attachment and desire,
this constitutes the escape from consciousness.

---

"But, revered sir, (for a man) knowing what, seeing what,
are there no latent conceits that

'I am the doer,
mine is the doer'

in regard to this consciousness-informed body and all the phenomena external to it?"

■

"Whatever, monk, is material shape,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,
or whatever is far or near,
he, thinking of all this material shape as

'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self,'

sees it thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom.

■

"Whatever, monk, is feeling<sup>8</sup>,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,

or whatever is far or near,
he, thinking of all this feeling as

'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self,'

sees it thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom.

■

"Whatever, monk, is perception,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,
or whatever is far or near,
he, thinking of all this perception as

'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self,'

sees it thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom.

■

"Whatever, monk, are the habitual tendencies,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,

or whatever is far or near,
he, thinking of all these habitual tendencies as

'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self,'

sees it thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom.

■

"Whatever, monk, is consciousness,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,
or whatever is far or near,
he, thinking of all this consciousness as

'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self,'

sees it thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom.

Monk, (for a man) knowing thus,
seeing thus,
there are no latent conceits that

'I am the doer,
mine is the doer'

in regard to this consciousness-informed body
and all the phenomena external to it."

---

Then a reasoning arose in the mind of a certain monk thus:

"It is said, sir,<sup>9</sup> that material shape is not self,
feeling is not self,
perception is not self,
the habitual tendencies are not self,
consciousness is not self.

Then what self
do deeds affect
that are done by not-self?"<sup>10</sup>

Then the Lord, knowing by mind the reasoning in the mind of this monk, addressed the monks,
saying:

"This situation exists, monks, [69] when some foolish man here,
not knowing,
ignorant,
with his mind in the grip of craving, may deem to go beyond<sup>11</sup> the Teacher's instruction thus:

"It is said, sir,
that material shape is not self,
feeling is not self,
perception is not self,

the habitual tendencies are not self,
consciousness is not self.

Then what self
do deeds affect
that are done by not-self?"

You, monks, have been trained by me (to look for) conditions<sup>12</sup> now here,
now there,
in these things
and in those.

What do you think about this, monks?

Is material shape permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent painful or is it pleasant?"

"Painful, revered sir."

"And is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
suffering,
liable to change, as,

"This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

What do you think about this, monks?

Is feeling permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent
painful or is it pleasant?"

"Painful, revered sir."

"And is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
suffering,
liable to change, as,

"This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

What do you think about this, monks?

Is perception permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent
painful or is it pleasant?"

"Painful, revered sir."

"And is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
suffering,
liable to change, as,

"This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

What do you think about this, monks?

Are the habitual tendencies permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent
painful or is it pleasant?"

"Painful, revered sir."

"And is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
suffering,
liable to change, as,

"This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

What do you think about this, monks?

Is consciousness permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent
painful or is it pleasant?"

"Painful, revered sir."

"And is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
suffering,
liable to change, as,

"This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

"Wherefore, monks,
whatever is material shape,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,
or whatever is far or near,
thinking of all this material shape as

"This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self,'

he should see it thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom.

■

"Wherefore, monks,
whatever is feeling,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,
or whatever is far or near,
thinking of all this feeling as

'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self,'

he should see it thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom.

■

"Wherefore, monks,
whatever is perception,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,
or whatever is far or near,
thinking of all this perception as

'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self,'

he should see it thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom.

■

"Wherefore, monks,
whatever are the habitual tendencies,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,
or whatever is far or near,
thinking of all these habitual tendencies as

'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self,'

he should see it thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom.

■

"Wherefore, monks,
whatever is consciousness,
past, future or present,
internal or external,
gross or subtle,
mean or excellent,
or whatever is far or near,
thinking of all this consciousness as

'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self,'

he should see it thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom.

Seeing it thus, monks, the instructed disciple of the pure ones turns away from material shape,
he turns away from feeling,
turns away from perception, turns away from the habitual tendencies, turns away from consciousness;
turning away he is detached;
by his detachment he is freed;
in freedom there is the knowledge that he is freed
and he comprehends:

Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close [70] the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

And while this exposition was being spoken the minds of as many as sixty monks<sup>13</sup> were freed from the cankers with no grasping (remaining).

Greater Discourse (at the Time) of a Full Moon:
The Ninth

---

<sup>1</sup> As at S. iii. 100 ff.

<sup>2</sup> The fifteenth day of the lunar month. Cf. S. iii. 100, Vin. i. 104.

<sup>3</sup> okāsam karoti; cf. Vin. i. 114, iv. 344.

<sup>4</sup> MA. iv. 75 f. explains that this monk was the Elder in an Order of sixty who were staying in a forest. If he stood, they would stand, thereby showing disrespect to the Tathāgata; but if they sat while their teacher was speaking they would be showing disrespect to him. But if the teacher sat they too would sit and so, all being tranquil, they would be able to receive the teaching on dhamma.

<sup>5</sup> phassa. MA. iv. 78 says that if one is impinged upon then one feels, perceives, wills.

<sup>6</sup> Cf. D. ii. 62-63 where name-and-shape and consciousness are mutually dependent. Here re-linking consciousness is meant, MA. iv. 78.

<sup>7</sup> Cf. M. i. 300.

<sup>8</sup> vedanā, feeling, is omitted in the text, no doubt in error.

<sup>9</sup> iti kira bho. This looks like a case where a monk, in thought, applies bho to himself. Or else he is thinking (as translated at K.S. iii. 88) "so then you say."

<sup>10</sup> "In what self do these results appear? Speaking thus, he fell into the view of eternalism," MA. iv. 79.

<sup>11</sup> atidhāvati; cf. M. iii. 230, S. iii. 103, iv. 230, Iti. p. 43, Ud. 64. Explained at UdA. 352. It means to by-pass, deviate from, outstrip, run ahead of, "go one better than," "improve upon."

<sup>12</sup> paṭicca-vinītā, trained in conditions. S. iii. 104 reads paṭipucchā vinītā.

<sup>13</sup> Those referred to in MA. on this Sta. as having lived in the forest learning meditation under a teacher who, not satisfied with their progress, brought them to the Lord and himself questioned Him. MA. iv. 79 says that they had meditated on the usual subjects of meditation but now, mastering a new one and not moving from their cross-legged positions, they attained arahantship on the very seats on which they were sitting.

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
1. Devadaha Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
1. The Devadaha Division

110. Lesser Discourse (at the Time) of a Full Moon

Cūla Puṇṇama Sutta

---

Thus I have heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvathī in the palace of Migāra's mother in the Eastern Monastery.

Now at that time the Lord was sitting down in the open air on the night of a full moon on an Observance day, the fifteenth, surrounded by an Order of monks.

Then the Lord, having looked round the Order of monks which, as he did so, became quite silent, addressed the monks, saying:

"Now, monks, could a bad man<sup>1</sup> know of a bad man:

"This worthy is a bad man'?"

"No, revered sir."

"It is good, monks.

This is impossible, monks,
it cannot come to pass
that a bad man
could know of a bad man:

'This worthy is a bad [71] man.'

But, monks, could a bad man know of a good man:

"This worthy is a good man'?"

"No, revered sir."

"It is good, monks.

This too is impossible, monks,
it cannot come to pass
that a bad man could know of a good man:

'This worthy is a good man.'

A bad man, monks,
is possessed of bad states of mind,
he consorts with bad men, he thinks as do bad men,
he advises as do bad men,
he speaks as do bad men,

he acts as do bad men,
he has the views of bad men, he gives a gift as do bad men.

And how, monks, is a bad man possessed of bad states of mind?

As to this, monks,
a bad man is lacking in faith,
he has no shame,
no fear of blame,
he has heard little,
he is lazy,
he is of muddled mindfulness, he is weak in wisdom -
it is thus, monks, that a bad man
is possessed of bad states of mind.

And how, monks, does a bad man consort with bad men?

As to this, monks,
those recluses and brahmans who are lacking in faith, have no shame,
no fear of blame,
who have heard little,
who are lazy,
of muddled mindfulness,
weak in wisdom -
these are the friends and companions of that bad man.

It is thus, monks, that a bad man consorts with bad men.

And how, monks, does a bad man think as do bad men?

As to this, monks,
a bad man is set on self-torment, he is set on the torment of others, he is set on the torment of both -
it is thus, monks, that a bad man thinks as do bad men.

And how, monks,
does a bad man
advise as do bad men?

As to this, monks,
a bad man advises the torment of self and he advises the torment of others and he advises the torment of both -
it is thus, monks, that a bad man advises as do bad men.

And how, monks,
does a bad man
speak as do bad men?

As to this, monks, a bad man is of lying speech,
slandorous speech,
harsh speech,
a gossip -
it is thus, monks, that a bad man speaks as do bad men.

And how, monks, does a bad man act as do bad men?

As to this, monks, a bad man is one to make onslaught on creatures,
to take what has not been given,
to enjoy himself wrongly among the sense-pleasures -

it is thus, monks that a bad man acts as do bad men.

And how, monks, does a bad man have the views of bad men?

As to this, monks, a bad man
is of these views:

'There is no (result of) gift,
there is no (result of) offering,
there is no (result of) sacrifice;
there is no fruit or ripening of deeds
well done or ill done;
there is not this world,
there is not a world beyond;
there is no (benefit from [72] serving) mother,
no (benefit from serving) father;
there are no spontaneously arising beings;
there are not in the world
recluses and brahmans who are faring rightly,
proceeding rightly,
and who proclaim this world
and the world beyond,
having realised them by their own super-knowledge.'

It is thus, monks, that a bad man has the views of bad men.

And how, monks, does a bad man give a gift as do bad men?

As to this, monks, a bad man gives a gift disrespectfully,<sup>2</sup> he gives a gift not with his own hand, he gives a gift without due consideration,<sup>3</sup> he gives a gift of what is not wanted,<sup>4</sup> he gives a gift regardless of the future.<sup>5</sup>

It is thus, monks, that a bad man gives a gift as do bad men.

Monks, that bad man,
thus possessed of bad states of mind, who thus consorts with bad men, thinks thus as do bad men, advises thus as do bad men, speaks thus as do bad men, acts thus as do bad men, who thus has the views of bad men, who thus gives a gift as do bad men, on the breaking up of the body after dying arises in some bourn of bad men.

And what, monks, is a bourn of bad men?

It is Niraya hell or animal birth.

---

Now, monks, could a good man
know of a good man:

"This worthy is a good man'?"

"Yes, revered sir."

"It is good, monks."

This situation occurs, monks, that a good man could know of a good man:

'This worthy is a good man.'

But, monks, could a good man
know of a bad man:

'This worthy is a bad man?'

"Yes, revered sir."

"It is good, monks."

This situation also occurs, monks, that a good man could know of a bad man:

'This worthy is a bad man.'

A good man, monks,
is possessed of good states of mind, he consorts with good men, he thinks as do good men, he advises as do good men, he speaks as do good men,
he acts as do good men, he has the views of good men, he gives a gift as do good men.

And how, monks, is a [73] good man possessed of good states of mind?

As to this, monks, a good man has faith,
he has shame
and fear of blame,
he has heard much,

he is of stirred up energy, he has mindfulness aroused, he has wisdom -
it is thus, monks, that a good man
is possessed of good states of mind.

And how, monks, does a good man consort with good men?

As to this, monks,
those recluses and brahmans who have faith, shame,
fear of blame,
who have heard much,
are of stirred up energy,
whose mindfulness is aroused, who have wisdom -
these are the friends and companions of that good man.

It is thus, monks, that a good man consorts with good men.

And how, monks, does a good man think as do good men?

As to this, monks, a good man is neither set on self-torment, nor on the torment of others nor on the torment of both -
it is thus, monks, that a good man thinks as do good men.

And how, monks, does a good man advise as do good men?

As to this, monks, a good man advises neither self-torment nor the torment of others nor the torment of both -

it is thus, monks, that a good man advises as do good men.

And how, monks, does a good man speak as do good men?

As to this, monks, a good man refrains from lying speech,
from slanderous speech,
from harsh speech,
he refrains from gossiping -
it is thus, monks, that a good man speaks as do good men.

And how, monks, does a good man act as do good men?

As to this, monks, a good man
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what has not been given,
from enjoying himself wrongly among the sense-pleasures -
it is thus, monks, that a good man acts as do good men.

And how, monks, does a good man have the views of good men?

As to this, monks, a good man
is of these views:

'There is (result of) gift,
there is (result of) offering,
there is (result of) sacrifice;
there is fruit and ripening of deeds well done or ill done;

there is this world,
there is a world beyond;
there is (benefit from serving) mother,
there is (benefit from serving) father;
there are spontaneously arising beings;
there are in the world
recluses and brahmins who are faring rightly,
proceeding rightly
and who proclaim this world
and the world beyond
having realised them by their own superknowledge.

It is thus, monks, that a good man has the views of good men.

And how, monks, does a good man give a gift as do good men?

As to this, monks, a good man gives a gift respectfully, he gives a [74] gift with his own hand,<sup>6</sup> he gives a gift with due consideration, he gives a gift that is pure, he gives a gift with regard to the future.<sup>7</sup>

It is thus, monks, that a good man gives a gift as do good men.

Monks, that good man,
thus possessed of good states of mind, who thus consorts with good men, thinks thus as do good men, advises thus as do good men, speaks thus as do good men, acts thus as do good men, who thus has the views of good men, who thus gives a gift as do good men,

on the breaking up of the body after dying arises in some bourn of good men.

And what, monks, is a bourn of good men?

It is deva-greatness<sup>8</sup> or human greatness."<sup>9</sup>

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Lesser Discourse (at the time) of a Full Moon:
The Tenth
Devadaha Division:
The First

---

<sup>1</sup> asappurisa, called pāpapurisa at MA. iv. 79; not a "true" man, not following "our" dhamma and discipline. See A. ii. 179 where the brahman Vassakāra (mentioned in M. Sta. 108) put some of these same questions to the Lord.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. D. ii. 356, A. iii. 171 for these improper ways of giving a gift. Disrespectfully means both towards the gift and the recipient.

<sup>3</sup> I.e. either of the gift or the recipient; acittikatvā dānam deti.

<sup>4</sup> apaviddha, not wanted, neglected, rejected (as useless). MA. iv. 81 says that wanting to throw it away, he gives it as though he were flinging a snake on to an ant-hill.

<sup>5</sup> anāgamanadiṭṭhika, i.e. not thinking to whom will the fruit of the gift return (AA. iii. 291); or, hoping it will return to himself (MA. iv. 81).

<sup>6</sup> This clause is omitted in the text, probably in error.

<sup>7</sup> He gives having faith in the deed and its ripening, AA. iii. 291.

<sup>8</sup> mahattatā; MA. iv. 81 says that this means the devas of the six sensuous realms (for these cf. Vbh. 417).

<sup>9</sup> MA. iv. 81, success in (or, attainment of), sampaiti, the three skills, kusalāni, perhaps referring to skill in the three ways of body, speech and thought; or to skill due to the absence of attachment, hatred and confusion (?).

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
2. Anupada Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
2. The Division of the Uninterrupted

111. Discourse on the Uninterrupted

Anupada Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying: "Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Proficient,<sup>2</sup> monks, is Sāriputta; of great wisdom,<sup>3</sup> monks, is Sāriputta;
of wide wisdom,<sup>4</sup> monks, is Sāriputta;
of bright wisdom,<sup>5</sup> monks, is Sāriputta;
of swift wisdom,<sup>6</sup> monks, is Sāriputta;

of acute wisdom,<sup>7</sup> monks, is Sāriputta;
of piercing wisdom,<sup>8</sup> monks, is Sāriputta.

For half a month, monks, Sāriputta had uninterrupted [78] insight into things.<sup>9</sup>

This, monks, is due to Sāriputta's uninterrupted insight into things: as to this, monks, Sāriputta,
aloof from pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
enters on and abides in the first meditation
which is accompanied by initial thought and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness,
and is rapturous and joyful.

And those things which belong to the first meditation: initial thought and sustained thought and rapture and joy and one-pointedness of mind,<sup>10</sup> impingement, feeling, perception, will, thought,<sup>11</sup> desire, determination, energy,<sup>12</sup> mindfulness,<sup>13</sup> equanimity,<sup>14</sup> attention,<sup>15</sup> are uninterruptedly set up<sup>16</sup> by him;
known to him these things arise,
known they persist,
known they disappear.

He comprehends thus: 'Thus indeed things that have not been in me come to be;
having been they pass away.'

He, not feeling attracted<sup>17</sup> by these things, not feeling repelled,<sup>18</sup> independent,<sup>19</sup> not infatuated,<sup>20</sup> freed,<sup>21</sup> released,<sup>22</sup> dwells with a mind that is unconfined.<sup>23</sup>

He comprehends: 'There is a further escape.'<sup>24</sup>

There is zealous practice for him concerning that.

And again, monks, Sāriputta,
by allaying initial and discursive thought,
with his mind subjectively tranquillised and fixed on one point, [26] enters on and abides in the second meditation which is devoid of initial thought and discursive thought,
is born of concentration,
and is rapturous and joyful.

And those things which belong to the second meditation: inward tranquillity and rapture and joy and one-pointedness of mind, impingement, feeling, perception,
will, thought, desire,
determination, energy, mindfulness,
equanimity, attention,
are uninterruptedly set up by him;
known to him these things [79] arise,
known they persist,
known they disappear.

He comprehends thus: 'Thus indeed things that have not been in me come to be;
having been they pass away.'

He, not feeling attracted by these things,
not feeling repelled,
independent, not infatuated, freed, released,
dwells with a mind that is unconfined.

He comprehends: 'There is a further escape.'

There is zealous practice for him concerning that.

And again, monks, Sāriputta,
by the fading out of rapture,
dwells with equanimity,
is mindful and clearly conscious,
and he experiences in his person
that joy of which the ariyans say:
'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,'
and he enters on and abides in the third meditation.

And those things which belong to the third meditation: equanimity and joy and mindfulness and clear consciousness and onepointedness of mind,
impingement, feeling, perception,
will, thought, desire,
determination, energy, mindfulness,
equanimity, attention,
are uninterruptedly set up by him;
known to him these things arise,
known they persist,
known they disappear.

He comprehends thus: 'Thus indeed things that have not been in me come to
be;
having been they pass away.'

He, not feeling attracted by these things,
not feeling repelled,
independent, not infatuated, freed, released,
dwells with a mind that is unconfined.

He comprehends: 'There is a further escape.'

There is zealous practice for him concerning that.

And again, monks, Sāriputta,
by getting rid of joy,
by getting rid of anguish,

by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows, enters on and abides in the fourth meditation
which has neither anguish nor joy,
and which is entirely purified by equanimity and mindfulness.

And those things which belong to the fourth meditation: equanimity, feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant

...<sup>25</sup>

impassivity of mind,<sup>26</sup> purification by mindfulness, one-pointedness of mind,
impingement, feeling, perception,
will, thought, desire,
determination, energy, mindfulness,
equanimity, attention,
are uninterruptedly set up by him;
known to him these things arise,
known they persist,
[27] known they disappear.

He comprehends thus: 'Thus indeed things that have not been in me come to
be;
having been they pass away.'

He, not feeling attracted by these things,
not feeling repelled,
independent, not infatuated, freed, released,
dwells with a mind that is unconfined.

He comprehends: 'There is a further escape.'

There is zealous practice for him concerning that.

And again, monks, Sāriputta,
by passing quite beyond perceptions of material shapes,
by the going down of perceptions of sensory reactions,
by not attending to perceptions of variety, thinking: 'Ether is unending,' enters on and abides in the plane of infinite ether.

And those things which belong to the plane of infinite ether:
perception in the plane of infinite ether and one-pointedness of mind and
impingement, feeling, perception,
will, thought, desire,
determination, energy, mindfulness,
equanimity, attention,
are uninterruptedly set up by him;
known to him these things arise,
known they persist,
known they disappear.

[80] He comprehends thus: 'Thus indeed things that have not been in me come to be;
having been they pass away.'

He, not feeling attracted by these things,
not feeling repelled,
independent, not infatuated, freed, released,
dwells with a mind that is unconfined.

He comprehends: 'There is a further escape.'

There is zealous practice for him concerning that.

And again, monks, Sāriputta,
by passing quite beyond the plane of infinite ether, thinking, 'Consciousness is unending,' enters on and abides in the plane of infinite consciousness.

And those things which belong to the plane of infinite consciousness: perception in the plane of infinite consciousness
and one-pointedness of mind and impingement, feeling ... equanimity, attention, are uninterruptedly set up by him; known to him these things arise,

known they persist,
known they disappear.

He comprehends thus: 'Thus indeed things that have not been in me come to
be;
having been they pass away.'

He, not feeling attracted by these things,
not feeling repelled,
independent, not infatuated, freed, released,
dwells with a mind that is unconfined.

He comprehends: 'There is a further escape.'

There is zealous practice for him concerning that.

And again, monks, Sāriputta,
by passing quite beyond the plane of infinite consciousness, thinking: 'There is not anything,' enters on and abides in the plane of no-thing.

And those things which belong to the plane of no-thing: perception in the plane of no-thing
and one-pointedness of mind and
impingement, feeling, perception,
will, thought, desire,
determination, energy, mindfulness,
equanimity, attention,
are uninterruptedly set up by him;
known to him these things arise,
known they persist,
known they disappear.

He comprehends thus: 'Thus indeed things that have not been in me come to
be;
having been they pass away.'

He, not feeling attracted by these things,
not feeling repelled,
independent, not infatuated, freed, released,
dwells with a mind that is unconfined.

He comprehends: 'There is a further escape.'

There is zealous practice for him concerning that.

And again, monks, Sāriputta,
by passing quite beyond the plane of no-thing, enters on and abides in the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.

Mindful, he emerges from that attainment.

When he has emerged, mindful, from that attainment
he regards those things that are past, stopped, changed as:
'Thus indeed things that have not been in me come to be;
having been they pass away.'

He, not feeling attracted by these things,
not feeling repelled,
independent, not infatuated, freed, released,
dwells with a mind that is unconfined.

He comprehends: 'There is a further escape.'

There is zealous practice for him concerning that.

And again, monks, Sāriputta, by passing quite beyond the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception, enters on and abides in the stopping of perception and feeling.

And having seen by means of intuitive wisdom, his cankers are utterly destroyed.

Mindful, he emerges from that attainment.

When he has emerged, mindful, from that attainment
he regards those things that are past, stopped, changed as:
'Thus indeed things that have not been in me come to be;
having been they pass away.'

He, not feeling attracted by these things,
not feeling repelled,
independent, not infatuated, freed, released,
dwells with a mind that is unconfined.

He comprehends: 'There is no further escape.'

There is zealous practice for him concerning that.

[81] [21] Monks, if anyone speaking rightly could say of a man:

'He has attained to mastery, he has attained to going beyond<sup>27</sup>
in the ariyan moral habit;
he has attained to mastery, [29] he has attained to going beyond
in the ariyan concentration;
he has attained to mastery,
he has attained to going beyond
in the ariyan wisdom;
he has attained to mastery,
he has attained to going beyond
in the ariyan freedom'

— speaking rightly he could say of Sāriputta:

'He has attained to mastery,
he has attained to going beyond
in the ariyan moral habit;
he has attained to mastery,
he has attained to going beyond
in the ariyan concentration;
he has attained to mastery,
he has attained to going beyond

in the ariyan wisdom;
he has attained to mastery,
he has attained to going beyond
in the ariyan freedom'

Monks, if anyone speaking rightly could say of a man:

'He is the Lord's own son,
born of his mouth,
born of dhamma,
formed by dhamma,
an heir to dharnma,
not an heir to material things'
speaking rightly he could say of Sāriputta:
'He is the Lord's own son,
born of his mouth,
born of dhamma,
formed by dhamma,
an heir to dharnma,
not an heir to material things'

Sāriputta, monks,
rolls on rightly
the incomparable wheel of dhamma set rolling by the Tathāgata."

Thus spoke the Lord.
Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on the Uninterrupted:
The First

---

<sup>1</sup> anupada is continuous, or uninterrupted, "the next step following."

<sup>2</sup> paṇḍita, clever or wise. For this and the following words for wisdom (spoken to Sāriputta) see S. i. 191. MA. iv. 82 says he was skilled in the dhātu, the āyatana, dependent origination and in causal occasion and what is not causal occasion (thānāthāna, or, the possible and the impossible), with which cf. M. iii. 62.

<sup>3</sup> mahāpañña. Cf. Pts. ii. 190, MA. iv. 83 which enumerate various kinds of "great wisdom," such as in the moral habits, concentration, freedom, the knowledge and vision of freedom, the causal occasion and what is not, attainments in the great abidings, the ariyan truths, the 37 things helpful to enlightenment, the fruits of recluseship, the super-knowledges and the great incomparable Nibbāna. See also A. ii. 67.

<sup>4</sup> puṭhupañña. Cf. Pts. ii. 191, MA. iv. 83, the same as mahāpañña but with some additions. See also A. i. 131, ii. 67.

<sup>5</sup> hāsupañña. Cf. S. v. 376, Pts. ii. 199. The word hāsu would appear from MA. iv. 84 and Pts. to be connected with contentment and rapture in fulfilling the sīla, the control of the sense-organs, moderation in eating, vigilance, and the body of moral habits, concentration, wisdom and freedom. Cf. hasati, to be glad. Hāsa also found in Dhs., e.g. §9, 86, etc., in definition of pīti, rapture.

<sup>6</sup> javanapañña. Cf. S. v. 376-377, Pts. ii. 200. MA. iv. 84: he hastens quickly (in knowing) that all the khandhā are impermanent, suffering, not-self.

<sup>7</sup> tikkhapañña. Cf. M. i. 11, D. iii. 126 and also see A. i. 45. MA. iv. 85: he quickly cuts through the defilements, and gets rid of evil unskilled states of mind, attachment, aversion and confusion, etc., that have arisen.

<sup>8</sup> nibbedhikapañña; cf. Pts. ii. 201 ff., and for references see P.E.D. All these forms of wisdom are mentioned at S. i. 63 (again of Sāriputta) and at Jā. iv. 136. See K.S. i. 88, n. 1.

<sup>9</sup> Sāriputta then gained arahantship in a fortnight, MA. iv. 86; also MA. iii. 203, DA. 418, DhA. i. 97.

<sup>10</sup> See Dhs. 7-11, 84-88, 283-287, 371-375. For an extremely valuable discussion of these and many of the following terms see Bud. Psych. Ethics, especially the notes on p. 5-18.

<sup>11</sup> See Dhs. 2-6. 278-282, 366-370.

<sup>12</sup> See Dhs. 13.

<sup>13</sup> Dhs. 332.

<sup>14</sup> Dhs. 153.

<sup>15</sup> Dhs. 1334.

<sup>16</sup> anupadavavatthitā.

<sup>17</sup> anupāya. The following sequence of terms occurs also at M. iii. 30.

<sup>18</sup> anapāya.

<sup>19</sup> anissita, i.e. of craving and wrong views, MA. iv. 89.

<sup>20</sup> apaṭibaddha, i.e. by attachment and desire.

<sup>21</sup> vippamutta, i.e. from attachment to sense-pleasures.

<sup>22</sup> visaṃyutta, i.e. from the four yokes or all the defilements, MA. iv. 89.

<sup>23</sup> vimariyādikatena cetasā; cf. S. iii. 31. Unconfined because of what it has eliminated.

<sup>24</sup> Cf. M. i. 38, and see M.L.S. i. 48, n. 7. But here it means, not Nibbāna, but the next excellent attainment.

<sup>25</sup> The textual reading, passi vedanā, is unintelligible to me. Neumann appears to give "Reinheit." The Comy. is silent.

<sup>26</sup> cetaso anābhogo, impassivity of thought, lack of mental interest, lack of ideation, lack of inclination. See Pts. Contr., p. 221, n. 4 on ābhoga; and see Vism. 164, quoted at MA. iv. 90 to show that cetaso ābhogo, which was present in the third jhāna, is absent in the fourth. Cf. also Vbh. 307, quoted Kvu. 425, pañca vññāṇā anābhogā; and MA. ii. 63 anāvattano anābhogo. B.H.S.D. under anābhoga suggests "effortless" (adj.) and "Non-effort, impassivity" (subst.); see also s.v. ābhoga.

<sup>27</sup> pāramippatta. Pāramī, excellence, perfection, accomplishment, going beyond. MA. iv. 91 gives nipphattipatta, attained accomplishment, completion, perfection.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
2. Anupada Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
2. The Division of the Uninterrupted

112. Discourse on the Sixfold Cleansing

Chabbisodhana Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying: "Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Monks, a monk here declares profound knowledge, saying:

'Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.'

Monks, the words of this monk are to be neither rejoiced in nor protested against.<sup>1</sup> Without (your) rejoicing or protesting, the question might be asked:

"Your reverence, these four modes of statement<sup>2</sup> have been rightly pointed out by that Lord who knows and sees perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

What four?

That which when seen is spoken of as seen, that which when heard is spoken of as heard, that which when sensed is spoken of as sensed, that which when cognised is spoken of as cognised.<sup>3</sup>

Your reverence, these four modes of statement have been rightly pointed out by that Lord who knows and sees, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

But knowing what, seeing what in respect of these four modes of statement can your reverence say that his mind is freed from the cankers with no grasping (remaining)?'

Monks, the explanation of the monk in whom the cankers are destroyed, who has lived the life, done what was to be done, laid down the burden, attained his own welfare, in whom the fetters of becoming are utterly destroyed and who is freed by right profound knowledge, would be in accordance with dhamma were he to say:

'I, your reverences, not feeling attracted<sup>4</sup> to things seen ... heard ... sensed ... cognised, not feeling repelled by them, independent,

not infatuated,
freed,
released,
dwell with a mind that is unconfined.

So, your reverences, as I know thus, see thus, in respect of these four modes of statement, I can say that my mind is freed from the cankers with no grasping (remaining).'

Monks, that monk's words should be rejoiced in and approved of by the monks, saying:

'It is good.'

When they have rejoiced in and approved of his words, saying, 'It is good,' a further question might be asked:<sup>5</sup>

'Your reverence, these five groups of grasping have been rightly pointed out by that Lord who knows and sees, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

What five?

That is to say, the group of grasping after material shape,
the group of grasping after feeling,
the group of grasping after perception,
the group of grasping after the habitual tendencies,
the group of grasping after consciousness.

Your reverence, these five groups of grasping have been rightly pointed out by that Lord who knows and sees, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

But knowing what, seeing what in respect of these five groups of grasping can your reverence say that his mind is freed from the cankers with no grasping (remaining)?'

Monks, the explanation of the monk in whom the cankers are destroyed, who has lived the life ... and who is freed by right profound knowledge, would be in accordance with dhamma were he to say:

'I, your reverences, having known that material shape ... feeling ... perception ... the habitual tendencies ... consciousness is of little strength, fading away,<sup>6</sup> comfortless;
by the destruction,
fading away,
stopping,
giving up and casting out of grasping after and hankering after<sup>7</sup> material shape ... feeling ... perception ... the habitual tendencies ...
consciousness
which are mental dogmas, biases and tendencies,<sup>8</sup>
I comprehend that my mind is freed.

So, your reverences, as I know thus, see thus in respect of these five groups of grasping, I can say that my mind is freed from the cankers with no grasping (remaining).'

Monks, that monk's words should be rejoiced in and approved of by the monks, saying:

'It is good.'

When they have rejoiced in and approved of his words, saying: 'It is good,'
a further question might be asked:

Your reverence, these six elements have been rightly pointed out by that Lord who knows and sees, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

What six?

The element of extension,
the element of cohesion,

the element of radiation,
the element of motion,<sup>9</sup> the element of space,<sup>10</sup> the element of consciousness.<sup>11</sup>

Your reverence, these six elements have been rightly pointed out by that Lord who knows and sees, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

But knowing what, seeing what in respect of these six elements can your reverence say that his mind is freed from the cankers with no grasping (remaining)?'

Monks, the explanation of that monk in whom the cankers are destroyed, who has lived the life ... and who is freed by right profound knowledge would be in accordance with dhamma were he to say:

'I, your reverences, went to the element of extension as not-self and to self as not dependent on the element of extension ... went-to the element of cohesion ... radiation ... motion ... space ... consciousness as not-self and to self as not dependent on the element of consciousness;
by the destruction, fading away, stopping, giving up and casting out of grasping after and hankering after these things which are dependent on the element of extension . . . cohesion ... radiation ... motion ... space ... consciousness which are mental dogmas, biases and tendencies,
I comprehend that my mind is freed.

So, your reverences, as I know thus, see thus in respect of these six elements, I can say that my mind is freed from the cankers with no grasping (remaining).'

Monks, that monk's words should be rejoiced in and approved of by the monks, saying:

'It is good.'

When they have rejoiced in and approved of his words, saying: 'It is good,' a further question might be asked:

Your reverence, these six internal and external (sense-)fields have been rightly pointed out by that Lord who knows and sees, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

What six?

The eye as well as material shapes, the ear as well as sounds,
the nose as well as smells,
the tongue as well as tastes, the body as well as tactile objects, the mind as well as mental states.

Your reverence, these six internal and external (sense-)fields have been rightly pointed out by that Lord who knows and sees, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One.

But knowing what, seeing what in respect of these six internal and external (sense-)fields can your reverence say that his mind is freed from the cankers with no grasping (remaining)?'

Monks, the explanation of that monk in whom the cankers are destroyed, who has lived the life, done what was to be done, laid down the burden, attained his own welfare, in whom the fetters of becoming are utterly destroyed and who is freed by right profound knowledge, would be in accordance with dhamma were he to say:

'Your reverences,
whatever is desire,
whatever is attachment,
whatever is delight,
whatever is craving for eye, material shape, visual consciousness and for things cognisable through visual
consciousness, 12
by the destruction,
fading away,

stopping,
giving up and casting out of grasping after and hankering after these things which are mental dogmas, biases and tendencies,
I comprehend that my mind is freed.

Your reverences, so it is with the ear, sounds, auditory consciousness ... the nose, smells, olfactory consciousness ... the tongue, tastes, gustatory consciousness ... the body, tactile objects, bodily consciousness ... the mind, mental states, mental consciousness, with mental states cognisable through mental consciousness.

So, your reverences, as I know thus, see thus in respect of these six internal-external (sense-)fields, I can say that my mind is freed from the cankers with no grasping (remaining)!

Monks, that monk's words should be rejoiced in and approved of by the monks, saying:

'It is good.'

When they have rejoiced in and approved of his words, saying: 'It is good,' a further question might be asked:

'But knowing what, seeing what in respect of this consciousness-informed body and all external phenomena can your reverence say that his tendency to pride that "I am the doer, mine is the doer" is properly extirpated?'

Monks, the explanation of that monk in whom the cankers are destroyed, who has lived the life, done what was to be done, laid down the burden, attained his own welfare, in whom the fetters of becoming are utterly destroyed and who is freed by right profound knowledge, would be in accordance with dhamma were he to say:

'Formerly, your reverences, when I was a householder, I was ignorant. The Tathāgata or a disciple of the Tathāgata taught me dhamma. When I had heard that dhamma I gained faith in the Tathāgata; being possessed of that faith I had gained in him, I reflected thus:

"The household life is confined and dusty,<sup>13</sup> going forth is in the open; it is not easy for one who lives in a house to fare the Brahma-faring wholly fulfilled, wholly pure, polished like a conch-shell. Suppose now that I, having cut off my hair and beard, having put on saffron robes, should go forth from home into homelessness?"

So I, your reverences, after a time, getting rid of my wealth, whether small or great, getting rid of my circle of relations, whether small or great, having cut off my hair and beard, having put on saffron robes, went forth from home into homelessness.

I, being gone forth thus, endowed with the training and the way of living of monks, abandoning onslaught on creatures, abstained from onslaught on creatures; the stick laid aside, the sword laid aside, I lived scrupulous, kindly, friendly and compassionate towards all living things and creatures.

Abandoning the taking of what had not been given, I abstained from taking what had not been given; taking (only) what was given, waiting for what was given, without stealing I lived with self become pure.

Abandoning unchastity, I was one that was chaste, keeping remote (from unchastity), refraining from dealings with women.

Abandoning lying speech, I was one who abstained from lying speech, I was a truth-speaker, a bondsman to truth, trustworthy, dependable, no deceiver of the world.

Abandoning slanderous speech, I abstained from slanderous speech; having heard something here I was not one to repeat it elsewhere for causing variance among these (people); or, having heard something elsewhere I was not one to repeat it here for causing variance among these (people).

In this way I was a reconciler of those who were at variance and one who combined those who were friends. Concord was my pleasure, concord my delight, concord my joy, concord the motive of my speech.

Abandoning harsh speech, I abstained from harsh speech. Whatever speech was gentle, pleasing to the ear, [34] affectionate, going to the heart, urbane, pleasant to the manyfolk, agreeable to the many folk — I was one who uttered speech like that.

Abandoning frivolous chatter, I abstained from frivolous chatter. I was a speaker at the right time, a speaker of fact, a speaker on the goal, a speaker on dhamma, a speaker on discipline, I spoke words that were worth treasuring, with opportune similes, purposeful, connected with the goal.

I abstained from destruction to seed-growth and vegetable growth.

I was one who ate one meal a day, desisting at night, refraining from eating at a wrong time.

I abstained from watching shows of dancing, singing and music.

I abstained from using garlands, scents, unguents, adornments, finery.

I abstained from using high beds, large beds ...

from accepting gold and silver ...

from accepting raw grain ...

raw meat ...

women and girls ...

women slaves and men slaves ...

goats and sheep ...

fowl and swine ...

elephants, cows, horses, mares ...

fields and sites.

I was one that abstained from the practice of sending or going on messages.

I abstained from buying and selling ... from cheating with weights, bronzes and measures.

I abstained from the crooked ways of bribery, fraud and deceit ... from maiming, murdering, manacling, highway robbery.

I was contented with the robes for protecting my body, with the almsfood for sustaining my stomach.

Wherever I went I took these things with me as I went. As a bird on the wing takes its wings with it wherever it flies, even so did I, your reverences, contented with the robes for protecting my body and with the alms-food for sustaining my stomach, take these things with me wherever I went.

I, possessed of this body of ariyan moral habit, inwardly experienced the bliss of blamelessness.

If I saw a material shape with the eye
I was not entranced by the general appearance,
I was not entranced by the detail.

If I dwelt with this organ of sight uncontrolled, covetousness and dejection, evil unskilled states, might flow in.

So I fared along controlling it, I guarded the organ of sight, I achieved control over the organ of sight.

If I heard a sound with the ear ...
If I smelt a smell with the nose ...
If I savoured a taste with the tongue ...
If I felt a touch with the body ...
If I cognised a mental state with the mind I was not entranced by the general appearance, I was not entranced by the detail ...
I achieved control over the organ of mind.

I, possessed of this ariyan control over the sense-organs, inwardly experienced the bliss of being "unaffected."<sup>14</sup>

Whether I was setting out or returning,
I was one who comported myself properly;
whether I was looking down or looking round ... bending back or stretching out (my arm) ... carrying my outer cloak, bowl or robe ... munching, drinking, eating, savouring ... obeying the calls of nature ... walking, standing, sitting, asleep, awake, talking or silent,
I was one who comported myself properly.

Possessed of this ariyan body of moral habit and possessed of this ariyan control over the sense-organs and possessed of this ariyan mindfulness and clear consciousness, I chose a remote lodging in a forest,
at the root of a tree,
on a mountain slope,
in a wilderness,
a hill-cave,
a cemetery,
a forest haunt,
in the open or on a heap of straw.

Returning from alms-gathering after the meal,
I sat down cross-legged,
holding the back erect,
having made mindfulness rise up in front of me.

By getting rid of covetousness for the world,
I dwelt with a mind devoid of coveting,
I purified the mind of coveting.

By getting rid of the taint of ill-will,
I dwelt benevolent in mind;

and compassionate for the welfare of all creatures and beings,
I purified the mind of the taint of ill-will.

By getting rid of sloth and torpor,
I dwelt devoid of sloth and torpor;
perceiving the light,
mindful and clearly conscious,
I purified the mind of sloth and torpor.

By getting rid of restlessness and worry, I dwelt calmly, the mind subjectively tranquilised,
I purified the mind of restlessness and worry.

By getting rid of doubt,
I dwelt doubt-crossed,
unperplexed as to the states that are skilled,
I purified the mind of doubt.

By getting rid of these five hindrances — defilements of the mind and weakening to intuitive wisdom —
aloof from pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
I entered on and abided in the first meditation which is ... joyful.

By allaying initial thought and discursive thought I entered on and abided in the second meditation which is joyful.

By the fading out of rapture,
I dwelt with equanimity and I entered on and abided in the third meditation.

By getting rid of joy and by getting rid of anguish ...
I entered on and abided in the fourth meditation which ... is entirely purified by equanimity and mindfulness.

Thus with the mind composed,
quite purified,
quite clarified,
without blemish,
without defilement,
grown soft and workable,
stable,
immovable,

I directed my mind to the knowledge of the destruction of the cankers.<sup>15</sup>

I understood as it really is:

This is anguish ...
this the arising of anguish ...
this the stopping of anguish ...
this the course leading to the stopping of anguish.

I understood as it really is:

These are the cankers ...
this is the arising of the cankers ...
this the stopping of the cankers ...
this the course leading to the stopping of the cankers.

When I knew and saw this thus, my mind was freed from the canker of the sense-pleasures and my mind was freed from the canker of becoming and my mind was freed from the canker of ignorance.

In freedom
the knowledge came to be that I was freed and I comprehended:

Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,

done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.

So, your reverences, as I know thus, see thus, in respect of this consciousness-informed body and all external phenomena, I can say that my tendency to pride that "I am the doer, mine is the doer" has been properly extirpated.'

Monks, that monk's words should be rejoiced in and approved of by the monks, saying:

'It is good.'

When they have rejoiced in and approved of his words, saying: 'It is good,'
he should be informed thus:

'It is a gain for you, your reverence, it is well gotten by you, your reverence, that we see a Brahma-farer in one such as is the venerable one.'

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

---

<sup>1</sup> Or, "neither approved of nor scorned." Cf. M. iii. 207, D. ii. 124.

<sup>2</sup> vohhāra.

<sup>3</sup> On diṭṭha suta muta viññāta See B.D. ii, 166, n. 3; and cf. Vin. iv. 2, A. ii, 246, iv. 307, D. iii. 232, Vbh. 376.

<sup>4</sup> "Attracted, repelled, independent," etc., as at M. iii. 25.

<sup>5</sup> That is, if the monks are not satisfied with his explanation.

<sup>6</sup> virāga, explained at MA. iv. 92 as vigacchanasabhāva, "of the nature to disappear."

<sup>7</sup> upāyupādāna, a synonym for wrong views and craving, MA. iv, 92.

<sup>8</sup> Cf. S. ii. 17, iii. 10.

<sup>9</sup> The first four as in M. Sta. 1. On the five see M. i. 423 f.; and on the six see M. iii. 62, 240, D. iii. 247, S. ii. 248, A. i. 176, VbhA. 82 ff., and cf. VbhA.55

<sup>10</sup> ākāsadhātu, or possibly the element of the intangible. Ākāsa is explained as asamphuṭṭha, not filled with, not contacted (or untouched). C.P.D., s.v. a-samphuṭṭ, gives "not filled (with: instr.)"; cf. Asl. 325-326 which says it is impossible to plough, cut or break ākāsa, sky, space, ether. See Dhs. 638: ākāso ... asamphuṭṭham catūhi mahābhūtehi, not filled with the four great elementals. Bud. Psych. Ethics, p. 194, notes 1, 2, refers to M. i. 423 and points out that ākāsadhātu appears to occur as a fifth element there. See Miln. 271 where of ākāsa and nibbāna it is said that neither is born of deeds, cause or the creative power of nature. The question of "space" is discussed by A. B. Keith in Bud. Philosophy, pp. 168-169.

<sup>11</sup> viññāṇadhātu, called at MA. iv. 93 = VbhA. 55 vijānadhātu, element of discrimination.

<sup>12</sup> Whether past, future or present, MA: iv. 93 ff. where reference is also made to the Channovādasutta (M. Sta. 144).

<sup>13</sup> For the following passage cf. M. i. 179 ff. (M.L.S. i. 224 ff.).

<sup>14</sup> 1 See note at M.L.S. ii, 11 (on M. i. 346).

<sup>15</sup> Bu. at MA. iv. 94 is rather hard put to it to explain the six ways of cleansing, and says the name of this Discourse is also Ekavisajjaka sutta, the Discourse on Adhering to one (thing). Here the six to be purified are the four statements, the five groups, the six elements, the six internal-external sense-fields, one's own consciousness-informed body, and that of others. But Theras living overseas reduce the consciousness-informed body of oneself and of others to one (category) and speak of the six parts together with the four kinds of nutriment. But these six parts: Of what, how then, when, where have you possession, which defilements have you destroyed, how many things have you acquired? — should be corrected by the Vinaya exegesis.

Bu. also says, loc. cit., that former habitations and deva-like vision were not spoken of because monks do not ask about a mundane state but only about a supermundane one.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
2. Anupada Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
2. The Division of the Uninterrupted

113. Discourse on the Good Man

Sappurisa Sutta

---

Thus I have heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattthī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"I will teach you, monks, dhamma of good men and dhamma of bad men.

Listen to it,
pay careful attention
and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"And what, monks, is dhamma of good men?

As to this, monks,
a bad man has gone forth from a high family.<sup>1</sup>

He reflects thus:

'I have gone forth from this high family;
but these other monks
have not gone forth from a high family.'

Because he belongs to a high family
he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man, monks, reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's belonging to a high family that things of [90] greed,
things of aversion,
things of confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not gone forth from a high family, one may still fare along in complete accordance with dhamma,
may fare along correctly,
may be a farer according to dhamma,
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing,<sup>2</sup> neither exalts himself for belonging to a high family
nor disparages others.

This, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

Again, monks, a bad man has gone forth from a great family.<sup>34</sup>

He reflects thus:

'I have gone forth from this great family;
but these other monks
have not gone forth from a great family.'

Because he belongs to a great family
he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man, monks, reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's belonging to a great family
that things of greed,
things of aversion,
things of confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not gone forth from a great family,
one may still fare along
in complete accord with dhamma,
may fare along correctly,
may be a farer according to dhamma,
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for belonging to a great family
nor disparages others.

This, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

Again, monks, a bad man has gone forth from a very rich family.

He reflects thus:

'I have gone forth from this very rich family;
but these other monks
have not gone forth from a very rich family.'

Because he belongs to a very rich family
he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man, monks, reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's belonging to a very rich family
that things of greed,
things of aversion,
things of confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not gone forth from a very rich family,
one may still fare along
in complete accord with dhamma,
may fare along correctly,
may be a farer according to dhamma,
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for belonging to a very rich family
nor disparages others.

This, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

Again, monks, a bad man has gone forth from an eminent family.

He reflects thus:

'I have gone forth from this very eminent family;
but these other monks
have not gone forth from an eminent family.'

Because he belongs to an eminent family
he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man, monks, reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's belonging to an eminent family
that things of greed,
things of aversion,
things of confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not gone forth from an eminent family,
one may still fare along
in complete accord with dhamma,
may fare along correctly,
may be a farer according to dhamma,
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for belonging to an eminent family
nor disparages others.

This, too monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man is well-known, famous.

He reflects thus:

'I am well-known,
famous,
but these other monks are little known, of no esteem.'<sup>5</sup>

Because of his being well-known he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's being well-known
that things of greed,
aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not well-known,
famous,
one may still fare along in complete accord with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being well-known
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man acquires the requisites of robe-material,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick.

He reflects [91] thus:

'I am an acquirer of the requisites of robe-material,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick, but these other monks are not acquirers of the requisites of robe-material,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick.'

Because of these acquisitions he exalts himself, disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's being an acquirer of the requisites of robe-material,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick,

that things of greed,
aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not an acquirer of the requisites of robe-material,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick,
one may still fare along in complete accordance with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being an acquirer of the requisites of robe-material,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick,
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man is one who has heard much.

He reflects thus:

'I am one who has heard much, but these other monks are not ones who has heard much.'

Because of these acquisitions he exalts himself, disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's being one who has heard much,
that things of greed,
aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not one who has heard much,
one may still fare along in complete accordance with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being one who has heard much,
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man is one who is expert in Vinaya.

He reflects thus:

'I am one who is expert in Vinaya, but these other monks are not ones who are expert in Vinaya.'

Because of being expert in Vinaya he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's being one who is expert in Vinaya,
that things of greed,

aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not one who is expert in Vinaya,
one may still fare along in complete accordance with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being one who is expert in Vinaya,
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man is one who is a speaker on dhamma.

He reflects thus:

'I am one who is a speaker on dhamma, but these other monks are not ones who are speakers on dhamma.'

Because of being a speaker on dhamma he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's being a speaker on dhamma,

that things of greed,
aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not a speaker on dhamma,
one may still fare along in complete accordance with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being one who is a speaker on dhamma,
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man is one who is a forest-dweller<sup>6</sup>.

He reflects thus:

'I am one who is a forest-dweller, but these other monks are not ones who are forest-dwellers.'

Because of being a forest-dweller he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's being a forest-dweller,

that things of greed,
aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not a forest-dweller,
one may still fare along in complete accordance with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being one who is a forest-dweller,
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man is one who is a wearer of robes taken from the dust-heap.

He reflects thus:

'I am one who is a wearer of robes taken from the dust-heap, but these other monks are not ones who are wearers of robes taken from the dust-heap.'

Because of being a wearer of robes taken from the dust-heap he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's being a wearer of robes taken from the dust-heap,

that things of greed,
aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not a a wearer of robes taken from the dust-heap,
one may still fare along in complete accordance with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being one who is a wearer of robes taken from the dust-heap,
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man is one who is a beggar for alms.

He reflects thus:

'I am one who is a beggar for alms, but these other monks are not ones who are beggars for alms.'

Because of being a beggar for alms he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's being a beggar for alms,

that things of greed,
aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not a beggar for alms,
one may still fare along in complete accordance with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being one who is a beggar for alms,

nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man is one who stays at the root of a tree.

He reflects thus:

'I am one who stays at the root of a tree, but these other monks are not ones who stay at the root of a tree.'

Because of being one who stays at the root of a tree he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's staying at the root of a tree,

that things of greed,
aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not one who stays at the root of a tree,
one may still fare along in complete accord with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being one who stays at the root of a tree,
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man is one who stays in a cemetery.

He reflects thus:

'I am one who stays in a cemetery, but these other monks are not ones who stay in a cemetery.'

Because of being one who stays in a cemetery he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's staying in a cemetery,

that things of greed,
aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not one who stays in a cemetery,
one may still fare along in complete accordance with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being one who stays in a cemetery,
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man is one who stays in the open air.

He reflects thus:

'I am one who stays in the open air, but these other monks are not ones who stay in the open air.'

Because of being one who stays in the open air he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's staying in the open air,

that things of greed,
aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not one who stays in the open air,
one may still fare along in complete accordance with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being one who stays in the open air,
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man is one who remains in a sitting posture.

He reflects thus:

'I am one who remains in a sitting posture, but these other monks are not ones who remains in a sitting posture.'

Because of being one who remains in a sitting posture he exalts himself, disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's remaining in a sitting posture,

that things of greed,
aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not one who remains in a sitting posture,
one may still fare along in complete accord with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being one who remains in a sitting posture,
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man is one who sits on the seat offered.

He reflects thus:

'I am one who sits on the seat offered, but these other monks are not ones who sit on the seat offered.'

Because of being one who sits on the seat offered he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's sitting on the seat offered,

that things of greed,
aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not one who sits on the seat offered,
one may still fare along in complete accordance with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being one who sits on the seat offered,
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man is one who eats once (a day only).

He reflects thus:

'I am one who eats once (a day only), but these other monks are not ones who eat once (a day only).'

[92] Because of being one who eats once (a day only) he exalts himself, disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'It is not because of one's eating once (a day only),

that things of greed,
aversion,
confusion
go to destruction.

For even if one be not one who eats once (a day only),
one may still fare along in complete accordance with dhamma
and therefore be one to be honoured and commended.'

He, having made the course itself the main thing, neither exalts himself for being one who eats once (a day only),
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man,
aloof from pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
enters on
and abides in
the first meditation
which is accompanied by initial thought and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness,
and is rapturous and joyful.

He reflects thus:

'I am an acquirer of the attainment of the first meditation, but these other monks are not acquirers of the attainment of the first meditation.'

Because of being one who acquires the attainment of the first meditation he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'Lack of desire<sup>7</sup> even for the attainment of the first meditation has been spoken of by the Lord;
for whatever they imagine it to be,
it is otherwise.

He, having made lack of desire itself the main thing, neither exalts himself on account of that attainment of the first meditation
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man,
by allaying initial and discursive thought,
his mind subjectively tranquillised
and fixed on one point,
enters on
and abides in
the second meditation
which is devoid of initial and discursive thought,
is born of concentration
and is rapturous and joyful.

He reflects thus:

'I am an acquirer of the attainment of the second meditation, but these other monks are not acquirers of the attainment of the second meditation.'

Because of being one who acquires the attainment of the second meditation
he exalts himself,

disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'Lack of desire
even for the attainment of the second meditation
has been spoken of by the Lord;
for whatever they imagine it to be,
it is otherwise.

He, having made lack of desire itself the main thing, neither exalts himself on account of that attainment of the second meditation
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man,
by the fading out of rapture,
dwells with equanimity,
attentive and clearly conscious,
and experiences in his person
that joy of which the ariyans say:
'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,'
and he enters on
and abides in
the third meditation.

He reflects thus:

'I am an acquirer of the attainment of the third meditation, but these other monks are not acquirers of the attainment of the third meditation.'

Because of being one who acquires the attainment of the third meditation he exalts himself, disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'Lack of desire even for the attainment of the third meditation has been spoken of by the Lord; for whatever they imagine it to be, it is otherwise.'

He, having made lack of desire itself the main thing, neither exalts himself on account of that attainment of the third meditation nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man by getting rid of joy, by getting rid of anguish, by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows, enters on and abides in the fourth meditation which has neither anguish nor joy, and which is entirely purified by equanimity and mindfulness.

He reflects thus:

'I am an acquirer of the attainment of the fourth meditation, but these other monks are not acquirers of the attainment of the fourth

meditation.'

Because of being one who acquires the attainment of the fourth meditation
he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'Lack of desire
even for the attainment of the fourth meditation
has been spoken of by the Lord;
for whatever they imagine it to be,
it is otherwise.

He, having [93] made lack of desire itself the main thing, neither exalts himself on account of that attainment of the fourth meditation
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man by wholly transcending perception of material shapes, by the going down of perception of sensory reactions, by not attending to perception of variety,
thinking:
'Ether is unending,'
enters on
and abides in the plane of infinite ether.

He reflects thus:

'I am an acquirer of the attainment of the plane of infinite ether, but these other monks are not acquirers of the attainment of the plane of infinite ether.'

Because of being one who acquires the attainment of the plane of infinite ether he exalts himself, disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'Lack of desire even for the attainment of the plane of infinite ether has been spoken of by the Lord; for whatever they imagine it to be, it is otherwise.

He, having made lack of desire itself the main thing, neither exalts himself on account of that attainment of the plane of infinite ether nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man by wholly transcending the plane of infinite ether, thinking:

'Consciousness is unending,' enters on and abides in the plane of infinite consciousness.

He reflects thus:

'I am an acquirer of the attainment of the plane of infinite consciousness, but these other monks are not acquirers of the attainment of the plane of infinite consciousness.'

Because of being one who acquires the attainment of the plane of infinite consciousness he exalts himself, disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'Lack of desire
even for the attainment of the plane of infinite consciousness
has been spoken of by the Lord;
for whatever they imagine it to be,
it is otherwise.

He, having made lack of desire itself the main thing, neither exalts himself on account of that attainment of the plane of infinite consciousness
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man, by wholly transcending the plane of infinite consciousness,
thinking:
'There is not anything,'
enters on
and abides in
the plane of no-thing.

He reflects thus:

'I am an acquirer of the attainment of the plane of no-thing, but these other monks are not acquirers of the attainment of the plane of nothing.'

Because of being one who acquires the attainment of the plane of no-thing
he exalts himself,
disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'Lack of desire
even for the attainment of the plane of no-thing
has been spoken of by the Lord;
for whatever they imagine it to be,
it is otherwise.

He, having made lack of desire itself the main thing, neither exalts himself on account of that attainment of the plane of no-thing
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a bad man, by wholly transcending the plane of no-thing,
enters on
and abides in
the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.

He reflects thus:

'I am an acquirer of the attainment of the plane of neither-perception-nor-
non-perception,
but these other monks are not acquirers of the attainment of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.'

Because of being one who acquires the attainment of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception he exalts himself, disparages the others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a bad man.

But a good man reflects thus:

'Lack of desire
even for the attainment of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception
has been spoken of by the Lord;
for whatever they imagine it to be,
it is otherwise.

He, having made lack of desire itself the main thing, neither exalts himself on account of that attainment of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception
nor disparages others.

This too, monks, is dhamma of a good man.

■

And again, monks, a good man, by wholly transcending the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception,
enters on
and abides in
the stopping of perception and feeling;
and having seen by intuitive wisdom, his cankers are caused to be destroyed.<sup>8</sup>

And [94] monks, this monk does not imagine he<sup>9</sup> is aught or anywhere
or in anything."<sup>10</sup>

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on the Good Man:
The Third

---

<sup>1</sup> MA. iv. 98, a khattiya (noble warrior) family or a brahman family. Cf. Vin. iv. 6 where distinguished birth, ukkaṭṭha, jāti, is assigned to these two.

<sup>2</sup> so paṭipadam yeva antaram karitvā, cf. M. iii. 14.

<sup>3</sup> A noble, brahman or merchant family, MA. iv. 98.

<sup>4</sup> [this material is abridged here thus: "(to be set out at length in the way given below)" and Ms. Horner then footnotes: "I.e. "above" to us who use a printed book instead of a palm-leaf MS."]

<sup>5</sup> Cf. M. i. 192.

<sup>6</sup> Here are mentioned nine out of the thirteen dhūtaṅga, or ascetic practices, for which see Vism. 61 ff.

<sup>7</sup> atammayatā, This is nittaṅhatā, while tamnmyatā is taṅhā, MA. iv. 99. Cf. M. i. 319, iii. 220, A. i. 150, iii. 444.

<sup>8</sup> parikkhayāpenti instead of the more usual parikkhīṇā honti. MA. iv. 99 speaks of this person as a non-returner. This attainment of stopping is not for the ordinary person, puthujjanassa sā n'atthi.

<sup>9</sup> puggala supplied by MA. iv. 99-100.

<sup>10</sup> na kiñci na kuhiñci na kenaci maññati. Cf. M. iii. 103, na katthaci na kuhiñci.

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
2. Anupada Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
2. The Division of the Uninterrupted 114. Discourse on What is to Be Followed and What is Not to Be Followed

Sevitabba-Asevitabba Sutta

---

Thus I have heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"I will teach you a disquisition on dhamma regarding what is to be followed and what is not to be followed.

Listen to it,
pay careful attention
and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"I, monks, say that bodily conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in bodily conduct.

And I, monks, say that vocal conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in vocal conduct.

And I, monks, say that mental conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in mental conduct.

And I, monks, say that the arising of thought is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the arising of thought.

And I, monks, say that the assumption of perception is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of perception.

And I, monks, say that the assumption of views is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed

and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of views.

And I, monks, say that the assumption of individuality<sup>1</sup> is of two kinds,
one of which is to be [95] followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of individuality.

---

When this had been said,
the venerable Sāriputta spoke thus to the Lord:

"I, revered sir, thus understand this to be the meaning in full of what was spoken of by the Lord in brief, but of which the meaning was not explained in full:

'I, monks, say that bodily conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in bodily conduct.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of bodily conduct is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of bodily conduct is not to be followed.

Revered sir, if a certain kind of bodily conduct is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,

skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of bodily conduct is to be followed.

And what kind of bodily conduct, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

As to this,<sup>2</sup> revered sir, someone makes onslaught on creatures,
he is cruel,
bloody-handed,
intent on injuring and killing,
without mercy to living creatures.

He is a taker of what is not given;
whatever property of another
in village or jungle
is not given to him
he takes by theft.

He is a wrong-goer in regard to pleasures of the senses;
he has intercourse with (girls) protected by the mother,
he has intercourse with (girls) protected by the father,
he has intercourse with (girls) protected by the parents,
he has intercourse with (girls) protected by a brother,
he has intercourse with (girls) protected by a sister,
he has intercourse with (girls) protected by relations,
he has intercourse with (girls) who have a husband,
and whose use involves punishments,
and even with those adorned with the garlands of betrothal.

If this kind of bodily conduct is followed, revered sir,
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

And what kind of bodily conduct, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

As to this, revered sir,
someone, abandoning onslaught on creatures,
is restrained from onslaught on creatures;
the stick laid aside,
the sword laid aside,
he lives scrupulous,
merciful,
kindly and compassionate
to all living creatures.

Abandoning taking what is not given,
he is restrained from taking what is not given;
he does not take by theft
any property of another
in village or jungle
that is not given to him.

Abandoning wrong-going in [96] regard to pleasures of the senses, he is restrained from wrong-doing in regard to pleasures of the senses;
he does not have intercourse with (girls) protected by the mother, he does not have intercourse with (girls) protected by the father, he does not have intercourse with (girls) protected by the parents, he does not have intercourse with (girls) protected by a brother,
he does not have intercourse with (girls) protected by a sister,
he does not have intercourse with (girls) protected by relations,
he does not have intercourse with (girls) who have a husband,
nor whose use involves punishments,
nor even with those adorned with the garlands of betrothal.

If this kind of bodily conduct is followed, revered sir,
unskilled states of mind decrease,

skilled states of mind grow much.

When the Lord said:

'I, monks, say that bodily conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in bodily conduct,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, monks, say that vocal conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in vocal conduct.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of vocal conduct is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of vocal conduct is not to be followed.

Revered sir, if a certain kind of vocal conduct is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of vocal conduct is to be followed.

And what kind of vocal conduct, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

As to this, revered sir,
someone is of lying speech;
when he is cited and questioned as a witness before a council or a company or amid his relations
or amid a guild
or a royal family,
and is told:

'Now, my good man,
say what you know,'

although he does not know, he says,
'I know,'
and although he knows, he says,
'I do not know ;
although he has not seen, he says,
'I saw,'
and although he has seen, he says,
'I did not see.'

Thus his speech becomes intentional lying
either for his own sake
or for that of another
or for the sake of some material gain or other.

And he is a slanderer;
having heard something at one place,
he makes it known elsewhere
for causing variance among those people;
or having heard something elsewhere
he makes it known among these people for causing variance among them.

In this way he sows discord among those who were in harmony or foments those who are at variance.

Discord is his pleasure,
his delight,
his joy,
the motive of his speech.

And he is one of harsh speech.

Whatever speech is rough,
hard,
severe on others,
abusive of others,
bordering on wrath,
not conducive to concentration,
such speech does he utter.

And he is a frivolous chatterer,
one who speaks at a wrong time,
not in accordance with fact,
one who speaks about what is not the goal,
about non-dhamma,
about non-discipline.

He utters speech that is not [97] worth treasuring;
owing to its being at the wrong time
it is incongruous,
has no purpose,
is not connected with the goal.

If this kind of vocal conduct is followed, revered sir,
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

And what kind of vocal conduct, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

As to this, revered sir, someone,
abandoning lying speech
is restrained from lying speech.

When he is cited and questioned as a witness before a council or company
or amid his relations
or amid a guild
or a royal family,
and is told:

'Now, my good man,
say what you know,'

if he does not know he says,
'I do not know,'
and if he knows he says,
'I know ;
if he has not seen, he says,
'I did not see,'
and if he has seen, he says,
'I saw.'

Thus his speech is not intentional lying
either for his own sake
or for that of another
or for the sake of some material gain or other.

Abandoning slanderous speech,
he is restrained from slanderous speech.

Having heard something at one place,
he is not one to repeat it elsewhere
for causing variance among those people;
or having heard something elsewhere

he is not one to repeat it among these people for causing variance among them.

In this way
he is a reconciler of those who are at variance
and one who combines those who are friends.

Concord is his pleasure,
his delight,
his joy,
the motive of his speech.

Abandoning harsh speech,
he is restrained from harsh speech.

Whatever speech is gentle,
pleasing to the ear,
affectionate,
going to the heart,
urbane,
pleasant to the manyfolk,
agreeable to the manyfolk -
such speech does he utter.

Abandoning frivolous chatter,
he is restrained from frivolous chatter.

He is one that speaks at a right time,
in accordance with fact,
about the goal,
about dhamma,
about discipline.

He utters speech that is worth treasuring,
with opportune similes,
purposeful,
connected with the goal.

If this kind of vocal conduct is followed, revered sir,
unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much.

When the Lord said:

'I, monks, say that vocal conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in vocal conduct,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, monks, say that mental conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in mental conduct.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of mental conduct is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much, [98]
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of mental conduct is not to be followed.

Revered sir, if a certain kind of mental conduct is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of mental conduct is to be followed.

And what kind of mental conduct, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

As to this, revered sir,
someone is covetous;
he covets that which is the property of another,
thinking:

'O might that which is the other's be mine';

he is malevolent in thought,
corrupt in mind and purpose,
and thinks:

'Let these beings be killed or slaughtered
or annihilated
or destroyed,
or may they not exist at all.'

If this kind of mental conduct is followed, revered sir,
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

And what kind of mental conduct, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

As to this, revered sir,
someone is not covetous;
he does not covet that which is the property of another,
thinking:

'O might that which is the other's be mine';

he is not malevolent in thought,
not corrupt in mind and purpose,
but thinks:

'Let these beings,
free from enmity,
peaceable,
secure and happy,
look after self.'

If this kind of mental conduct is followed, revered sir,
unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much.

When the Lord said:

'And I, monks, say that mental conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in mental conduct,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, monks, say that the arising of thought is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the arising of thought.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of arising of thought is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of arising of thought is not to be followed.

Revered sir, if a certain kind of arising of thought is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,

skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of arising of thought is to be followed.

And what kind of arising of thought, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

As to this, revered sir,
someone is covetous
and lives with his thought given over to covetousness;
he is malevolent
and lives with his thought given over to malevolence;
he is harmful
and lives with his thought given over to harmfulness.

If this kind of arising of thought is followed, revered sir,
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

[99] And what kind of arising of thought, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

As to this, revered sir,
someone is not covetous
and does not live with his thought given over to covetousness;
he is not malevolent
and does not live with his thought given over to malevolence;
he is not harmful
and does not live with his thought given over to harmfulness.

If this kind of arising of thought is followed, revered sir,
unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much.

When the Lord said:

'I, monks, say that the arising of thought is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the arising of thought,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, monks, say that the assumption of perception is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of perception.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of assumption of perception is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of assumption of perception is not to be followed.

Revered sir, if a certain kind of assumption of perception is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of assumption of perception is to be followed.

And what kind of assumption of perception, reverend sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

As to this, reverend sir,
someone is covetous
and lives with his perception given over to covetousness;

he is malevolent
and lives with his perception given over to malevolence;
he is harmful
and lives with his perception given over to harmfulness.

If this kind of assumption of perception is followed, revered sir,
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

And what kind of assumption of perception, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

As to this, revered sir,
someone is not covetous
and does not live with his perception given over to covetousness;
he is not malevolent
and does not live with his perception given over to malevolence;
he is not harmful
and does not live with his perception given over to harmfulness.

If this kind of assumption of perception is followed, revered sir,
unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much.

When the Lord said:

'I, monks, say that the assumption of perception is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of perception,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, monks, say that the assumption of views is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of views.'

[100] This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of assumption of views is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of assumption of views is not to be followed.

Revered sir, if a certain kind of assumption of views is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of assumption of views is to be followed.

And what kind of assumption of views, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

And what kind of assumption of views, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

As to this, revered sir, someone is of this view:

'There is no (result of) gift,<sup>3</sup>
there is no (result of) offering,
there is no (result of) sacrifice;
there is no fruit or ripening of deeds
well done or ill done;
there is not this world,

there is not a world beyond;
there is no (benefit from serving) mother,
no (benefit from serving) father;
there are no spontaneously arising beings;
there are not in the world
recluses and brahmans who are faring rightly,
proceeding rightly,
and who proclaim this world
and the world beyond,
having realised them by their own super-knowledge.'

If this kind of assumption of views is followed, revered sir,
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

And what kind of assumption of views, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

As to this, revered sir,
someone is of this view:

'There is (result of) gift,
there is (result of) offering,
there is (result of) sacrifice;
there is fruit or ripening of deeds
well done or ill done;
there is this world,
there is a world beyond;
there is (benefit from serving) mother, (benefit from serving) father;
there are spontaneously arising beings;
there are in the world
recluses and brahmans who are faring rightly,
proceeding rightly,

and who proclaim this world
and the world beyond,
having realised them by their own super-knowledge.'

When the Lord said:

'I, monks, say that the assumption of views is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of views,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, monks, say that the assumption of individuality is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of individuality.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of assumption of individuality is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of assumption of individuality is not to be followed.

Revered sir, if a certain kind of assumption of individuality is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of assumption of individuality is to be followed.

And what kind of assumption of individuality, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

And what kind of assumption of individuality, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

If there is assumption of an individuality that is harmful,<sup>4</sup> revered sir, because of the uncompleted state of production,<sup>5</sup>
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

And what kind of assumption of individuality, revered sir,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

If there is assumption of an individuality that is harmless,<sup>6</sup> revered sir, because of the completed state of production,
unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much.

When the Lord said:

'I, monks, say that the assumption of individuality is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of individuality,'
it was said in reference to this.

I, revered sir, thus understand this
to be the meaning in full
of what was spoken of by the Lord in brief,
but of which the meaning was not explained in full."

"It is good, Sāriputta,
it is good.

It is good that you, Sāriputta, thus understand this to be the meaning in full of what was spoken of by me in brief, but of which the meaning was not explained in full.

---

'I, monks, say that bodily conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in bodily conduct.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of bodily conduct is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of bodily conduct is not to be followed.

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of bodily conduct is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of bodily conduct is to be followed.

And what kind of bodily conduct, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

As to this, Sāriputta,
someone makes onslaught on creatures,
he is cruel,

bloody-handed,
intent on injuring and killing,
without mercy to living creatures.

He is a taker of what is not given;
whatever property of another
in village or jungle
is not given to him
he takes by theft.

He is a wrong-goer in regard to pleasures of the senses;
he has intercourse with (girls) protected by the mother,
he has intercourse with (girls) protected by the father,
he has intercourse with (girls) protected by the parents,
he has intercourse with (girls) protected by a brother,
he has intercourse with (girls) protected by a sister,
he has intercourse with (girls) protected by relations,
he has intercourse with (girls) who have a husband,
and whose use involves punishments,
and even with those adorned with the garlands of betrothal.

If this kind of bodily conduct is followed, Sāriputta,
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

And what kind of bodily conduct, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

As to this, Sāriputta,
someone, abandoning onslaught on creatures,
is restrained from onslaught on creatures;
the stick laid aside,
the sword laid aside,
he lives scrupulous,

merciful,
kindly and compassionate
to all living creatures.

Abandoning taking what is not given,
he is restrained from taking what is not given;
he does not take by theft
any property of another
in village or jungle
that is not given to him.

Abandoning wrong-going in regard to pleasures of the senses,
he is restrained from wrong-doing in regard to pleasures of the senses;
he does not have intercourse with (girls) protected by the mother,
he does not have intercourse with (girls) protected by the father,
he does not have intercourse with (girls) protected by the parents,
he does not have intercourse with (girls) protected by a brother,
he does not have intercourse with (girls) protected by a sister,
he does not have intercourse with (girls) protected by relations,
he does not have intercourse with (girls) who have a husband,
nor whose use involves punishments,
nor even with those adorned with the garlands of betrothal.

If this kind of bodily conduct is followed, Sāriputta,
unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much.

When I said:

'I, monks, say that bodily conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in bodily conduct,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, monks, say that vocal conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in vocal conduct.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of vocal conduct is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of vocal conduct is not to be followed.

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of vocal conduct is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of vocal conduct is to be followed.

And what kind of vocal conduct, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

As to this, Sāriputta,
someone is of lying speech;
when he is cited and questioned as a witness
before a council or a company
or amid his relations
or amid a guild
or a royal family,
and is told:

'Now, my good man,
say what you know.'

although he does not know, he says,
'I know,'
and although he knows, he says,
'I do not know ;
although he has not seen, he says,
'I saw,'
and although he has seen, he says,
'I did not see.'

Thus his speech becomes intentional lying
either for his own sake
or for that of another
or for the sake of some material gain or other.

And he is a slanderer;
having heard something at one place,
he makes it known elsewhere
for causing variance among those people;
or having heard something elsewhere
he makes it known among these people
for causing variance among them.

In this way he sows discord among those who were in harmony
or foments those who are at variance.

Discord is his pleasure,
his delight,
his joy,
the motive of his speech.

And he is one of harsh speech.

Whatever speech is rough,
hard,
severe on others,
abusive of others,
bordering on wrath,

not conducive to concentration,
such speech does he utter.

And he is a frivolous chatterer,
one who speaks at a wrong time,
not in accordance with fact,
one who speaks about what is not the goal,
about non-dhamma,
about non-discipline.

He utters speech that is not worth treasuring;
owing to its being at the wrong time
it is incongruous,
has no purpose,
is not connected with the goal.

If this kind of vocal conduct is followed, Sāriputta,
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

And what kind of vocal conduct, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

As to this, Sāriputta, someone,
abandoning lying speech
is restrained from lying speech.

When he is cited and questioned as a witness before a council
or company
or amid his relations
or amid a guild
or a royal family,
and is told:

'Now, my good man,
say what you know,'

if he does not know he says,
'I do not know,'
and if he knows he says,
'I know ;
if he has not seen, he says,
'I did not see,'
and if he has seen, he says,
'I saw.'

Thus his speech is not intentional lying
either for his own sake
or for that of another
or for the sake of some material gain or other.

Abandoning slanderous speech,
he is restrained from slanderous speech.

Having heard something at one place,
he is not one to repeat it elsewhere
for causing variance among those people;
or having heard something elsewhere
he is not one to repeat it among these people for causing variance among them.

In this way
he is a reconciler of those who are at variance
and one who combines those who are friends.

Concord is his pleasure,
his delight,
his joy,
the motive of his speech.

Abandoning harsh speech,
he is restrained from harsh speech.

Whatever speech is gentle,
pleasing to the ear,
affectionate,
going to the heart,
urbane,
pleasant to the manyfolk,
agreeable to the manyfolk -
such speech does he utter.

Abandoning frivolous chatter,
he is restrained from frivolous chatter.

He is one that speaks at a right time,
in accordance with fact,
about the goal,
about dhamma,
about discipline.

He utters speech that is worth treasuring,
with opportune similes,
purposeful,
connected with the goal.

If this kind of vocal conduct is followed, Sāriputta,
unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much.

When I said:

'I, monks, say that vocal conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in vocal conduct,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, monks, say that mental conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in mental conduct.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of mental conduct is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of mental conduct is not to be followed.

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of mental conduct is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of mental conduct is to be followed.

And what kind of mental conduct, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

As to this, Sāriputta,
someone is covetous;
he covets that which is the property of another,
thinking:

'O might that which is the other's be mine';

he is malevolent in thought,
corrupt in mind and purpose,
and thinks:

'Let these beings be killed
or slaughtered
or annihilated
or destroyed,
or may they not exist at all.'

If this kind of mental conduct is followed, Sāriputta,
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

And what kind of mental conduct, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

As to this, Sāriputta,
someone is not covetous;
he does not covet that which is the property of another,
thinking:

'O might that which is the other's be mine';

he is not malevolent in thought,
not corrupt in mind and purpose,
but thinks:

'Let these beings,
free from enmity,
peaceable,
secure and happy,
look after self.'

If this kind of mental conduct is followed, Sāriputta,
unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much.

When I said:

'And I, monks, say that mental conduct is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in mental conduct,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, monks, say that the arising of thought is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the arising of thought.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of arising of thought is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of arising of thought is not to be followed.

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of arising of thought is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of arising of thought is to be followed.

And what kind of arising of thought, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

As to this, Sāriputta,
someone is covetous
and lives with his thought given over to covetousness;
he is malevolent
and lives with his thought given over to malevolence;

he is harmful
and lives with his thought given over to harmfulness.

If this kind of arising of thought is followed, Sāriputta,
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

And what kind of arising of thought, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

As to this, Sāriputta,
someone is not covetous
and does not live with his thought given over to covetousness;
he is not malevolent
and does not live with his thought given over to malevolence;
he is not harmful
and does not live with his thought given over to harmfulness.

If this kind of arising of thought is followed, Sāriputta,
unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much.

When I said:

I, monks, say that the arising of thought is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the arising of thought,
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, monks, say that the assumption of perception is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed

and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of perception.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of assumption of perception is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of assumption of perception is not to be followed.

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of assumption of perception is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of assumption of perception is to be followed.

And what kind of assumption of perception, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

As to this, Sāriputta,
someone is covetous
and lives with his perception given over to covetousness;
he is malevolent
and lives with his perception given over to malevolence;
he is harmful
and lives with his perception given over to harmfulness.

If this kind of assumption of perception is followed, Sāriputta,
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

And what kind of assumption of perception, Sāriputta,
does a man follow

that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

As to this, Sāriputta,
someone is not covetous
and does not live with his perception given over to covetousness;
he is not malevolent
and does not live with his perception given over to malevolence;
he is not harmful
and does not live with his perception given over to harmfulness.

If this kind of assumption of perception is followed, Sāriputta,
unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much.

When I said:

'I, monks, say that the assumption of perception is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of perception,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, monks, say that the assumption of views is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of views.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of assumption of views is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,

skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of assumption of views is not to be followed.

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of assumption of views is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of assumption of views is to be followed.

And what kind of assumption of views, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

And what kind of assumption of views, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

As to this, Sāriputta, someone is of this view:

'There is no (result of) gift,
there is no (result of) offering,
there is no (result of) sacrifice;
there is no fruit or ripening of deeds
well done or ill done;
there is not this world,
there is not a world beyond;
there is no (benefit from serving) mother,
no (benefit from serving) father;
there are no spontaneously arising beings;
there are not in the world
recluses and brahmans who are faring rightly,
proceeding rightly,
and who proclaim this world
and the world beyond,
having realised them by their own super-knowledge.'

If this kind of assumption of views is followed, Sāriputta,
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

And what kind of assumption of views, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

As to this, Sāriputta,
someone is of this view:

'There is (result of) gift,
there is (result of) offering,
there is (result of) sacrifice;
there is fruit or ripening of deeds
well done or ill done;
there is this world,
there is a world beyond;
there is (benefit from serving) mother, (benefit from serving) father;
there are spontaneously arising beings;
there are in the world
recluses and brahmans who are faring rightly,
proceeding rightly,
and who proclaim this world
and the world beyond,
having realised them by their own super-knowledge.'

When I said:

'I, monks, say that the assumption of views is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of views,
it was said in reference to this.'

■

'I, monks, say that the assumption of individuality is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of individuality.

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of assumption of individuality is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of assumption of individuality is not to be followed.

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of assumption of individuality is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of assumption of individuality is to be followed.

And what kind of assumption of individuality, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

And what kind of assumption of individuality, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind grow much in him,
skilled states of mind decrease?

If there is assumption of an individuality that is harmful, Sāriputta, because of the uncompleted state of production,
unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease.

And what kind of assumption of individuality, Sāriputta,
does a man follow
that unskilled states of mind decrease in him,
skilled states of mind grow much?

If there is assumption of an individuality that is harmless, Sāriputta,
because of the completed state of production,
unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much.

When I said:

'I, monks, say that the assumption of individuality is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed;
and there is this disparity in the assumption of individuality,'
it was said in reference to this.

Thus, Sāriputta, should be understood in full the meaning of what was spoken of by me in brief."

§

[102] "And I, Sāriputta, say that material shape cognisable through the eye is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.

And I, Sāriputta, say that sound cognisable through the ear is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.

And I, Sāriputta, say that smell cognisable through the nose is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed."

And I, Sāriputta, say that taste cognisable through the tongue is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed."

And I, Sāriputta, say that tactile objects cognisable through the body are of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.

And I, Sāriputta, say that mental states cognisable through the mind are of
two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed."

---

When this had been said, the venerable Sāriputta spoke thus to the Lord:

"I, revered sir, thus understand this
to be the meaning in full
of what was spoken of by the Lord in brief,
but of which the meaning was not explained in full:

'I, Sāriputta, say that material shape cognisable through the eye is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain material shape cognisable through the eye is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of material shape cognisable through the eye is not to be followed.

But if, revered sir, a certain kind of material shape cognisable through the eye is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of material shape cognisable through the eye is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that material shape cognisable through the eye is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that sound cognisable through the ear is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain sound cognisable through the ear is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of sound cognisable through the ear is not to be followed.

But if, revered sir, a certain kind of sound cognisable through the ear is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of sound cognisable through the ear is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that sound cognisable through the ear is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that smell cognisable through the nose is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain smell cognisable through the nose is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of smell cognisable through the nose is not to be followed.

But if, revered sir, a certain kind of smell cognisable through the nose is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of smell cognisable through the nose is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that smell cognisable through the nose is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that taste cognisable through the tongue is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain taste cognisable through the tongue is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of taste cognisable through the tongue is not to be followed.

But if, revered sir, a certain kind of taste cognisable through the tongue is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of taste cognisable through the tongue is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that taste cognisable through the tongue is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that tactile objects cognisable through the body are of two kinds,

one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain tactile object cognisable through the body is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of tactile object cognisable through the body is not to be followed.

But if, revered sir, a certain kind of tactile object cognisable through the body is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of tactile object cognisable through the body is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that tactile objects cognisable through the body are of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that mental states cognisable through the mind are of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain mental state cognisable through the mind is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease, this kind of mental state cognisable through the mind is not to be followed.

But if, revered sir, a certain kind of mental state cognisable through the mind is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of mental state cognisable through the mind is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that mental states cognisable through the mind are of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed,'
it was said in reference to this.

I, revered sir, thus understand this
to be the meaning in full
of what was spoken of by the Lord in brief,
but of which the meaning was not explained in full."

"It is good, Sāriputta,
it is good.

It is good that you, Sāriputta, thus understand this
to be the meaning in full
of what was spoken of by me in brief, but of which the meaning was not explained in full."

---

"I, Sāriputta, say that material shape cognisable through the eye is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain material shape cognisable through the eye is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of material shape cognisable through the eye is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of material shape cognisable through the eye is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of material shape cognisable through the eye is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that material shape cognisable through the eye is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that sound cognisable through the ear is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain sound cognisable through the ear is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of sound cognisable through the ear is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of sound cognisable through the ear is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of sound cognisable through the ear is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that sound cognisable through the ear is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that smell cognisable through the nose is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain smell cognisable through the nose is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of smell cognisable through the nose is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of smell cognisable through the nose is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,

skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of smell cognisable through the nose is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that smell cognisable through the nose is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that taste cognisable through the tongue is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain taste cognisable through the tongue is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of taste cognisable through the tongue is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of taste cognisable through the tongue is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of taste cognisable through the tongue is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that taste cognisable through the tongue is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that tactile objects cognisable through the body are of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain tactile object cognisable through the body is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of tactile object cognisable through the body is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of tactile object cognisable through the body is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of tactile object cognisable through the body is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that tactile objects cognisable through the body are of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that mental states cognisable through the mind are of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain mental state cognisable through the mind is followed and unskilled states of mind grow much, skilled states of mind decrease, this kind of mental state cognisable through the mind is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of mental state cognisable through the mind is followed and unskilled states of mind decrease, skilled states of mind grow much, this kind of mental state cognisable through the mind is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that mental states cognisable through the mind are of two kinds, one of which is to be followed and the other which is not to be followed,' it was said in reference to this.

Thus, Sāriputta, should [103] be understood in full the meaning of what was spoken of by me in brief."

§

"And I, Sāriputta, say that robe-material is of two kinds, one of which is to be followed and the other which is not to be followed.

I, Sāriputta, say that almsfood is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.

I, Sāriputta, say that lodgings are of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.

I, Sāriputta, say that a village is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.

I, Sāriputta, say that a market town is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.

I, Sāriputta, say that a town is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.

I, Sāriputta, say that a country district is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.

I, Sāriputta, say that a person is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed."

---

When this had been said, the venerable Sāriputta
spoke thus to the Lord:

"I, revered sir, thus understand this
to be the meaning in full
of what was spoken of by the Lord in brief,
but of which the meaning was not explained in full:

'I, Sāriputta, say that robe-material is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of robe-material is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of robe-material is not to be followed.

But if, Revered sir, a certain kind of robe-material is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of robe-material is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that robe-material is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed,'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that almsfood is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of almsfood is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of almsfood is not to be followed.

But if, Revered sir, a certain kind of almsfood is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of almsfood is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that almsfood is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that lodgings are of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of lodging is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of lodging is not to be followed.

But if, Revered sir, a certain kind of lodging is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,

skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of lodging is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that lodgings are of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that a village is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of village is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of village is not to be followed.

But if, Revered sir, a certain kind of village is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of village is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that a village is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that a market town is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of market town is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of market town is not to be followed.

But if, Revered sir, a certain kind of market town is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of market town is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that a market town is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that a town is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of town is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of town is not to be followed.

But if, Revered sir, a certain kind of town is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of town is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that a town is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that a country district is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of country district is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of country district is not to be followed.

But if, Revered sir, a certain kind of country district is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of country district is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that a country district is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that a person is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by the Lord.

In reference to what was it said?

Revered sir, if a certain kind of person is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of person is not to be followed.

But if, Revered sir, a certain kind of person is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of person is to be followed.

When the Lord said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that a person is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed'
it was said in reference to this.

I, reverend sir, thus understand this
to be the meaning in full

of what was spoken of by the Lord in brief,
but of which the meaning was not explained in full."

"It is good, Sāriputta,
it is good.

It is good that you, Sāriputta, thus understand this
to be the meaning in full
of what was spoken of by me in brief, but of which the meaning was not explained in full.

---

'I, Sāriputta, say that robe-material is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of robe-material is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of robe-material is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of robe-material is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of robe-material is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that robe-material is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that almsfood is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of almsfood is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of almsfood is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of almsfood is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of almsfood is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that almsfood is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that lodgings are of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of lodging is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of lodging is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of lodging is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of lodging is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that lodgings are of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that a village is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of village is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of village is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of village is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of village is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that a village is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that a market town is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of market town is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of market town is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of market town is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of market town is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that a market town is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed

and the other which is not to be followed'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that a town is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of town is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of town is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of town is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of town is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that a town is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that a country district is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of country district is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of country district is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of country district is followed
and unskilled states of mind decrease,
skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of country district is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that a country district is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed'
it was said in reference to this.

■

'I, Sāriputta, say that a person is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed.'

This was said by me.

In reference to what was it said?

Sāriputta, if a certain kind of person is followed
and unskilled states of mind grow much,
skilled states of mind decrease,
this kind of person is not to be followed.

But if, Sāriputta, a certain kind of person is followed
and unskilled states of [104] mind decrease,

skilled states of mind grow much,
this kind of person is to be followed.

When I said:

'I, Sāriputta, say that a person is of two kinds,
one of which is to be followed
and the other which is not to be followed'
it was said in reference to this.

Thus, Sāriputta, should be understood to be the meaning in full
of what was spoken of by me in brief, but of which the meaning was not explained in full.

---

And, Sāriputta, if all nobles could thus understand the meaning in full of this that was spoken of by me in brief, for a long time it would be for their welfare and happiness.

And, Sāriputta, if all brahmans could thus understand the meaning in full
of this that was spoken of by me in brief,
for a long time it would be for their welfare and happiness.

And, Sāriputta, if all merchants could thus understand the meaning in full
of this that was spoken of by me in brief,
for a long time it would be for their welfare and happiness.

And, Sāriputta, if all workers could thus understand the meaning in full
of this that was spoken of by me in brief,
for a long time it would be for their welfare and happiness.

And, Sāriputta, if the world
with the devas,

with the Māras and Brahmās, and if the generations of recluses and brahmans, devas and men
could thus understand the meaning in full
of this that was spoken of by me in brief,
for a long time it would be for their welfare and happiness."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the venerable Sāriputta rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on What is To Be Followed and What is Not To Be Followed:
The Fourth

---

<sup>1</sup> attabhāvapaṭilābha, as at S. ii. 256, iii. 144; A. ii. 159; Vin. ii. 185; see P.T.C. for further references.

<sup>2</sup> For a great deal of the following cf. M. i. 286 ff.

<sup>3</sup> As at M. iii. 22, etc.

<sup>4</sup> MA. iv. 100 equates savyāpajjha with sadukkha, and avyāpajjha with adukkha.

<sup>5</sup> abhinibbattayato (v.l. abhinibbattaasa yato) apariniṭṭhitabhāvāya. MA. iv. 100 says that in this individuality an average man is unable to bring becoming to completion; so, from the time of his re-linking, paṭisandhi, unskilled states grow, skilled ones decline, and he produces, abhinibbatteti, an individuality attended by dukkha.

<sup>6</sup> Said of the four types of persons: stream-attainers and so on.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
2. Anupada Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
2. The Division of the Uninterrupted

115. Discourse on the Manifold Elements

Bahu-Dhātuka Sutta

---

Thus I have heard:<sup>1</sup>

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Whatever fears arise, monks,
all arise for the fool,
not the wise man.

Whatever troubles<sup>2</sup> arise,
all arise for the fool,
not the wise man.

Whatever misfortunes arise,
all arise for the fool,
not the wise man.

Monks, as a spark of fire<sup>3</sup> from a house thatched with rushes or a house thatched with grass sets fire to gabled houses that [105] are smeared inside and out, protected from the wind, with bolts that are fastened, windows that are closed,<sup>4</sup> even so, monks, whatever fears arise, monks,
all arise for the fool,
not the wise man;
whatever troubles arise,
all arise for the fool,
not the wise man;
whatever misfortunes arise,
all arise for the fool,
not the wise man.

Thus, monks, it is the fool who is beset by fear, the wise man is not beset by fear;
the fool has trouble,
the wise man does not have trouble;
the fool has misfortune,
the wise man does not have misfortune.

Monks, there is not fear, trouble,

misfortune
for the wise man.

Wherefore, monks, thinking,

'Investigating,
we will become wise,' this is how you must train yourselves, monks."

---

When this had been said,
the venerable Ānanda, spoke thus to the Lord:

"What is the stage at which it suffices to say, revered sir:

'Investigating, the monk is wise'?"

"Ānanda, as soon as a monk is skilled in the elements and skilled in the (sense-)fields and skilled in conditioned genesis and skilled in the possible and the impossible,<sup>5</sup> it is at this stage, Ānanda,
that it suffices to say,
'Investigating, the monk is wise.'"

---

"But, revered sir, at what stage
does it suffice to say,

'The monk is skilled in the elements'?"

"There are these eighteen elements,<sup>6</sup> Ānanda:

the element of eye,
the element of material shape, the element of visual consciousness;

the element of ear,
the element of sound,
the element of auditory consciousness;

the element of nose,
the element of smell,
the element of olfactory consciousness;

the element of tongue,
the element of taste,
the element of gustatory consciousness;

the element of body,
the element of touch,
the element of bodily consciousness;

the element of mind,
the element of mental states,
the element of mental consciousness.

When, Ānanda, he knows and sees these eighteen elements, it is at this stage
that it suffices to say,
'The monk is skilled in the elements.'

■

"Might there be another way also, revered sir, according to which it suffices to say,

'The monk is skilled in the elements'?"

"There might be, Ānanda.

There are these six elements, Ānanda:

the element of extension,
the element of cohesion,
the element of radiation,
the element of mobility,<sup>7</sup> the element of space,
the element of consciousness.<sup>8</sup>

When, Ānanda, he knows and sees [106] these six elements,
it is at this stage
that it suffices to say,
'The monk is skilled in the elements.'

■

"Might there be another way also, revered sir,
according to which it suffices to say,

'The monk is skilled in the elements'?"

"There might be, Ānanda.

There are these six elements, Ānanda:

the element of happiness,
the element of anguish,
the element of gladness,
the element of sorrowing,
the element of equanimity, the element of Ignorance.<sup>9</sup>

When, Ānanda, he knows and sees these six elements,
it is at this stage
that it suffices to say,
'The monk is skilled in the elements.'

■

"Might there be another way also, revered sir,
according to which it suffices to say,

'The monk is skilled in the elements'?"

"There might be, Ānanda.

There are these six elements, Ānanda:

the element of sensuous pleasures,
the element of renunciation, the element of malice,
the element of non-malice,
the element of harming, the element of non-harming.<sup>10</sup>

When, Ānanda, he knows and sees these six elements,
it is at this stage
that it suffices to say,
'The monk is skilled in the elements.'

■

"Might there be another way also, revered sir,
according to which it suffices to say,

'The monk is skilled in the elements'?"

"There might be, Ānanda.

There are these three elements, Ānanda:

the element of sensuous pleasures,
the element of fine-materiality, the element of non-materiality.<sup>11</sup>

When, Ānanda, he knows and sees these three elements,
it is at this stage
that it suffices to say,
'The monk is skilled in the elements.'

■

"Might there be another way, revered sir, according to which it suffices to say,

'The monk is skilled in the elements'?"

"There might be, Ānanda.

There are these two elements, Ānanda:

the element that is constructed<sup>12</sup> and the element that is unconstructed.

When, Ānanda, he knows and sees these two elements,
it is at this stage
that it suffices to say,
'The monk is skilled in the elements.'

---

"At what stage, revered sir,
does it suffice to say,

'The monk is skilled in the (sense-)fields'?"

"These six (sense-)fields, Ānanda, are internal-external:

the eye [107] as well as material shape;
the ear as well as sound;
the nose as well as smell;
the tongue as well as taste;
the body as well as touch;
the mind as well as mental states.

When, Ānanda, he knows and sees these six internal-external (sense-)fields,
it is at this stage
that it suffices to say,
'The monk is skilled in the (sense-)fields.'

---

"And at what stage, revered sir,
does it suffice to say,

'The monk is skilled in conditioned genesis'?"

"As to this, Ānanda, a monk knows thus:

'If this is,
that comes to be;
from the arising of this,
that arises;

if this is not,
that does not come to be;

from the stopping of this,
that is stopped.

That is to say:

Conditioned by ignorance are the (karma-)formations;<sup>13</sup> conditioned by the (karma-)formations is consciousness; conditioned by consciousness is name-and-shape; conditioned by name-and-shape is the field of the six (senses); conditioned by the field of the six (senses) is (sensory) impingement;
conditioned by (sensory) impingement is feeling;
conditioned by feeling is craving;
conditioned by craving is grasping;
conditioned by grasping is becoming;
conditioned by becoming is birth; conditioned by birth there come into being old age and dying,
grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair.

Thus is the origin
of this whole mass of anguish.

But from the utter fading away and stopping of this very ignorance is the stopping of the (karma-)formations; from the stopping of the (karma-)formations is the stopping of consciousness; from the stopping of consciousness is the stopping of name-and-shape; from the stopping of name-and-shape is the stopping of the field of the six (senses); from the stopping of the field of the six (senses)

is the stopping of (sensory) impingement; from the stopping of (sensory) impingement is the stopping of feeling; from the stopping of feeling is the stopping of craving; from the stopping of craving is the stopping of grasping; from the stopping of grasping is the stopping of becoming;
from the stopping of becoming is the stopping of birth;
from the stopping of birth,
old age and dying,
grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair
are stopped.

Thus is the stopping
of this whole mass of anguish.'

It is at that stage, Ānanda,
that it suffices to say,
'The monk is skilled in conditioned genesis.'

■

"And at what stage, revered sir,
does it suffice to say,

'The monk is skilled in the possible and the impossible'?"

"As to this, Ānanda, a monk comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass<sup>14</sup>
that a man possessed of (right) view should [108] go to any construction<sup>15</sup> as permanent -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
when an average man
might go to some construction
as permanent -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that a man possessed of (right) view should go to any construction as happy -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
when an average man
might go to some construction as happy -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that a man possessed of (right) view should go to any dhamma as self -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
when an average man
might go to some dhamma
as self -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that a man possessed of (right) view should deprive his mother of life -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
when an average man might deprive his mother of life -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that a man possessed of (right) view should deprive his father of life -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
when an average man might deprive his father of life -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that a man possessed of (right) view should deprive one perfected of life -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
when an average man might deprive one perfected of life -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that a man possessed of (right) view should, with murderous intent, draw a Tathāgata's blood -

this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
when an average man
might with murderous intent, draw a Tathāgata's blood -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that a man possessed of (right) view should cause a schism in the Order -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
when an average man might cause a schism in the Order -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that a man possessed of (right) view

might proclaim another Teacher -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
when an average man
might proclaim another Teacher -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends: [109]

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that in one world-system
two perfected ones who are Fully Self-Awakened Ones should arise simultaneously -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
that in one world-system
one perfected one who is a Fully Self-Awakened Ones might arise -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass

that in one world-system
two wheel-turning kings should arise simultaneously -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
that in one world-system one wheel-turning king
might arise -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that a woman who is a perfected one could be a Fully Self-Awakened One -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs when a man who is a perfected one could be a Fully Self-Awakened One -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass

that a woman should be a wheel-turning king -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs when a man could be a wheel-turning king -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that a woman could be a Sakka -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs when a man could be a Sakka -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that a woman could be a Māra -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs when a man could be a Māra -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that a woman could be a Brahmā -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs when a man could be a Brahmā -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that from wrong conduct in body - there could result a fruit that was agreeable,
pleasant,
liked -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs when from wrong conduct in body there might result a fruit that was disagreeable, unpleasant,
not liked -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that from wrong conduct in speech - there could result a fruit that was agreeable,
pleasant,
liked -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs when from wrong conduct in speech there might result a fruit that was disagreeable,
unpleasant,
not liked -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that from wrong conduct in thought - there could result a fruit that was agreeable,
pleasant,
liked -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs when from wrong conduct in thought there might result a fruit that was disagreeable,
unpleasant,

not liked -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that from right conduct in body - there could result a fruit that was disagreeable,
unpleasant,
not liked -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs when from right conduct in body there might result a fruit that was agreeable,
pleasant,
liked -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that from right conduct in speech - there could result a fruit that was disagreeable,
unpleasant,
not liked -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs when from right conduct in speech there might result a fruit that was agreeable,
pleasant,
liked -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that from right conduct in thought - there could result a fruit that was disagreeable,
unpleasant,
not liked -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs when from right conduct in thought there might result a fruit that was agreeable,
pleasant,
liked -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that one who is addicted to wrong conduct in body
should, from that source,
from that condition

arise, on the breaking up of the body after dying, in a good bourn, a heaven world -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
that one who is addicted to wrong conduct in body
should, from that source,
from that condition
arise, on the breaking up of the body after dying,
in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the downfall,
Niraya Hell -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that one who is addicted to wrong conduct in speech
should, from that source,
from that condition
arise, on the breaking up of the body after dying,
in a good bourn,
a heaven world -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
that one who is addicted to wrong conduct in speech
should, from that source,
from that condition

arise, on the breaking up of the body after dying,
in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the downfall,
Niraya Hell -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that one who is addicted to wrong conduct in thought
should, from that source,
from that condition
arise, on the breaking up of the body after dying,
in a good bourn,
a heaven world -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
that one who is addicted to wrong conduct in thought
should, from that source,
from that condition
arise, on the breaking up of the body after dying,
in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the downfall,
Niraya Hell -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that one who is addicted to right conduct in body
should, from that source,
from that condition
arise, on [110] the breaking up of the body after dying,
in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the downfall,
Niraya Hell -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
that one who is addicted to right conduct in body
should, from that source,
from that condition
arise, on the breaking up of the body after dying,
in a good bourn,
a heaven world -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that one who is addicted to right conduct in speech
should, from that source,
from that condition
arise, on the breaking up of the body after dying,
in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the downfall,

Niraya Hell -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
that one who is addicted to right conduct in speech
should, from that source,
from that condition
arise, on the breaking up of the body after dying,
in a good bourn,
a heaven world -
this situation occurs.'

■

He comprehends:

'It is impossible,
it cannot come to pass
that one who is addicted to right conduct in thought
should, from that source,
from that condition
arise, on the breaking up of the body after dying,
in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the downfall,
Niraya Hell -
this situation does not occur.'

He comprehends:

'But this situation occurs
that one who is addicted to right conduct in thought
should, from that source,
from that condition
arise, on the breaking up of the body after dying,

in a good bourn,
a heaven world -
this situation occurs.'

It is at this stage, Ānanda,
that it suffices to say:
'The monk is skilled in the possible and the impossible.'

When this had been said the venerable Ānanda spoke thus to the Lord:

"It is wonderful, revered sir,
it is marvellous, revered sir.

What, revered sir, is the name of this disquisition on dhamma?"

"Wherefore do you, Ānanda, remember this disquisition on dhamma as
'the Manifold Elements', and remember it as
'the Fourfold Circle,<sup>16</sup>
and remember it as
'the Mirror of dhamma',
and remember it as
'the Drum of Deathlessness',
and remember it as
'the Incomparable Victory in the Battle.'"<sup>17</sup>

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the venerable Ānanda rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on the Manifold Elements:
The Fifth

---

<sup>1</sup> As at A. i. 101 to "Wherefore" at end of next paragraph.

<sup>2</sup> upaddavā, distresses; "states of absent-mindedness," C.P.D.; MA. iv. 102, anekaggatākāra.

<sup>3</sup> aggimukka above and at A. i. 101; v.l. -muīta.

<sup>4</sup> See M. i. 76, ii. 8 for this description.

<sup>5</sup> thānāṭṭhāna, the causally possible and causally impossible.

<sup>6</sup> Vbh. 90. On the elements, dhātu, see Vism. 484 ff.

<sup>7</sup> In the text vāyodhātu stands before tejodhātu. I have transposed them above so as to secure the usual sequence.

<sup>8</sup> As at M. iii. 31.

<sup>9</sup> Vbh. 85.

<sup>10</sup> Cf. these six at D. iii. 215, A. iii. 447, S. ii. 151, Vbh. 86.

<sup>11</sup> As at D. iii. 215, Iti. 45.

<sup>12</sup> This pair also at D. iii. 274. The "constructed," saṅkhata, is a synonym for the five khandhā; the "unconstructed" is a synonym for nibbāna, MA. iv. 106. See also Vbh. 72-73, 89, 421.

<sup>13</sup> See M.L.S. i, xxiv; and cf. M. i. 262-264.

<sup>14</sup> As at A. i. 26 ff.

<sup>15</sup> Perhaps meaning here a "construction," a "compounded thing" or a "conditioned thing." See above, p. 106; also M.L.S. i. Intr., p. xxiv f. Saṅkhāra and dhamma just below go together at Dhp. 277-279, the former with anicca and dukkha (sabbe saṅkhārā anicca ... dukkha) and the latter with anatta (sabbe dhammā anattā). As a category, dhamma is wider than

saṅkhāra, for it includes the uncompounded nibbāna. This is anatta, but it is neither impermanent nor painful; on the contrary it is permanent and blissful. Everything else is impermanent and painful as well as being anatta. The force of dhamma in this context and this sense is therefore to imply and include nibbāna.

<sup>16</sup> Referring to the elements, (sense-)fields, conditioned genesis, and the possible and impossible, MA. iv. 126.

<sup>17</sup> Cf. D. i. 46 where Ānanda is also given five titles by which he might remember the disquisition on dhamma (the Brahma-Jāla Suttanta), and where the fifth title is the same as the fifth given above: Ānuttaro Saṅgāmajijayo.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
2. Anupada Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
2. The Division of the Uninterrupted

116. Discourse at Isigili

Isigili Sutta

---

Thus I have heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Rājagaha on Isigili mountain.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Do not you, monks, see this Vebhāra<sup>1</sup> mountain?"

"Yes, revered sir."

[111] "There was another designation, monks, of this Vebhāra mountain, another name.

Do not you, monks, see this Paṇḍava mountain?"

"Yes, revered sir."

"There was another designation, monks, of this Paṇḍava mountain, another name.

Do not you, monks, see this Vepulla mountain?"

"Yes, revered sir."

"There was another designation, monks, of this Vepulla mountain,<sup>2</sup> another name.

Do not you, monks, see this Gijjhakūṭa mountain?"<sup>3</sup>

"Yes, revered sir."

"There was another designation, monks, of this Gijjhakūṭa mountain, another name.

Do not you, monks, see this Isigili mountain?"

"Yes, revered sir."

"This has always been the designation, monks, this always the name of this Isigili mountain.

Once upon a time, monks, five hundred paccekabuddhas<sup>4</sup> dwelt for a long time on this Isigili mountain.

They were seen as they were entering this mountain, but once they had entered they were not seen.

People seeing this, spoke thus;

'This mountain swallows these seers' (isī gilati);<sup>5</sup> so did Isigili receive the very designation Isigili.

I will point out to you, monks,
the names of the paccekabuddhas;
I will relate, monks,
the names of the paccekabuddhas;
I will tell, monks,
the names of the paccekabuddhas.

Listen, attend carefully
and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Aritṭha,<sup>6</sup> monks,
was a paccekabuddha
who lived in this Isigili mountain for a long time.

Uparitṭha<sup>7</sup> monks,
was a paccekabuddha
who lived in this Isigili mountain for a long time.

Tagarasikhin<sup>8</sup> monks,
was a paccekabuddha
who lived in this Isigili mountain for a long time.

Yasassin<sup>9</sup> monks,
was a paccekabuddha
who lived in this Isigili mountain for a long time.

Sudassana<sup>10</sup> monks,
was a paccekabuddha
who lived in this Isigili mountain for a long time.

Piyadassin monks,
was a paccekabuddha
who lived in this Isigili mountain for a long time.

Gandhāra monks,
was a paccekabuddha
who lived in this Isigili mountain for a long time.

Piṇḍola monks,
was a paccekabuddha
who lived in this Isigili mountain for a long time.

[112] Upāsabha monks,
was a paccekabuddha
who lived in this Isigili mountain for a long time.

Nitha monks,
was a paccekabuddha
who lived in this Isigili mountain for a long time.

Tatha monks,
was a paccekabuddha
who lived in this Isigili mountain for a long time.

Sutavā monks,
was a paccekabuddha
who lived in this Isigili mountain for a long time.

Bhāvitatta monks,
was a paccekabuddha
who lived in this Isigili mountain for a long time.

Those essences of beings,<sup>11</sup> unafflicted,<sup>12</sup> without longing, who individually have come to right enlightenment - Listen to me as I am relating the names of these barbless<sup>13</sup> incomparable men:

Ariṭṭha, Upariṭṭha, Tagarasikhin, Yasassin and Sudassana, Piyadassin the enlightened;

Gandhāra, Piṇḍola, and Upāsabha, Nitha, Tatha, Sutavā, Bhāvitatta;

Sumbha, Subha, Methula and Aṭṭhama, Athassumegha, Anigha, Sudāṭha are paccekabuddhas whose conduits for becoming are destroyed; Hiṅgū and Hiṅga of great majesty, the two sages Jālin,<sup>14</sup> and Aṭṭhaka, then Kosala the awakened one, then Subāhu,

Upanemi, this Nemi, this Santacitta, truthful, real, stainless and wise;

Kāḷa, Upakāḷa, Vijita and Jita and Aṅga and Paṅga and Gutijjita;

Passin renounced cleaving to the root of anguish, Aparājita defeated Māra's might;

Satthā, Pavattā, Sarabhaṅga, Lomahaṁsa, Uccaṅgamāya, Asita, Ānāsava, Manomaya, and Bandhumā the cutter away of pride, Tadādhimutta, and Ketumā the stainless;

Ketumbarāga and Mātāṅga, Ariya, then Accuta, Accutagāma, Byāmaka, Sumaṅgala, Dabbila, Supatitṭhito, Asayha, Khemābhirata and Sorata, Durannaya, Saṅgha, and then Ujjaya, and then the sage Sayha of sublime courage;<sup>15</sup>

[113] Ānanda, Nanda, Upananda (making) twelve,<sup>16</sup> Bhāradvāja bearing his last body,

Bodhi, Mahānāma, then too the other Bhāradvāja, hair-crested, beautiful, Tissa, Upatissa, Upasīdarin, the cutters away of the bonds of becoming, and Sīdarin, the cutter away of craving;

The Buddha<sup>17</sup> called Maṅgala, attachment-gone, Usabha who cut away the ensnaring root of ill;

Upaṇīta who attained the peaceful path, Uposatha, Sundara, Saccanāma,

Jeta, Jayanta, Paduma, Uppala and Padumuttara, Rakkhita and Pabbata; Mānatthaddlia, Sobhita, Vītarāga and the Buddha<sup>17</sup> Kaṇha, well freed in mind -

These and others<sup>18</sup> are paccekabuddhas of great majesty, their conduits for becoming destroyed.

Praise all these immeasurable great seers who have attained final nibbāna."

Discourse at Isigili;

The Sixth

---

<sup>1</sup> This and the four following names of mountains are the names of those surrounding Rājagaha; cf. SnA. 382.

<sup>2</sup> See S. ii. 190-193.

<sup>3</sup> This is "Mount Vulture-Peak."

<sup>4</sup> Those who win enlightenment by themselves without the aid of a teacher; but they cannot preach dhamma to others.

<sup>5</sup> MA. iv. 127 says that when these sages returned from their almsround the mountain would open like a huge pair of doors, and when they had entered it they stayed there and were to be seen no more.

<sup>6</sup> These thirteen names are to be found in D.P.P.N., with legends when they exist. I therefore give only a few references.

<sup>7</sup> Thag. 910.

<sup>8</sup> Ud. 50; UdA. 291; S. i. 92; Jā. iii. 299.

<sup>9</sup> Thag. 910.

<sup>10</sup> ThagA. i. 93; Ap. ii. 461.

<sup>11</sup> MA. iv. 129, "having spoken the names of the thirteen paccekabuddhas, now pointing out the names of those others who are the essences of beings ..." Sattasāra, essences of beings, means: who have become the essences of beings, sattānaṃ sārabhūta.

<sup>12</sup> anigha = niddukkha, MA. iv. 129.

<sup>13</sup> visalla; cf. S. i. 180; Sn. 17, 86, 367.

<sup>14</sup> Cūḷa- and Mahā-Jālin, MA. iv. 129.

<sup>15</sup> anomanikkhama; D. iii. 156, MA. iv. 129 read -nikkama, called viriyattā, at MA.

<sup>16</sup> Four Ānandas, four Nandas and four Upanandas, MA. iv. 129.

<sup>17</sup> I.e. paccekabuddha.

<sup>18</sup> Among the five hundred paccekabuddhas, two and three and ten and twelve have the same name such as Ānanda, etc.; these and others are not spoken of separately here, MA. iv. 130.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
2. Anupada Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
2. The Division of the Uninterrupted

117. Discourse Pertaining to the Great Forty

Mahā Cattārīsaka Sutta

---

Thus I have heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattthī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"I will teach you, monks, the ariyan<sup>1</sup> right concentration [114] <sup>2</sup> with the causal associations, <sup>3</sup> with the accompaniments. <sup>4</sup>

Listen to it,
attend carefully
and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"And what, monks, is the ariyan right concentration with the causal associations, with the accompaniments?"

It is right view,
right purpose,
right speech,
right action,
right mode of livelihood,
right endeavour,
right mindfulness.

Whatever one-pointedness of mind, monks, is accompanied by these seven components, this, monks, is called the ariyan right concentration
with the causal associations and the accompaniments.

■

As to this, monks, right view comes first.<sup>5</sup>

And how, monks, does right view come first?

If one comprehends that wrong view is wrong view and comprehends that right view is right view, that is his right view.<sup>6</sup>

And what, monks, is wrong view?

'There is no (result of) gift,<sup>7</sup>
there is no (result of) offering,
there is no (result of) sacrifice;
there is no fruit or ripening of deeds
well done or ill done;
there is not this world,
there is not a world beyond;
there is no (benefit from serving) mother,
no (benefit from serving) father;
there are no spontaneously arising beings;
there are not in the world
recluses and brahmans who are faring rightly,
proceeding rightly,
and who proclaim this world
and the world beyond,
having realised them by their own super-knowledge.'

This, monks, is a wrong view.

And what, monks, is right view?

Now, I, monks, say that right view is twofold.

There is, monks, the right view that has cankers,
that is on the side of merit,
that ripens unto cleaving (to new [115] birth).<sup>8</sup>

There is, monks, the right view that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the Way.

And what, monks, is the right view
that has cankers,

that is on the side of merit,
that ripens unto cleaving (to new birth)?

'There is (result of) gift,
there is (result of) offering,
there is (result of) sacrifice;
there is fruit or ripening of deeds
well done or ill done;
there is this world,
there is a world beyond;
there is (benefit from serving) mother, (benefit from serving) father;
there are spontaneously arising beings;
there are in the world
recluses and brahmans who are faring rightly,
proceeding rightly,
and who proclaim this world
and the world beyond, having realised them by their own super-knowledge.'<sup>9</sup>

This, monks, is a right view
that has cankers,
is on the side of merit,
that ripens unto cleaving
(to new birth).

And what, monks is the right view
that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the Way?

Whatever, monks, is wisdom, the cardinal faculty of wisdom,<sup>10</sup> the power of wisdom,<sup>11</sup> the component of enlightenment that is investigation into things,<sup>12</sup> the right view that is a component of the Way in one who, by developing the ariyan Way,

is of ariyan thought,
cankerless thought,
conversant with the ariyan Way<sup>13</sup> - this, monks, is a right view
that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the Way.

Whoever makes endeavour
for the riddance of wrong view, for the attainment of right view, that is his right endeavour.

Mindful, he gets rid of wrong view; mindful, entering on right view,
he abides in it.

This is his right mindfulness.

Thus these three things circle round and follow after right view,
that is to say:

right view,
right endeavour,
right mindfulness.

■

As to this, monks, right view comes first.

And how, monks, does right view come first?

If one comprehends
that wrong purpose is wrong purpose and comprehends
that right purpose is right purpose, that is his right view.

And what, monks, is wrong purpose?

Purpose for sense-pleasures, purpose for ill-will,
purpose for harming.

This, monks, is wrong purpose.

And what, monks, is right purpose?

Now I, monks, say that right purpose is twofold.

[116]

There is, monks, the right purpose
that has cankers,
is on the side of merit,
and ripens unto cleaving
(to new birth).

There is, monks, the right purpose
that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a factor of the Way.

And what, monks, is the right purpose
that has cankers,
is on the side of merit,
and ripens unto cleaving?

Purpose for renunciation, purpose for non-ill-will,
purpose for non-harming.

This, monks, is right purpose
that has cankers,
is on the side of merit,
and ripens unto cleaving

And what, monks, is the right purpose
that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the Way?

Whatever, monks, is reasoning,<sup>14</sup> initial thought,<sup>15</sup> purpose,
an activity of speech
through the complete focussing<sup>16</sup> and application of the mind
in one who, by developing the ariyan Way,
is of ariyan thought,
of cankerless thought,
and is conversant with the ariyan Way - this, monks, is right purpose
that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the Way.

Whoever makes endeavour
for the riddance of wrong purpose, for the attainment of right purpose,
that is his right endeavour.

Mindful, he gets rid of wrong purpose; mindful, entering on right purpose
he abides in it.

That is his right mindfulness.

Thus these three things circle round and follow after right purpose,
that is to say:

right view,
right endeavour,
right mindfulness.

■

As to this, monks, right view comes first.

And how, monks, does right view come first?

If one comprehends
that wrong speech is wrong speech
and comprehends
that right speech is right speech,
that is his right view.

And what, monks, is wrong speech?

Lying,
slandering speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping.

This, monks, is wrong speech.

And what, monks, is right speech?

Now, I, monks, say that right speech is twofold.

There is, monks, the right speech
that has cankers,
is on the side of merit,
that ripens unto cleaving
(to new birth).

There is, monks, the right speech
that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the Way.

And what, monks, is the right speech
that has cankers,
is on the side of merit,
that ripens unto cleaving
(to new birth)?

Abstaining from lying,
abstaining from slanderous speech, abstaining from harsh speech, abstaining from gossiping.

This, monks, is the right speech
that has cankers,
is on the side of merit,
that ripens unto cleaving
(to new birth).

And what, monks, is the right speech
that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the Way?

Whatever, monks, is [117] abstention from,
refraining from,

avoidance of,
restraint from<sup>17</sup> the four ways of bad conduct in speech<sup>18</sup>
in one who, by developing the ariyan Way
is of ariyan thought,
of cankerless thought,
and is conversant with the Way - this, monks, is right speech
that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the Way.

Whoever makes endeavour
for the riddance of wrong speech, for the attainment of right speech,
that is his right endeavour.

Mindful, he gets rid of wrong speech; mindful, entering on right speech,
he abides in it.

That is his right mindfulness.

Thus these three things circle round and follow after right speech,
that is to say:

right view,
right endeavour,
right mindfulness.

■

As to this, monks, right view comes first.

And how, monks, does right view come first?

If one comprehends
that wrong action is wrong action
and comprehends
that right action is right action,
that is his right view.

And what, monks, is wrong action?

Onslaught on creatures,
taking what has not been given,
wrong enjoyment among the sense-pleasures.<sup>18</sup>

This, monks, is wrong action.

And what, monks, is right action?

Now, I, monks, say that right action is twofold.

There is, monks, the right action
that has cankers,
is on the side of merit,
that ripens unto cleaving
(to new birth).

There is, monks, the right action
that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the Way.

And what, monks, is the right action
that has cankers,
is on the side of merit,
that ripens unto cleaving
(to new birth)?

It is, monks, abstaining from onslaught on creatures, abstaining from taking what has not been given, abstaining from wrong enjoyment among the sense-pleasures.

This, monks, is the right action
that has cankers,
is on the side of merit,
and ripens unto cleaving.

And what, monks, is the right action
that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the way?

Whatever, monks, is abstention from,
refraining from,
avoidance of,
restraint from the three ways of bad conduct in body<sup>18</sup>
in one who, by developing the ariyan Way
is of ariyan thought,
of cankerless thought,
and is conversant with the Way - this, monks, is right action that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the Way.

Whoever makes endeavour
for the riddance of wrong action, for the attainment of right action,
that is his right endeavour.

Mindful, he gets rid of wrong action; mindful, entering on right action,

he abides in it.

That is his right mindfulness.

Thus these three things [118] circle round and follow after right action,
that is to say:

right view,
right endeavour,
right mindfulness.

■

As to this, monks, right view comes first.

And how, monks, does right view come first?

If one comprehends
that wrong mode of livelihood is wrong mode of livelihood
and comprehends
that right mode of livelihood is right mode of livelihood,
that is his right view.

And what, monks, is wrong mode of livelihood?

Trickery,<sup>19</sup> cajolery,<sup>20</sup> insinuating,<sup>21</sup> dissembling,<sup>22</sup> rapacity for gain upon gain.<sup>23</sup>

This, monks, is wrong mode of livelihood.

And what, monks, is right mode of livelihood?

Now, I, monks, say that right mode of livelihood is twofold.

There is, monks, the right mode of livelihood
that has cankers,
is on the side of merit,
that ripens unto cleaving
(to new birth).

There is, monks, the right mode of livelihood
that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the Way.

And what, monks, is the right mode of livelihood
that has cankers,
is on the side of merit,
that ripens unto cleaving
(to new birth)?

Herein, monks, an ariyan disciple, by getting rid of wrong mode of livelihood, yearns his living by right mode of livelihood.

This, monks, is right mode of livelihood
that has cankers,
is on the side of merit,
and ripens unto cleaving.

And what, monks, is the right mode of livelihood
that is ariyan, [119]
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the Way?

Whatever, monks, is abstention from,
refraining from,
avoidance of,
restraint from,

wrong mode of livelihood
in one who, by developing the ariyan Way
is of ariyan thought,
of cankerless thought,
and is conversant with the Way<sup>24</sup> - this, monks, is right mode of livelihood
that is ariyan,
cankerless,
supermundane,
a component of the Way.

Whoever makes endeavour
for the riddance of wrong mode of livelihood, for the attainment of right mode of livelihood,
that is his right endeavour.

Mindful, he gets rid of wrong mode of livelihood; mindful, entering on right mode of livelihood,
he abides in it.

This is his right mindfulness.

Thus these three things circle round and follow after right mode of livelihood,
that is to say:

right view,
right endeavour,
right mindfulness.

■

As to this, monks, right view comes first.

And how, monks, docs right view come first?

Right purpose, monks, proceeds<sup>25</sup> from right view;<sup>26</sup> right speech proceeds from right purpose;
right action proceeds from right speech;
right mode of livelihood proceeds from right action;
right endeavour proceeds from right mode of livelihood;
right mindfulness proceeds from right endeavour;
right concentration proceeds from right mindfulness; right knowledge proceeds<sup>27</sup> from right concentration;
right freedom proceeds from right knowledge.

In this way, monks,
the learner's course is possessed of eight components, the perfected one's of ten components.

■

As to this, monks, right view comes first.

And how, monks, does right view come first?

Wrong view, monks, is worn away in one of right view;<sup>28</sup>
and those various evil unskilled things that arise conditioned by wrong view
are worn away in him;
and various skilled things conditioned by right view
come to development and fulfilment.

Wrong purpose, monks, is worn away in one of right purpose;
and those various evil unskilled things that arise conditioned [120] by wrong purpose
are worn away in him;
and various skilled things conditioned by right purpose

come to development and fulfilment.

Wrong speech, monks,
is worn away in one of right speech;
and those various evil unskilled things that arise conditioned by wrong speech
are worn away in him;
and various skilled things conditioned by right speech
come to development and fulfilment.

Wrong action, monks,
is worn away in one of right action;
and those various evil unskilled things that arise conditioned by wrong action
are worn away in him;
and various skilled things conditioned by right action
come to development and fulfilment.

Wrong mode of livelihood, monks, is worn away in one of right mode of livelihood;
and those various evil unskilled things that arise conditioned by wrong mode of livelihood
are worn away in him;
and various skilled things conditioned by right mode of livelihood
come to development and fulfilment.

Wrong endeavour, monks, is worn away in one of right endeavour;
and those various evil unskilled things that arise conditioned by wrong endeavour
are worn away in him;
and various skilled things conditioned by right endeavour

come to development and fulfilment.

Wrong mindfulness, monks, is worn away in one of right mindfulness;
and those various evil unskilled things that arise conditioned by wrong mindfulness
are worn away in him;
and various skilled things conditioned by right mindfulness
come to development and fulfilment.

Wrong concentration, monks, is worn away in one of right concentration;
and those various evil unskilled things that arise conditioned by wrong concentration
are worn away in him;
and various skilled things conditioned by right concentration
come to development and fulfilment.

Wrong knowledge, monks, is worn away in one of right knowledge;
and those various evil unskilled things that arise conditioned by wrong knowledge
are worn away in him;
and various skilled things conditioned by right knowledge
come to development and fulfilment.

Wrong freedom, monks,
is worn away in one of right freedom;
and those various evil unskilled things that arise conditioned by wrong freedom
are worn away in him;
and various skilled things conditioned by right freedom

come to development and fulfilment.

So, monks, there are twenty (components) on the side of skill,<sup>29</sup> twenty on the side of unskill.

---

The disquisition on dhamma pertaining to the Great Forty that has been rolled on is not to be rolled back by a recluse or brahman or a deva or a Māra or a Brahmā
or by anyone in the world.

Monks, whatever recluse or brahman should think that this disquisition on dhamma
pertaining to the Great Forty
should be censured,
should be scorned,
ten ways of speaking from the standpoint of dhamma<sup>30</sup> give grounds for censuring him here and now:<sup>31</sup> if the worthy one censures right view then those recluses and brahmans who are of wrong view are the worthies to be honoured, the worthies to be extolled;
if the worthy one censures right thought then those recluses and brahmans who are of wrong thought
are the worthies to be honoured,

to be extolled;
if the worthy one censures right speech then those recluses and brahmans who are of wrong speech
are the worthies to be honoured,
to be extolled;
if the worthy one censures right action then those recluses and brahmans who are of wrong action
are the worthies to be honoured,
to be extolled;
if the worthy one censures right mode of livelihood then those recluses and brahmans who are of wrong mode of livelihood
are the worthies to be honoured,
to be extolled;
if the worthy one censures right endeavour then those recluses and brahmans who are of wrong endeavour
are the worthies to be honoured,
to be extolled;
if the worthy one censures right mindfulness then those recluses and brahmans who are of wrong mindfulness
are the worthies to be honoured,
to be extolled;
if the worthy one censures right concentration then those recluses and brahmans who are of wrong concentration
are the worthies to be honoured,
to be extolled;
if the worthy one censures right knowledge then those recluses and brahmans who are of wrong knowledge
are the worthies to be honoured,
to be extolled;
if the worthy one censures right freedom then those recluses and brahmans who are of wrong freedom
are the worthies to be honoured,
to be extolled.

Monks, whatever recluse or brahman
should think that this disquisition on dhamma

pertaining to the Great Forty
should be censured,
should be scorned,
these ten ways of speaking from the standpoint of dhamma give grounds for censuring him here and now.

Monks, even those who were the people of Ukkala<sup>32</sup> and the Vassas [121] and Bhaññas,<sup>33</sup> deniers of cause,
deniers of the effecting (by cause), affirmers of 'There is not'<sup>34</sup> - even these would think that the disquisition on dhamma pertaining to the Great Forty should not be censured, should not be scorned.

What is the reason for this?

The fear of blame,
of attack
and reproach."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse pertaining to the Great Forty:
The Seventh

---

<sup>1</sup> MA. iv. 130 says that the meaning of ariyan is flawless, supermundane.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. D. ii. 216 f. for the following. Right concentration is concentration on the Way, MA. iv. 130.

<sup>3</sup> sa-upanisā. Cf. S. ii. 29 ff. "The history of this word has yet to be written," P.E.D. s.v. upanisā. MA. iv. 130 gives it the meaning of paccaya, condition.

<sup>4</sup> saparikkhāra, with the requisites, called sa-parivāra at MA. iv. 130, "with the surroundings," concomitants.

<sup>5</sup> pubbaṅgama, it is the fore-goer, purecārika, MA. iv. 131. Right view is twofold: that of insight, vipassanā, and that of the Way. The former examines the three kinds of activities (saṅkhāra: of body, speech and thought) in respect of impermanence, etc. But the latter arises at the end of the examination while rooting out and allaying the stage that has been attained, MA. iv. 130. At MA. iv. 135 it is said, "In this Discourse there are five kinds of right view: through insight, of specific kamma (cf. Dhs. 1366, Vbh. 328, MA. v. 10), of the Way, of the fruits, through reflection on."

<sup>6</sup> This is right view through insight, MA. iv. 135.

<sup>7</sup> As at M. i. 287, etc.

<sup>8</sup> upadhivepakka.

<sup>9</sup> This is the right view of specific kamma (see p. 114, n. 5 above), MA. iv. 135, Vbh. 328, VbhA. 415.

<sup>10</sup> paññindriya, see S. v. 200.

<sup>11</sup> Cf. MA. iv. 131: one does not tremble on account of ignorance.

<sup>12</sup> MA. iv. 132 says that having attained the factor of enlightenment one investigates the four truths.

<sup>13</sup> ariyamaggassa samaṅgino, also at M. iii. 73. G.P.D. says this is a wrong reading. A variant here and the reading at M. iii. 74, 75 is ariyamaggasa- maṅgino. Cf. Pug. p. 10, 73: maggasamaṅgino: those on the four Ways.

<sup>14</sup> takka.

<sup>15</sup> vitakka. Cf. M. i. 301, vitakkavicārā vacīsamkhāro.

<sup>16</sup> Cf. Dhs. 7.

<sup>17</sup> The four words of this sequence occur also at Dhs. 200, Nd. II. 462 in connection with right speech.

<sup>18</sup> See M. i. 280.

<sup>19</sup> Cf. D. i. 8, Vism. 6 ff. for these five words. The first, kuhanā, means according to MA. iv. 134, DA. 91, that these people trick (deceive or delude, kuhayanti) the world and astonish it with three kinds of tricks. These are referred to at Jā. iv. 297. These five words also occur at A. iii. Ill, and the actions (trickery, etc.) are explained at Vbh. 352 f., Vism. 23; cf. VbhA. 471. On kuhanā and lapanā cf. the phrases janakuhanattha janalapanattha at M. i. 465, A. ii. 26, Iti. pp. 28, 29.

<sup>20</sup> lapanā. Cf. Vism. 26 f.; also Iti. §99 = A. i. 165, 168. Lapakā, translated at Dial. i. 15 "droners out (of holy words for pay)"; at G.S. iii. 88 "ranter"; at Min.Anth. ii. 186 (lapita-lāpa) "mere mutterings"; at Path Purity i. 27 "boasters." I follow G.S. ii. 28 and Min.Anth. ii. 136. MA. iv. 134: "they cajole for the sake of gains and honour."

<sup>21</sup> nemittakatā; cf. nimittikatā at Vin. i. 254 where, if a monk hints or insinuates that he wants kaṭhina cloth, then it cannot be said to be properly made. Dial. i. 16 translates nemittikā as diviners with note that these are interpreters of signs and omens. This it may easily mean. But in the above context the whole stress is on deceitful ways, unspecified, of obtaining gains and honours.

<sup>22</sup> nippesikatā. I follow translation at G.S. iii. 88. For nippesika Dial. i. 16 gives exorcists, and P.E.D. juggler. But I see no need to be so definite. MA.

iv. 134 says: nippeso sīlam etesan ti nippesikā, tesam bhāvo nippesikatā.
AA. iii. 273 says: nippesiko ti nippimsanakathāya samannāgato.

<sup>23</sup> Cf. definition of lābha at Vin. iii. 266, iv. 154, 156: the requisites, even a lump of chunam, a toothpick and unwoven thread.

<sup>24</sup> Cf. Dhs. 301.

<sup>25</sup> pahoti, cf. D. ii. 217.

<sup>26</sup> sammādiṭṭhissa; MA. iv. 134 explains this as meaning "of the man, puggalassa, who is established in the right view of the Way." So the meaning may be more literally: "proceeds for one of right view," etc. MA. iv. 135 says that here "right view of the Way and right view of the fruits" are both being spoken of; see above, p. 114, n. 5.

<sup>27</sup> MA. iv. 135 says here "right view through reflection on" is being spoken of.

<sup>28</sup> MA. iv. 135 says that the repeaters of the remaining Nikāyas say the "fruit" is being spoken of, but the M. repeaters say the "Way" is being spoken of in the ten items to be worn away.

<sup>29</sup> MA. iv. 135: ten beginning with right view and ten come under "various skilled things conditioned by right view."

<sup>30</sup> vādānuvādā; cf. A. iii. 4. Reading at M. ii. 127 is vādānupātā.

<sup>31</sup> Cf. A. iii. 4; also A. i. 161, S. ii. 33, 36, iii. 6, etc.

<sup>32</sup> MA. iv. 136, "dwellers in the country of Okkala." Ukkala at Vin. i. 4.

<sup>33</sup> MA. iv. 136, "two peoples."

<sup>34</sup> For these same three types of views attributed to these same three peoples, see A. ii. 31, S. iii. 73, Kvu. 141; also K.S. iii. 63, n. 3; G.S. ii. 10; Pts. Contr. p. 95, n. 2.

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
2. Anupada Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
2. The Division of the Uninterrupted

118. Discourse on Mindfulness when Breathing In and Out

Ānāpāna-Sati Sutta

---

Thus have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī in the Eastern Monastery in the palace of Migāra's mother, together with a number of well known elders and disciples: the venerable Sāriputta,<sup>1</sup> the venerable Moggallāna the Great, the Venerable Kassapa the Great, the Venerable Kaccāyana the Great, the venerable Koṭṭhita the Great, the venerable Kappina the Great,<sup>2</sup> the venerable Cunda the Great, the venerable [79] Anuruddha, the venerable Revata, the venerable Ānanda and with other well known elders and disciples.

At that time the monks who were elders exhorted and instructed newly ordained monks.

Some monks who were elders exhorted and instructed ten monks, and some monks who were elders exhorted and instructed twenty ... thirty ... forty

monks.

And these newly ordained monks, while being exhorted [122] and instructed by the monks who were elders, were aware of excellent successive attainment.<sup>3</sup>

"Now at that time on an Observance day, the fifteenth, on the night of the full moon after the "Invitation"<sup>4</sup> the Lord was sitting down in the open air surrounded by an Order of monks.

Then the Lord, having looked round at the Order of monks which had become quite silent, addressed the monks, saying:

"I am satisfied,<sup>5</sup> monks, with this course, I am satisfied in mind, monks, with this course.

Wherefore do you, monks, stir up energy to a still greater degree for attaining the unattained, for winning what is not yet won, for realising the unrealised.

Now I will wait<sup>6</sup> here in Sāvattḥī itself for Komudī (the festival in) the fourth month."<sup>7</sup>

Monks who lived in the country heard that the Lord had said that he would wait there in Sāvattḥī itself for Komudī (the festival in) the fourth month.

And these monks who lived in the country resorted to Sāvattḥī to see the Lord.<sup>8</sup>

And those monks who were elders were exhorting and instructing the newly ordained monks still more.

Some monks who were elders were exhorting and instructing ten newly ordained monks and some monks who were elders were exhorting and instructing twenty ... thirty ... forty newly ordained monks.

And these newly ordained monks, while being exhorted and instructed by the monks who were elders, [80] were aware of excellent successive attainment.

Now at that time on an Observance day, the fifteenth, on the night of the full moon at (the time of Komudī (a festival in) the fourth month, the Lord was sitting down in an open air surrounded by an Order of monks.

Then the Lord, having looked round at the Order of monks which had become quite silent, addressed the monks, saying:

"This assembly,<sup>9</sup> monks, is without idle words, this assembly, monks, has no idle words, it is established on the pure pith.

Monks, an Order of monks such as this company is a company worthy of veneration, of honour, of gifts, of salutation with joined palms, [123] (with the thought):

'It is an incomparable field of merit for the world.'

Monks, an Order of monks such as this company is a company to which if a little is given it becomes much, if much is given it becomes more.

Monks, an Order of monks such as this company is a company that is hard to see in the world.

Monks, in order to see an Order of monks such as is this company, it is fitting to go many a yojana with one's foodbag on one's shoulder.<sup>10</sup>

Such, monks, is this Order of monks; such, monks, is this company.

Monks, there are monks in this Order of monks who are perfected ones, their cankers destroyed, who have lived the life, done what was to be done, laid down the burden, attained their own goal, whose fetters of becoming are utterly destroyed, and who are freed by right profound knowledge.

There are, monks, such monks in this Order of monks.

Monks, there are monks in this Order of monks in whom the five fetters binding to the lower (shore) are utterly destroyed, who are of spontaneous uprising, attainers of nibbāna there, not liable to return from that world.

There are, monks, such monks in this Order of monks.

Monks, there are monks in this Order of monks in whom the three fetters are utterly destroyed, in whom attachment, aversion and confusion are reduced; they are once-returners who, having come back once to this world, will make an end of anguish.

There are, monks, such monks in this Order of monks.

Monks, there are monks in this Order of monks in whom the three fetters are utterly destroyed; they are stream-attainers, not liable to the downfall, but assured, bound for awakening.

There are, monks, such monks in this Order monks.

Monks, there are monks in this Order of monks who live intent on the practise of the (mind-)development of the four applications of mindfulness.

There are, monks, such monks in this Order of monks.

Monks, there are monks in this Order of monks who live intent on the practice of the (mind-)development of the four right efforts ...

of the four bases of psychic power ...

of the five controlling faculties ...

of the five powers ...

of the seven links in awakening.

There are, monks, such monks in this Order of monks.

Monks, there are monks in this Order of monks who live intent on the practice of the (mind-)development of the ariyan eightfold Way.

There are, monks, such monks in this Order of monks.

Monks, there are monks in this Order of monks who live intent on the [124] practice of the (mind-)development that is friendliness<sup>11</sup> ...

... compassion

... sympathetic joy

... equanimity.

There are, monks, such monks in this Order of monks.

Monks, there are monks in this Order of monks who live intent on the practice of the (mind-)development that is on the foul<sup>12</sup> ...

intent on the practice of the (mind-)development that is perception of impermanence.

There are, monks, such monks in this Order of monks.

Monks, there are monks in this Order of monks who live intent on the practice of the (mind-)development that is mindfulness on in-breathing and out-breathing.

Mindfulness of in-breathing and out-breathing, monks, if developed and made much of, is of great fruit, of great advantage.

Mindfulness of in-breathing and out-breathing, monks, if developed and made much of, brings to fulfilment the four applications of mindfulness;

the four applications of mindfulness, if developed and made much of, bring to fulfilment the seven links in awakening; the seven links in awakening, if developed and made much of, bring to fulfilment freedom through knowledge.<sup>13</sup>

And how, monks is mindfulness of in-breathing and out-breathing developed?

How is it made much of?

How is it of great fruit, of great advantage?

Herein, monks, a monk<sup>14</sup> who is forest-gone or gone to the root of a tree or gone to an empty place, sits down cross-legged, holding his back erect, arousing mindfulness in front of him.

Mindful he breathes in, mindful he breathes out.

Whether he is breathing in a long (breath) he comprehends,

'I am breathing in a long (breath)';

or whether he is breathing out a long (breath) he comprehends,

'I am breathing out a long (breath)';

or whether he is breathing in a short (breath) he comprehends,

'I am breathing in a short (breath)';

or whether he is breathing out a short (breath) he comprehends,

'I am breathing out a short (breath).'

He trains himself, thinking,

'I will breath in experiencing the whole body.'<sup>15</sup>

He trains himself, thinking,

'I will breath out experiencing the whole body.'

He trains himself, thinking,

'I will breath in tranquillising the activity of body.'

He trains himself, thinking,

'I will breath out tranquillising the activity of body.'

He trains [125] himself, thinking,

'I will breathe in ... breathe out experiencing rapture.'

He trains himself, thinking,

'I will breathe in ... breathe out experiencing joy.'

He trains himself, thinking,

'I will breathe in ... breathe out experiencing the activity of thought ...

tranquillising the activity of thought ...

experiencing thought ...

rejoicing in thought ...

concentrating thought ...

freeing thought.'

He trains himself, thinking,

'I will breathe in ... breathe out beholding impermanence ...

beholding detachment ...

beholding stopping ...

beholding casting away.'

Monks, mindfulness of in-breathing and out-breathing when developed thus, made much of thus, is of great fruit, of great advantage.

And how, monks, when mindfulness of in-breathing and out-breathing is developed, how when it is made much of, does it bring the four applications of mindfulness to fulfilment?

At the time, monks, when a monk breathing in ... breathing out a long (breath) ... a short (breath) comprehends,

'I am breathing in ... breathing out a long (breath) ... a short (breath)';

when he trains himself, thinking

'I will breathe in ... breathe out experiencing the whole (breath-)body ...

tranquillising the activity of (breath-)body,' at that time, monks, the monk is faring along contemplating the body in the body, ardent, clearly conscious (of it), mindful (of it) so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world.

I say, monks, that of bodies<sup>16</sup> this is one, that is to say breathing-in and breathing-out.<sup>17</sup>

Wherefore,<sup>18</sup> monks, at the time when a monk is faring along contemplating the body in the body, ardent, clearly conscious (of it), mindful (of it) so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world, at that time, monks, the monk trains himself, thinking,

'I will breathe in experiencing rapture<sup>19</sup> ...

I will breathe out experiencing rapture ...

I will breathe in ... breathe out experiencing joy ...

I will breathe in ... breathe out experiencing the activity of thought ...

I will breathe in ... breathe out tranquillising the activity of thought'; at that time, monks, the monk is faring along contemplating the feelings in the feelings, ardent clearly conscious [126] (of them), mindful (of them) so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world.

I say, monks, that of feelings this is one,<sup>20</sup> that is to say proper attention to breathing-in and breathing-out.

Wherefore, monks, at the time when a monk is faring along contemplating the feelings in the feelings, ardent, clearly conscious (of them), mindful (of them) so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world, at that time, monks, the monk trains himself, thinking,

'I will breathe in ... breathe out experiencing thought ...

breathe in ... breathe out rejoicing in thought ...

breathe in ... breathe out concentrating thought ...

breathe in ... breathe out freeing thought';

at that time, monks, the monk is faring along contemplating the mind in the mind, ardent, clearly conscious (of it), mindful (of it) so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world.

I, monks, say that the (mind-)development that is mindfulness of in-breathing and out-breathing is not for one of muddled mindfulness, not for one not clearly conscious.

Wherefore, monks, when a monk is faring along contemplating the mind in the mind, ardent, clearly conscious (of it), mindful (of it) so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world, at that time, monks, the monk trains himself, thinking,

'I will breathe in ... breathe out beholding impermanence ...

beholding detachment ...

beholding stopping ...

beholding casting away';

at that time, monks, the monk is faring along contemplating mental states in mental states, ardent, clearly conscious (of them), mindful (of them) so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world.

He, by getting rid of<sup>21</sup> that which is covetousness and dejection,<sup>22</sup> having seen it by means of wisdom,<sup>23</sup> is one who looks on with proper care.<sup>24</sup>

Wherefore, monks, at this time a monk is faring along contemplating the mental states in the mental states, ardent, clearly conscious (of them) mindful (of them) so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world.

[127] Monks, mindfulness of in-breathing and out-breathing when developed thus, made much of thus, brings to fulfilment the four applications of mindfulness.

And how, monks, when the four applications of mindfulness have been developed, how when they have been made much of, do they bring to fulfilment the seven links in awakening?

At the time, monks, when a monk is faring along contemplating the body in the body, ardent, clearly conscious (of it), mindful (of it) so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world, at that time unmuddled mindfulness is aroused in him.

At that time, monks, when unmuddled mindfulness is aroused in the monk, at that time the link in awakening that is mindfulness is stirred up in the monk; at that time the monk develops the link in awakening that is mindfulness; at that time the link in awakening that is mindfulness comes to fulfilment of development in the monk.

He, faring along mindful thus, examines, inquires into, brings this thing forward for investigation by means of wisdom.

At the time, monks, when a monk, faring along mindful thus, examines, inquires into, brings this thing forward for investigation by means of wisdom, at that time the link in awakening that is investigation into things is stirred up in the monk; at that time the monk develops the link in awakening that is investigation into things; at that time the link in awakening that is investigation into things comes to fulfilment of development in the monk.

While he is examining, inquiring into, bringing this thing forward for investigation by means of wisdom, unsluggish energy is stirred up in him.

At the time, monks, when unsluggish energy is stirred up in a monk who is examining, inquiring into, bringing this thing forward for investigation by means of wisdom, at that time the link in awakening that is energy is stirred up in the monk; at that time the monk develops the link in awakening that is energy; at that time the link awakening that is energy comes to fulfilment of development in that monk.

When he has stirred up energy unsullied rapture arises.

At the time, monks, when unsullied rapture arises in the monk of stirred up energy, at that time the link in awakening that is rapture is stirred up in the monk; at that time the monk develops the link in awakening that is rapture; at that time the link in awakening that is rapture comes to fulfilment of development in the monk.

The body of one whose mind is rapturous is tranquillised and thought is tranquillised.

At the time, monks, when both the body of a monk whose mind is rapturous is tranquillised and thought is tranquillised, at that time the link in awakening [128] that is tranquillity is stirred up in the monk; at that time the monk develops the link in awakening that is tranquillity; at the time the link in awakening that is tranquillity comes to fulfilment of development in the monk.

The thought of one whose body is tranquil and at ease is concentrated.

At the time, monks, when thought is concentrated in a monk whose body is tranquil and at ease, at the time the link in awakening that is concentration is stirred up in the monk; at that time the monk develops the link in awakening that is concentration; at that time the link in awakening that is concentration comes to fulfilment of development in the monk.

He is one who looks on with proper care at the thought concentrated thus.

At the time, monks, when a monk looks on with proper care at the thought concentrated thus, at that time the link in awakening that is equanimity is stirred up in the monk; at that time the monk develops the link in awakening that is equanimity; at that time the link in awakening that is equanimity comes to fulfilment of development in the monk.

At the time, monks, when a monk is faring along contemplating the feelings in the feelings ... the mind in the mind ... mental states in mental states, ardent, clearly conscious (of them), mindful (of them) so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world, at that time unmuddled mindfulness is aroused in him ... (as above) ... at that time the link in awakening that is equanimity comes to fulfilment of development in the monk.

Monks, the four applications of mindfulness, when developed thus, made much of thus, bring to fulfilment the seven links in awakening.

And how, monks, when the seven links in awakening are developed, how when they are made much of, do they bring to fulfilment freedom through knowledge?

Herein,<sup>25</sup> monks, a monk develops the link in awakening that is mindfulness and is dependent on aloofness, dependent on detachment, dependent on cessation, ending in abandoning;

he develops the link in awakening that is investigation into things ...

the link in awakening that is energy ...

the link in awakening that is rapture ...

the link in awakening that is tranquillity ...

the link in awakening that is concentration ...

the link in awakening that is equanimity and is dependent on aloofness,<sup>26</sup> dependent on detachment, dependent on cessation, ending in abandoning.<sup>27</sup>

Monks, when the seven links in awakening are developed thus, are made much of thus, they bring to fulfilment freedom through knowledge."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on Mindfulness when Breathing In and Out: The Eight.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. other lists of theras at Vin. i. 354 f., ii. 15 f., iv. 66, and see B.D. ii. 245 for references.

<sup>2</sup> Mentioned also at Vin. i. 105.

<sup>3</sup> During meditation on the "devices," MA. iv. 137. Cf. D. i. 233, A. iv. 47, S. v. 154.

<sup>4</sup> A monastic ceremony held at the end of the rains. See Vin. i. 160, ii. 32; B.D. i. 283, 292, ii. 153, n. 2.

<sup>5</sup> āraddha, explained by tuṭṭha at MA. iv. 137.

<sup>6</sup> MA. iv. 137 reads āgamessāmi; text āgamissāmi.

<sup>7</sup> Komudiṃ cātumāsiniṃ, cf. B.D. ii. 157, n. 3. MA. iv. 137 says it is called komudī because of the existence of white lotuses, and cātumāsini because it is at the conclusion of the four months of the rains.

<sup>8</sup> After the full moon of Kattika.

<sup>9</sup> Cf. A. ii. 183.

<sup>10</sup> putosenāpi. MA. iv. 139 also gives another reading, putānsena. See G.S. ii. 192, n. 1.

<sup>11</sup> For this and the following cf. M. i. 424 f.

<sup>12</sup> The reference is probably to the cemetery meditations.

<sup>13</sup> vijjāvimutti, as at S. v. 28, 335. See also Pts. ii. 243, SA. iii. 275.

<sup>14</sup> For the following see M. Sta. 10; also M. i. 425, A. v. 111, and Ānāpānasāmyutta (S. v. 311).

<sup>15</sup> I.e. the breath-body

<sup>16</sup> kāyesu. MA. iv. 140, among the four bodies of extension and so on, this is one (aññatara), I say it is the body of mobility (vāyokāya). Or, the body that is material shape consists of twenty-five classes of rūpa (mentioned at Dhs. 585); rūpāyatanam ... pe ... kabiḷīnkaro āhāro. Of these, breathing is a body because it is included in the field of touch.

<sup>17</sup> assāsapassāsa here

<sup>18</sup> He either beholds that the body of mobility is one of the four bodies, or that breathing is one of the twenty-five classes of material shape.

<sup>19</sup> On the experience of rapture being two-fold see Vism. 287, and Pts. i. 187.

<sup>20</sup> It is a certain feeling of pleasantness among the three kinds of feeling, MA. iv. 140.

<sup>21</sup> By contemplating impermanence, he gets rid of the perception of permanence; getting rid is a form of knowledge, ñāṇa.

<sup>22</sup> The hindrance of sensual desire is covetousness; the hindrance of ill-will is shown by dejection.

<sup>23</sup> After the knowledge of getting rid of, there is insight into what constitutes impermanence, detachment, stopping and casting away.

<sup>24</sup> ajjhupekkhitar, perhaps meaning with mastery, so that he looks at the objects of thought or meditation, ārammaṇa, or at sense-impressions unmoved by them and indifferent to them, MA. iv. 142. Cf. S. v. 69, etc.

<sup>25</sup> Cf. M. iii. 275.

<sup>26</sup> MA. iv. 144 says that in this Discourse mindfulness on breathing, which is worldly, brings to fulfilment the applications of mindfulness which are worldly; these bring to fulfilment the seven links in awakening which are worldly; and these bring to fulfilment the supermundane nibbāna and fruit of freedom through knowledge.

<sup>27</sup> vossaggapariṇāmi, maturing (or, mature) (pariṇāmin) in relinquishing, letting go of, abandoning, ejecting (vossagga). This abandonment is two-fold: of the defilements and to the mind's leap into nibbāna, see SA. i. 159, Pts. i. 194.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
2. Anupada Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
2. The Division of the Uninterrupted

119. Discourse on Mindfulness of Body<sup>1</sup>

Kāyagatā-Sati Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Then when a number of monks had returned from the alms-gathering after the meal and were sitting down gathered together in an assembly hall, there arose this conversation:

"It is marvellous, revered sirs, it is wonderful, revered sirs, that mindfulness of body<sup>2</sup> when developed and made much of is of great fruit, of great advantage, as was said by the Lord who knows, who sees, the perfected one, the fully Self-Awakened One."

But this conversation between these monks was interrupted.

For the Lord, emerging from solitary meditation towards evening, approached the assembly hall; having approached, he sat down on the seat made ready.

As he was sitting down, the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"What were you talking about here, monks, as you were sitting down? And what was your conversation that was interrupted?"

"As to this, revered sir, when we had returned from the alms-gathering after our meal and were sitting down gathered together [130] in the assembly hall this conversation arose:

'It is marvellous, revered sirs, it is wonderful, revered sirs, that mindfulness of body when developed and made much of is of great fruit, of great advantage, as was said by the Lord ... fully Self-Awakened One.'

This, revered sir, was our conversation that was interrupted, for then the Lord arrived."

"And how, monks, when mindfulness of body has been developed, how when it has been made much of, is it of great fruit, of great advantage?"

As to this, monks, a monk<sup>3</sup> who is forest-gone or gone to the root of a tree or gone to an empty place, sits down cross-legged, holding his back erect, arousing mindfulness in front of him.

Mindful he breathes in, mindful he breathes out. Whether he is breathing in ... breathing out a long (breath) ... a short (breath), he comprehends, 'I am breathing in ... out a long (breath) ... a short (breath).'

He trains himself thinking, 'I will breath in ... out experiencing the whole body.'

He trains himself, thinking, 'I will breathe in ... out tranquillising the activity of the body.'

While he is thus diligent, ardent, self-resolute, those memories and aspirations<sup>4</sup> that are worldly<sup>5</sup> are got rid of; by getting rid of them the mind itself is inwardly settled, calmed, focussed, concentrated.

Thus, monks, does a monk develop mindfulness of body.

And again, monks, when a monk is walking<sup>6</sup> he comprehends, 'I am walking'; or when he is standing still he comprehends, 'I am standing still'; or when he is sitting down he comprehends, 'I am sitting down'; or when he is lying down he comprehends, 'I am lying down.'

So that however his body is disposed he comprehends that it is like that.

While he is thus diligent, ardent, self-resolute ... the mind itself is inwardly settled, calmed, focussed, concentrated.

Thus too, monks, does a monk develop mindfulness of body.

And again, monks, a monk, when he is setting out or returning is one acting in a clearly conscious way; when he is looking in front or looking around ... when he has bent in or stretched out (his arm) ... when he is carrying his outer cloak, bowl and robe ... when he is eating, drinking, chewing, tasting ... when he is obeying the calls of nature ... when he is walking, standing, sitting, asleep, awake, talking, silent, he is one acting in a clearly conscious way.

While he [131] is thus diligent, ardent, self-resolute ... Thus too, monks, does a monk develop mindfulness of body.

And again, monks, a monk reflects precisely on this body itself, encased as it is in skin and full of various impurities, from the soles of the feet up and from the crown of the head down, that:

'There is connected with this body hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, skin, flesh, sinews, bones, marrow, kidneys, heart, liver, membranes, spleen, lungs, intestines, mesentery, stomach, excrement, bile, phlegm, pus, blood, sweat, fat, tears, serum, saliva, mucus, synovial fluid, urine.'

Monks, it is as if there were a double mouthed provision bag that was full of various kinds of grain such as hill-paddy, paddy, kidney beans, peas, sesamum, rice; and a keen-eyed man, pouring them out, might reflect:

'That's hill-paddy, that's paddy, that's kidney beans, that's peas, that's sesamum, that's rice.'

Even so, monks, does a monk reflect precisely on this body itself, encased as it is in skin and full of various impurities, from the soles of the feet up and from the crown of the head down, that:

'There is connected with this body hair of the head ... urine.'

While he is thus diligent, ardent, self-resolute ...

Thus too, monks, does a monk develop mindfulness of body.

And again, monks, a monk reflects on this body itself according to how it is placed or disposed in respect of the elements, thinking:

'In this body there is the element of extension ... of cohesion ... of radiation ... of motion.'

Monks, it is as if a skilled cattle-butcher or his apprentice, having slaughtered a cow, might sit at the crossroads displaying its carcass.

Even so, monks, does a monk reflect on this body itself according to how it is placed or disposed in respect of the elements, thinking:

'In this body there is the element of extension ... of cohesion ... of radiation ... of motion.'

While he is thus diligent, ardent, self-resolute ...

Thus too, monks, does a monk develop mindfulness of body.

And again, monks, it is as if a monk might see, thrown aside in a cemetery a body that had been dead for one day or for two days or for three days, swollen, discoloured, decomposing; so he focuses on this body itself, thinking:

'This body too is of a similar nature, a similar constitution, it has not got past that (state of things).'

While he is thus diligent, ardent, self-resolute ...

Thus too, monks, does a monk develop mindfulness of body.

And again, monks, it is as if a monk might see thrown aside in a cemetery a body which was being devoured by crows or ravens or [132] vultures or wild dogs or jackals or by various small creatures; so he focusses on this body itself, thinking:

'This body too is of a similar nature, a similar constitution, it has not got past that (state of things).'

While he is thus diligent, ardent, self-resolute ...

Thus too, monks, does a monk develop mindfulness of body.

And again, monks, it is as if a monk might see thrown aside in a cemetery a body which was a skeleton but with (some) flesh and blood, sinew-bound ... a skeleton, which was fleshless but blood-bespattered, sinew-bound ... a skeleton which was without flesh or blood, sinew-bound; or the bones scattered here and there, no longer held together: here a bone of the hand, there a foot-bone, here a leg-bone, there a rib, here a hip-bone, there a back-bone, here the skull; so he focusses on this body itself, thinking:

'This body too is of a similar nature, a similar constitution, it has not got past this (state of things).'

While he is thus diligent, ardent, self-resolute ... Thus too, monks, does a monk develop mindfulness of body.

And again, monks, it is as if a monk might see thrown aside in a cemetery a body the bones of which were white and something like sea-shells ... a heap of dried up bones more than a year old .. the bones gone rotten and reduced to powder; so he focusses on this body itself, thinking:

'This body too is of a similar nature, a similar constitution, it has not got past this (state of things).'

While he is thus diligent, ardent, self-resolute, those memories and aspirations that are worldly are got rid of; by getting rid of them the mind is inwardly settled, calmed, focussed, concentrated.

Thus too, monks, does a monk develop mindfulness of body.

And again, monks, a monk, aloof from pleasures of the senses,<sup>7</sup> aloof from unskilled states of mind, enters on and abides in the first meditation which is accompanied by initial thought and discursive thought, is born of aloofness, and is rapturous and joyful.

He drenches, saturates, permeates, suffuses this very body with the rapture and joy that are born of aloofness; there is no part of his whole body that is not suffused with the rapture and joy that are born of aloofness.

Monks, as a skilled bath-attendant or his apprentice, having sprinkled bath-powder into a bronze vessel, might knead it while repeatedly sprinkling<sup>8</sup> it with water until the ball of lather had taken up moisture, was drenched with moisture, suffused with moisture inside and out, but without any oozing.

[133] Even so, monks, does a monk drench, saturate, permeate, suffuse this very body with the rapture and joy that are born of aloofness; there is no part of his whole body that is not suffused with the rapture and joy that are born of aloofness.

While he is thus diligent, ardent, self-resolute ...

Thus too, monks, does a monk develop mindfulness of body.

And again, monks, a monk, by allaying initial thought and discursive thought, with the mind subjectively tranquillised and fixed on one point, enters on and abides in the second meditation which is devoid of initial thought and discursive thought, is born of concentration and is rapturous and joyful.

He drenches, saturates, permeates, suffuses this very body with the rapture and joy that are born of concentration; there is no part of his whole body that is not suffused with the rapture and joy that are born of concentration.

Monks, it is like a pool of water with water welling up within it, but which has no inlet for water from the eastern ... western ... northern ... or southern side, and even if the god does not send down showers upon it from time to time, yet the current of cool water having welled up from that pool will drench, saturate, permeate, suffuse that pool with cool water.

Even so, monks, does a monk drench saturate, permeate, suffuse this very body with the rapture and joy that are born of concentration; there is no part of his whole body that is not suffused with the rapture and joy that are born of concentration.

While he is thus diligent, ardent, self-resolute ...

Thus too, monks, does a monk develop mindfulness of body.

And again, monks, a monk, by the fading out of rapture, dwells with equanimity, attentive and clearly conscious and experiences in his person that joy of which the ariyans say:

'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,'

and he enters on and abides in the third meditation.

He drenches, saturates, permeates, suffuses this very body with the joy that has no rapture; there is no part of his whole body that is not suffused with the joy that has no rapture.

As in a pond of white ... or red ... or blue lotuses, some white ... or red ... or blue lotuses are born in the water, grow up in the water, never rising above the surface but flourishing beneath it and from their roots to the tips are drenched, saturated, permeated, suffused by cool water; even so, monks, does a monk drench, saturate, permeate, suffuse this very body with the joy that has no rapture; there is no part of his whole body that is not suffused with the joy that has no rapture.

While he is thus diligent, ardent, self-resolute ...

Thus too does a monk develop mindfulness of body.

And again, monks, a monk, by getting rid of joy and by getting [134] rid of anguish, by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows, enters on and abides in the fourth meditation which has neither anguish nor joy, and which is entirely purified by equanimity and mindfulness.

He, having suffused this very body with a mind that is utterly pure, utterly clean, comes to be sitting down; there is no part of his whole body that is not suffused by a mind that is utterly pure, utterly clean.

Monks, it is as if a man might be sitting down who had clothed himself including his head with a white cloth; there would be no part of his whole body not covered by the white cloth.

Even so, monks, a monk, having suffused this very body with a mind that is utterly pure, utterly clean, comes to be sitting down; there is no part of this whole body that is not suffused by a mind that is utterly pure, utterly clean.

While he is thus diligent, ardent, self-resolute, those memories and aspirations that are worldly are got rid of; by getting rid of them the mind itself is inwardly settled, calmed, focussed, concentrated.

Thus too, monks, does a monk develop mindfulness of body.<sup>9</sup>

Monks, those skilled states that are connected with knowledge<sup>10</sup> are in anyone in whom mindfulness of body has been developed and made much of.

As, monks, those streams that flow down to the ocean are in anyone in whom the great ocean has been suffused by thought,<sup>11</sup> even so, those skilled states that are connected with knowledge are in anyone in whom mindfulness of body has been developed and made much of.

Monks, Māra gains access to whatever monk there is in whom mindfulness of body has not been developed, not been made much of.

Monks, it is as though a man were to throw a heavy round stone into a mound of moist clay.

What do you think, monks?

Would that heavy round stone gain access to<sup>12</sup> that mound of moist clay?"

[135] "Yes, revered sir."

"Even so, monks, Māra gains access to, Māra gets a chance over anyone in whom mindfulness of body has not been developed, not made much of.

Monks, it is as though there were a dry sapless stick,<sup>13</sup> and a man were to come along bringing an upper piece of fire-stick, thinking:

'I will light a fire, I will get heat.'

What do you think, monks?

Could that man, bringing an upper piece of fire-stick and rubbing that dry sapless stick (with it), light a fire, could he get heat?"

"Yes, revered sir."

"Even so, monks, Māra gains access to, Māra gets a chance over anyone in whom mindfulness of body has not been developed, not been made much of.

Monks, it is as though a water-pot were standing void and empty on its support, and a man were to come along bringing a load of water.

What do you think, monks?

Would that man get a chance to unload the water?"

"Yes, revered sir."

"Even so, monks, Māra gains access to, Māra gets a chance over anyone in whom mindfulness of body has not been developed, not been made much of.

(But), monks, Māra does not gain access to, Māra does not get a chance over anyone in whom mindfulness of body has been developed and made much of.

Monks, it is as though a man were to throw a light ball of thread against a door-panel<sup>14</sup> made entirely from heartwood.

What do you think, monks?

Would that light ball of thread gain access to a door-panel made entirely from heart-wood?"

"No, revered sir."

"Even so, monks, Māra does not gain access to, Māra does not get a chance over anyone in whom mindfulness of body has been developed and made much of.

It is as though, monks, there were a wet sappy stick,<sup>15</sup> and a man were to come along bringing an upper piece of fire-stick, thinking:

'I will light a fire, I will get heat.'

What do you think, monks?

Could that man, bringing an upper piece of fire-stick and rubbing that wet sappy stick (with it), light a fire, could he get heat?"

[136] "No, revered sir."

"Even so, monks, Māra does not gain access to, Māra does not get a chance over anyone in whom mindfulness of body has been developed and made much of.

Monks, it is as though<sup>16</sup> a full water-pot, brimming with water so that a crow could drink from it, were placed in a support, and a man were to come along bringing a load of water.

What do you think, monks?

Would that man get a chance to unload the water?"

"No, revered sir."

"Even so, monks, Māra does not gain access to, Māra does not get a chance over anyone in whom mindfulness of body has been developed and made much of.

Anyone, monks, in whom mindfulness of body has been developed and made much of, turns his mind to this or that realisation through super-knowledge of a thing that may be realised through super-knowledge and achieves ability as a witness now here, now there, whatever may be the plane.<sup>17</sup>

Monks, it is as though a full water-pot, brimming with water so that a crow could drink from it, were placed in a support and a strong man were to rock it from side to side - would the water spill?"

"Yes, revered sir."

"Even so, monks, anyone in whom mindfulness of body has been developed and made much of, turns his mind to this or that realisation through super-knowledge of a thing that may be realised through super-knowledge and achieves ability as a witness now here, now there, whatever may be the plane.

Monks, it is as though<sup>18</sup> there were a tank on a level stretch of ground, its four sides strengthened with dykes, full and brimming with water so that a crow could drink from it, and a strong man were to loosen a dyke at this side or that - would the water spill?"

"Yes, revered sir."

"Even so, monks, anyone in whom mindfulness of body has been developed and made much of, turns his mind to this or that realisation through super-knowledge of a thing that may be realised through super-knowledge and achieves ability as a witness now here, now there, whatever may be the plane.

Monks, it is as though<sup>19</sup> [137] at a cross-roads on level ground a chariot were standing harnessed with thoroughbreds, the goad hanging ready; and a skilled groom, a charioteer of horses to be tamed, having mounted it, having taken the reins in his left hand, the goad in his right, were to drive up and down as he liked; even so, monks, anyone whomsoever in whom mindfulness of body has been developed and made much of, turns his mind to this and that realisation through super-knowledge of a thing that may be realised through super-knowledge and achieves ability as a witness now here, now there, whatever may be the plane.

Monks, these ten advantages are to be expected from pursuing mindfulness of body, developing it, making much of it, making it a vehicle, making it a foundation, practising it, increasing it, and fully undertaking it.<sup>20</sup>

What ten?

He is one who overcomes dislike and liking,<sup>21</sup> and dislike (and liking) do not overcome him; he fares along constantly conquering any dislike (and liking) that have arisen.

He is one who overcomes fear and dread,<sup>22</sup> and fear and dread do not overcome him; and he fares along constantly conquering any fear and dread that have arisen.

He is one who bears<sup>23</sup> cold, heat, hunger, thirst, the touch of gadfly, mosquito, wind and sun, creeping things, ways of speech that are irksome, unwelcome; he is of a character to bear bodily feelings which, arising, are painful, acute, sharp, shooting, disagreeable, miserable, deadly.

He is one who at will,<sup>24</sup> without trouble, without difficulty, acquires the four meditations that are of the purest mentality, abidings in ease here and now.

He experiences the various forms of psychic power: having been one he is manifold; having been manifold he is one; manifest or invisible he goes unhindered through a wall, a rampart, a mountain as if through air; he plunges into the ground and shoots up again as if in water; he walks upon the water without parting it as if on the ground; sitting cross-legged he travels through the air like a bird on the wing; with his hand he rubs and strokes this moon and sun [138] although they are of such mighty power and majesty; and even as far as the Brahma-world he has power in respect of his person.

By the purified deva-like hearing which surpasses that of men he hears both (kinds of) sounds - deva-like ones and human ones, whether they be far or near. He comprehends by mind the minds of other beings, of other individuals, so that he comprehends a mind that is full of attachment ... aversion ... confusion, that it is full of attachment ... aversion ... confusion; or a mind that is without attachment ... aversion ... confusion, that it is without attachment ... aversion ... confusion; or he comprehends a mind that is contracted that it is contracted, or a mind that is distracted that it is distracted; or of a mind that has become great that it has become great, or of a mind that has not become great that it has not become great; or of a mind with (some other mental state) superior to it that it has (some other mental state) superior to it, or of a mind that has no (other mental state) superior to it that it has no (other mental state) superior to it; or of a mind that is composed that it is composed, or of a mind that is not composed that it is not composed; or of a mind that is freed that it is freed, or of a mind that is not freed that it is not freed.

He recollects manifold former habitations, that is to say one birth and two births and ... Thus he recollects (his) former habitations in all their modes and detail.

With the purified deva-vision surpassing that of men he beholds beings as they pass hence and come to be; he comprehends that beings are mean, excellent, fair, foul, in a good bourn, in a bad bourn according to the consequences of deeds.

By the destruction of the cankers, having realised here and now by his own super-knowledge the freedom of mind and the freedom through intuitive wisdom that are cankerless, entering thereon, he abides therein.

Monks, these ten advantages are to be expected from pursuing mindfulness of body, developing it, making much of it, making it a vehicle, making it a foundation, practising it, increasing it and fully undertaking it."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on Mindfulness of Body: The Ninth

---

<sup>1</sup> Like Discourse No. 118, No. 119 is again only a sectional presentation of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (M. Sta. 10). See also A. i. 43 and Vbh. 226.

<sup>2</sup> This includes both samatha and vipassana, MA. iv. 144

<sup>3</sup> Cf. the following with M. i. 50 ff.

<sup>4</sup> sarasamkappā, as at M. i. 453, iii. 132, S. iv. 76, 190.

<sup>5</sup> gehasitā, belonging to a householder, thus thoughts, etc., belonging to the five kinds of sensual pleasures.

<sup>6</sup> Cf. M. i. 56.

<sup>7</sup> As at M. i. 276-278.

<sup>8</sup> paripphosakam paripphosakam, as at M. i. 276, ii. 15, iii. 140, D. i. 74
See P.E.D.

<sup>9</sup> The parallel passage at M. i. 276-278 ends here.

<sup>10</sup> For this passage cf. A. i. 43. The "skilled states that are connected with knowledge," dhammā vijjābhāgiyā, are given as six at A. iii. 334: perception of impermanence, perception of the anguish in impermanence, perception of non-self in anguish, perception of getting rid of, perception of detachment, perception of stopping. But MA. iv. 145 says that here the knowledge of insight, psychic power made by mind, the six super-knowledges are connected with knowledge.

<sup>11</sup> By deva-vision, MA. iv. 145.

<sup>12</sup> Although the English may suffer from the use of this strange expression, and although some such phrase as "makes an impression on" would sound more natural here, it yet seems that by translating labhati otāram all through this passage by "gains access to" (and this is precisely what is meant in the case of Māra), the Pali sequence of thought and argument is better preserved and conveyed.

<sup>13</sup> Cf. M. i. 242.

<sup>14</sup> aggalaphalaka, the board and bolt. MA. iv. 145 says kavāṭa, the panel of a door.

<sup>15</sup> Cf. M. i. 240.

<sup>16</sup> Cf. A. iii. 27.

<sup>17</sup> tatra tatr'eva sakkhibhavyatam pāpuṇāti sati sati āyatane. Cf. M. i. 494, A. i. 256-258, iii. 17-19, 27; quoted at Asl. 141. At MA. iv. 146 āyatana is explained by kāraṇa, in its turn explained by abhiññā. Therefore now one, now another of the high meditative planes, āyatana, is suggested.

<sup>18</sup> As at A. iii. 28.

<sup>19</sup> As at M. i. 124, A. iii. 28, S. iv. 176.

<sup>20</sup> Cf. S. iv. 200; also D. ii. 103, A. iv. 290, Ud. 62.

<sup>21</sup> As at M. i. 33, A. v. 132. Aratiratisaho: Neumann, vol. iii, p. 214 proposes to read here arati-r-atisaho, because M. text proceeds: na ca tam aratim sahati, uppannam aratim abhibhuyya. But it would seem better to follow A. v. 132 which reads: aratiratisaho assam na ca mam aratirati saheyya uppannam aratiratim abhibhuyya. Here "dislike and liking" are kept throughout, and moreover this pair balances the next: "fear and dread."

<sup>22</sup> As at M. i. 33, A. v. 132.

<sup>23</sup> Cf. M. i. 10 where these are cankers to be got rid of by endurance; cf. also A. iii. 389, v. 132.

<sup>24</sup> As at M. i. 33, which see also for the remainder of the above passage.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
2. Anupada Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
2. The Division of the Uninterrupted 120. Discourse on Uprising by Means of Aspiration<sup>1</sup>

Saṅkhār'uppatti Sutta

---

THUS HAVEEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"I will teach you, monks, uprising through aspiration.

Listen to it, pay careful attention an...ill speak."

"Yes, revered sir," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Herein, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying...light arise in companionship with rich nobles.'

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.<sup>2</sup>

These aspirations and abidings<sup>3</sup> of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying...light arise in companionship with rich brahmans.'

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying...light arise in companionship with rich householders.'

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Four Great Regent Devas are long-lived, beautiful, [139] abounding in happiness.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying...light arise in companionship with the Four Great Regent Devas.'

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,

he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Devas of the Thirty-Three are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Yama Devas are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Devas of Delight are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Devas who delight in creating are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Devas who have power over the creations of others are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas of the Thirty-Three.'

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Yama Devas.'

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas of Delight.'

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas who delight in creating.'

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas who have power over the creations of others.'

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,

he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Brahmā of a thousand-world-system is long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

Monks the Brahmā of a thousand-world-system dwells suffusing and pervading (in meditation)<sup>4</sup> the system of the thousand worlds;<sup>5</sup> and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) those beings that have uprisen there.

It is as though, monks a man with vision had taken some emblic myrobalan<sup>6</sup> in his hand and were to gaze at it; even so, monks, does the Brahmā of a thousand-world-system dwell suffusing and pervading (in meditation) the system of the thousand worlds; and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) those beings that have uprisen there.

It occurs to him:<sup>7</sup>

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Brahmā of a thousand-world-system.'

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Brahmā of a two thousand-world-system is long-lived,
beautiful, abounding in happiness.

Monks the Brahmā of a two thousand-world-system dwells suffusing and pervading (in meditation) the system of the two thousand worlds; and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) those beings that have uprisen there.

It is as though, monks a man with vision had taken two emblic myrobalans in his hand and were to gaze at them; even so, monks, does the Brahmā of a two thousand-world-system dwell suffusing and pervading (in meditation) the system of the two thousand worlds; and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) those beings that have uprisen there.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Brahmā of a two thousand-world-system.'

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Brahmā of a three thousand-world-system is long-lived,
beautiful, abounding in happiness.

Monks the Brahmā of a three thousand-world-system dwells suffusing and pervading (in meditation) the system of the three thousand worlds; and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) those beings that have uprisen there.

It is as though, monks a man with vision had taken three emblemic myrobalans in his hand and were to gaze at them; even so, monks, does the Brahmā of a three thousand-world-system dwell suffusing and pervading (in meditation) the system of the three thousand worlds; and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) those beings that have uprisen there.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Brahmā of a three thousand-world-system.'

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Brahmā of a four thousand-world-system is long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

Monks the Brahmā of a four thousand-world-system dwells suffusing and pervading (in meditation) the system of the four thousand worlds; and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) those beings that have arisen there.

It is as though, monks a man with vision had taken four emblems in his hand and were to gaze at them; even so, monks, does the Brahmā of a four thousand-world-system dwell suffusing and pervading (in meditation) the system of the four thousand worlds; and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) those beings that have arisen there.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Brahmā of a four thousand-world-system.'

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to arising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to arising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Brahmā of a five thousand-world-system is long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

Monks the Brahmā of a five thousand-world-system dwells suffusing and pervading (in meditation) [141] the system of the five thousand worlds; and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) those beings that have arisen there.

It is as though, monks a man with vision had taken five emblemic myrobalans in his hand and were to gaze at them; even so, monks, does the Brahmā of a five thousand-world-system dwell suffusing and pervading (in meditation) the system of the five thousand worlds; and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) those beings that have uprisen there.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Brahmā of a five thousand-world-system.'

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Brahmā of a ten-thousand-world-system is long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

Monks the Brahmā of a ten-thousand-world-system dwells suffusing and pervading (in meditation) the system of the ten-thousand worlds; and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) those beings that have uprisen there.

Monks, it is like a lovely beryl gem<sup>8</sup> of the finest water, superbly cut with eight facets, which shines and gleams when laid on a pale cloth; even so, monks, does the Brahmā of a ten-thousand-world-system dwell suffusing and pervading (in meditation) the system of the ten-thousand worlds; and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) those beings that have uprisen there.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Brahmā of a ten-thousand-world-system.'

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Brahmā of a hundred-thousand-world-system is long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

Monks the Brahmā of a hundred-thousand-world-system dwells suffusing and pervading (in meditation) the system of the hundred-thousand worlds; and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) those beings that have uprisen there.

Monks, as an ornament<sup>9</sup> of river-gold,<sup>10</sup> most [142] skilfully wrought in the crucible of a clever goldsmith, shines and glows and gleams when laid on a pale cloth; even so, monks, does the Brahmā of a hundred-thousand-world-system dwell suffusing and pervading (in meditation) the system of the hundred-thousand worlds; and he dwells too suffusing and pervading (in meditation) the beings that have uprisen there.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Brahmā of a hundred-thousand-world-system.'

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Devas of Splendour are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Devas of limited Splendour are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Devas of boundless Splendour are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Devas of Light are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Devas of limited Light are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Devas of boundless Light are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Radiant Devas are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas of Splendour.

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas of limited Splendour.

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas of boundless Splendour.

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas of Light.

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas of limited Light.

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas of boundless Light.

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Radiant Devas.

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Devas of Lustre are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Devas of limited Lustre are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Devas of boundless Lustre are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas of Lustre.

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas of limited Lustre.

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas of boundless Lustre.

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Vehapphala Devas are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Aviha Devas are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Atappa Devas are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Sudassi Devas are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

He hears that the Akaniṭṭha Devas are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Vehapphala Devas.

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Aviha Devas.

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Atappa Devas.

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Sudassi Devas.

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Akaniṭṭha Devas.

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Devas that have reached the plane of infinite Ākasa are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas that have reached the plane of infinite Ākasa.

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Devas that have reached the plane of infinite consciousness are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas that have reached the plane of infinite consciousness.

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Devas that have reached the plane of no-thing are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas that have reached the plane of no-thing.

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

He hears that the Devas that have reached the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception are long-lived, beautiful, abounding in happiness.

It occurs to him:

'O that at the breaking up of the body after dying I might arise in companionship with the Devas that have reached the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.

He fixes his mind on this,
he resolves his mind on this,
he develops his mind for this.

These aspirations and abidings of his,
developed thus,
made much of thus,
[143] conduce to uprising there.

This, monks, is the way,
this the course that conduces to uprising there.

■

And again, monks, a monk is endowed with faith,
he is endowed with moral habit,
he is endowed with learning,
he is endowed with relinquishment,
he is endowed with wisdom.

It occurs to him:

'O that by the destruction of the cankers, having realised here and now by my own super-knowledge the freedom of mind and the freedom through intuitive wisdom that are cankerless, entering thereon, I might abide therein.'

He, by the destruction of the cankers, having here and now realised through his own super-knowledge the freedom of mind and freedom through intuitive wisdom that are cankerless, entering thereon, abides therein. This monk, uprises not anywhere, monks, he uprises nowhere."<sup>11</sup>

Thus spoke the Lord. Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on Uprising by means of Aspiration:
The Tenth

Division of the Uninterrupted:
The Second

---

<sup>1</sup> Saṅkhāra is not here carrying any of its more usual senses, but has the meaning of purposeful intellection; see P.E.D. s.v. saṅkhāra. This is recognised at MA. iv. 146 which explains by patthanā, aiming at, wishing, aspiration. This is one thing while "the five things beginning with faith" are another. Both are necessary to assure the bourn, gati.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. A. iv, 239 for this sequence and for the following passage; but it enumerates fewer classes of devas than does this Discourse.

<sup>3</sup> Reading vihārā with MA. iv. 146 and one textual v.l. as against text's vihāro.

<sup>4</sup> On pharitva adhimuccitvā see Intr., p. xx.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. A. i. 228; D. i. 46; DA. i. 301.

<sup>6</sup> āmaṇḍa (not in P.E.D.) explained by āmalaka, the usual word for emblic myrobalan, at MA. iv. 147. Childers and Monier-Williams give the castor-oil plant however for āmaṇḍa. In either case it seems likely that the seeds are being referred to rather than the plants themselves. Pali knows eraṇḍa (Skrt. also eraṇḍa) for castor-oil plant, Ricinus communis. Among the Indian vernacular names for this are amanakkam and amadam, George Watt, Commercial Products of India, London, 1908, p. 915.

<sup>7</sup> I.e. the monk.

<sup>8</sup> As at M. ii. 17; D. i. 76, ii. 13; S. i. 65, etc.

<sup>9</sup> nekkha; with v.l. nikkha, Cf. S. i. 65; A. i. 181, ii. 8, 29; DhP. 230; DhA. 239 and see G.S. ii. 8, n. 2. At MA. iv. 147 a nikkha is spoken of as worth five savaṇṇas, and at VvA. 104 as fifteen savaṇṇas. The value may have changed according to the locality.

<sup>10</sup> jambonada. According to MA. iv. 147 and SA. i. 125 this is produced by the leaves of great jambu-trees; they fall into the rivers on whose banks the trees grow and gradually reach the sea.

<sup>11</sup> na katthaci uppajjati na kuhiñci uppajjati. Cf. M. iii. 45 where it is also said of an arahant na kiñci na kuhiñci na kenaci maññati.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
3. Suññata Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Emptiness

121. The Lesser Discourse on Emptiness

Cūḷa Suññata Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattthī in the Eastern monastery in the palace of Migara's mother.

Then the venerable Ānanda, emerging from solitary meditation towards evening, approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.
As he was sitting down at a respectful distance,
the venerable Ānanda spoke thus to the Lord:

"At one time, revered sir, the Lord was staying among the Sakyans.
Nagaraka is the name of a market town of the Sakyans.
And while I was there, revered sir, face-to-face with the Lord I heard, face-to-face I learnt:

'I Ānanda,
through abiding in (the concept of) emptiness, am now abiding in the fullness thereof.<sup>1</sup> I hope that I heard this properly, revered sir, learnt it properly,
attended to it properly
and understood it properly?"

"Certainly, Ānanda,
you heard this properly,
learnt it properly,
attended to it properly
and understood it properly.

Formerly I, Ānanda,
as well as now,
through abiding in (the concept of) emptiness, abide in the fullness thereof.

As this palace of Migara's mother is empty of elephants, cows, horses and mares, empty of gold and silver, empty of assemblages of men and women,
and there is only this that is not emptiness, that is to say the solitude<sup>2</sup> grounded on the Order of monks;<sup>3</sup> even so, Ānanda, a monk,
not attending to the perception of village,
not attending to the perception of human beings, attends to solitude grounded on the perception of forest.<sup>4</sup>

His mind is satisfied with,<sup>5</sup> pleased with,
set on
and freed in<sup>6</sup> the [148] perception of forest.

He comprehends thus:

'The disturbances there might be resulting from the perception of village do not exist here;

the disturbances there might be resulting from the perception of human beings do not exist here.

There is only this degree of disturbance, that is to say solitude grounded on the perception of forest.'

He comprehends,

'This perceiving is empty of the perception of village.'

He comprehends,

'This perceiving is empty of the perception of human beings.

And there is only this that is not emptiness,

that is to say solitude grounded on the perception of forest.'

He regards that which is not there as empty of it.

[105] But in regard to what remains there he comprehends,

'That being, this is.'

Thus, Ānanda, this comes to be for him a true,

not a mistaken,

utterly purified realization of (the concept of) emptiness.<sup>7</sup>

And again, Ānanda, a monk,

not attending to the perception of human beings,

not attending to the perception of forest,

attends to solitude grounded on the perception of earth.

Ānanda, it is like a bull's hide well stretched on a hundred pegs, its virtue gone.

Even so, Ānanda, a monk,

not attending to anything on this earth:

dry land and swamps,<sup>8</sup> rivers and marshes,<sup>9</sup> (plants) bearing stakes and thorns, hills and plains,

attends to solitude grounded on the perception of earth.

His mind is satisfied with,
pleased with,
set on
and freed in
the perception of earth.

He comprehends thus:

'The disturbances there might be resulting from the perception of human beings do not exist here;
the disturbances there might be resulting from the perception of forest do not exist here.

There is only this degree of disturbance, that is to say solitude grounded on the perception of earth.'

He comprehends,

'This perceiving is empty of the perception of human beings;
this perceiving is empty of the perception of forest.

And there is only this that is not emptiness,
that is to say solitude grounded on the perception of earth.'

He regards that which is not there as empty of it.

But in regard to what remains there he comprehends,

'That being, this is.'

Thus, Ānanda, this too comes to be for him a true,

not a mistaken,

and utterly purified realization of (the concept of) emptiness.

And again, Ānanda, a monk,

not attending to the perception of forest,

not attending to the perception of earth, attends to solitude grounded on the perception of the plane of infinite ākāśa.

His mind is satisfied with,

pleased with,

set on

and freed in
the perception [149] of the plane of infinite ākāsa.

He comprehends thus:

'The disturbances there might be resulting from the perception of forest do not exist here;

the disturbances there might be [106] resulting from the perception of earth do not exist here.

There is only this degree of disturbance, that is to say solitude grounded on (the perception of<sup>10</sup>) the plane of infinite ākāsa.

He comprehends,

'This perceiving is empty of the perception of forest.'

He comprehends,

'This perceiving is empty of the perception of earth.'

And there is only this that is not emptiness, that is to say the solitude grounded on the perception of the plane of infinite ākāsa.'

He regards that which is not there as empty of it.

But in regard to what remains there he comprehends,

'That being, this is.'

Thus, Ānanda, this too comes to be for him a true

not a mistaken,

and utterly purified realisation of (the concept of) emptiness.

And again, Ānanda, a monk,

not attending to the perception of earth,

not attending to the perception of the plane of infinite ākāsa, attends to solitude grounded on (the perception of) the plane of infinite consciousness.

His mind is satisfied with,

pleased with,

set on
and freed in
the perception of the plane of infinite consciousness.

He comprehends thus:

'The disturbances there might be resulting from the perception of earth do not exist here;

the disturbances there might be resulting from the perception of the plane of infinite ākāśa do not exist here.

There is only this degree of disturbance, that is to say solitude grounded on the perception of the plane of infinite consciousness.'

He comprehends,

'This perceiving is empty of the perception of earth.'

'This perceiving is empty of the perception of the plane of infinite ākāśa.

And there is only this that is not emptiness,
that is to say solitude grounded on the perception of the plane of infinite consciousness.'

He regards that which is not there as empty of it.

But in regard to what remains he comprehends,

'That being, this is.'

Thus, Ānanda, this too comes to be for him a true

not a mistaken,

and utterly purified realization of (the concept of) emptiness.

And again, Ānanda, a monk,

not attending to the perception of the plane of infinite ākāśa, not attending to the perception of the plane of infinite consciousness, attends to solitude grounded on the perception of the plane of no-thing.

His mind is satisfied with

pleased with,

set on

and freed in
the perception of the plane of no-thing.

He comprehends thus:

'The disturbances there might be resulting from the perception of the plane of infinite ākāśa do not exist here;
the disturbances there might be resulting from the perception of the plane of infinite consciousness do not exist here.
There is only this degree of disturbance, that is to say solitude grounded on [150] the perception of the plane of no-thing.'

He comprehends,

'This perceiving is empty of the perception of the plane of infinite ākāśa.'

[107] He comprehends,

'This perceiving is empty of the perception of the plane of infinite consciousness.

And there is only this that is not emptiness,
that is to say solitude grounded on the perception of the plane of no-thing.'

He regards that which is not there as empty of it.

But in regard to what remains there he comprehends,

'That being, this is.'

Thus, Ānanda, this too comes to be for him a true
not a mistaken,
and utterly purified realization of (the concept of) emptiness.

And again, Ānanda, a monk,
not attending to the perception of the plane of infinite consciousness, not attending to the perception of the plane of no-thing, attends to solitude grounded on the perception of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.

His mind is satisfied with
pleased with,
set on

and freed in
the perception of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.

He comprehends thus:

'The disturbances there might be resulting from the perception of the plane of infinite consciousness do not exist here;
the disturbances there might be resulting from the perception of the plane of no-thing do not exist here.

There is only this degree of disturbance, that is to say solitude grounded on the perception of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.'

He comprehends,

'This perceiving is empty of the perception of the plane of infinite consciousness.

He comprehends,

'This perceiving is empty of the perception of the plane of no-thing.

And there is only this that is not emptiness,
that is to say solitude grounded on the perception of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.'

He regards that which is not there as empty of it.

But in regard to what remains there he comprehends,

'That being, this is.'

Thus, Ānanda, this too comes to be for him a true
not a mistaken,
and utterly purified realization of (the concept of) emptiness.

And again, Ānanda, a monk,

not attending to the perception of the plane of no-thing, not attending to the perception of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception, attends to solitude grounded on the concentration of mind that is signless.<sup>11</sup>

His mind is satisfied with
pleased with,
set on
and freed in
the concentration of mind that is signless.

He comprehends thus:

'The disturbances there might be resulting from the perception of the plane of no-thing do not exist here;
the disturbances there might be resulting from the perception of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception do not exist here.
There is only this degree of disturbance,
that is to say the six sensory fields that,
conditioned by life,
are grounded on this [151] body itself.

[108] He comprehends:

'This perceiving is empty of the plane of no-thing;
He comprehends:
'This perceiving is empty of the perception of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.
And there is only this that is not emptiness,
that is to say the six sensory fields that,
conditioned by life,
are grounded on this body itself.'

He regards that which is not there as empty of it.
But in regard to what remains there he comprehends,
'That being, this is.'

Thus, Ānanda, this too comes to be for him a true, not a mistaken, utterly purified realization of (the concept of) emptiness.

And again, Ānanda, a monk,
not attending to the perception of the plane of no-thing, not attending to the perception of the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-

perception,
attends to solitude grounded on the concentration of mind that is signless.<sup>12</sup>

His mind is satisfied with,
pleased with,
set on
and freed in
the concentration of mind that is signless.

He comprehends thus,
'This concentration of mind that is signless is effected and thought out.<sup>13</sup> But whatever is effected and thought out, that is impermanent, it is liable to stopping.'

When he knows this thus,
sees this thus,
his mind is freed from the canker of sense-pleasures
and his mind is freed from the canker of becoming
and his mind is freed from the canker of ignorance.

In freedom is the knowledge that he is freed
and he comprehends:
'Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.'

He comprehends thus:
'The disturbances there might be resulting from the canker of sense-pleasures do not exist here; the disturbances there might be resulting from the canker of becoming do not exist here;
the disturbances there might be resulting from the canker of ignorance do not exist here.
And there is only this degree of disturbance,

that is to say the six sensory fields that,
conditioned by life,
are grounded on this body itself.'

He comprehends:

'This perceiving is empty of the canker of sense-pleasures.'

He comprehends:

'This perceiving is empty of the canker of becoming.'

He comprehends:

'This perceiving is empty of the canker of ignorance.

And there is only this that is not emptiness,
that is to say the six sensory fields that,
conditioned by life,
are grounded on this body itself.'

He regards that which is not there as empty of it.

But in regard to what remains he comprehends;

'That being, [152] this is.'

Thus, Ānanda, this [109] comes to be for him a true,
not a mistaken,
utterly purified and incomparably highest realization of (the concept of) emptiness.

And those recluses or brahmans, Ānanda,
who in the distant past, entering on the utterly purified and incomparably highest (concept of)
emptiness,
abided therein

— all these, entering on precisely this utterly purified and incomparably highest (concept of) emptiness, abided therein.

And those recluses or brahmans, Ānanda,
who in the distant future, entering on the utterly purified and incomparably highest (concept of)
emptiness,
will abide therein

— all these, entering on precisely this utterly purified and incomparably highest (concept of) emptiness, will abide therein.

And those recluses or brahmans, Ānanda,
who at present,

entering on the utterly purified and incomparably highest (concept of) emptiness, are abiding in it

— all these, entering on precisely this utterly purified and incomparably highest (concept of) emptiness, are abiding therein.

Wherefore, Ānanda, thinking:

'Entering on the utterly purified and incomparably highest (concept of) emptiness, I will abide therein'

— this is how you must train yourself, Ānanda."

Thus spoke the Lord. Delighted, the venerable Ānanda rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

---

More Suññata Resources

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. M. iii. 294, Vin. ii. 304. See Pts. Contr., p. 142, n. 4 and Bud. Psych. Ethics, p. 91, n.2

<sup>2</sup> ekatta is also unity, oneness MA. iv. 151 explains by ekabhāva.

<sup>3</sup> bhikkhusaṃghaṃ paṭicca ekattaṃ.

<sup>4</sup> He attends to one (particular) forest, thinking, "this is the forest, this is a tree, this an incline, this a thicket," MA. iv. 151. Cf. A. iii. 343, araññasāññaṃ yeva manasikarissati ekattaṃ; and Thag. 110, araññasāññaṃ.

<sup>5</sup> pakkhandati, perhaps "leaps forward," glossed at MA. iv. 151 by otarati, goes down into. Cf. M. i. 186 for this sequence of terms, also Miln. 326.

<sup>6</sup> vimuccati throughout the text, adhimuccati in the Comy.

<sup>7</sup> suññatāvakkanti.

<sup>8</sup> ukkūlavikūla as at A. i. 35; MA. iv. 153 says the dry parts and the swamps.

<sup>9</sup> As at A. i. 35.

<sup>10</sup> Omitted in the text, but needed for the sake of consistency.

<sup>11</sup> The concentration of mind in insight, vipassanācittasamādhi, MA. iv.153, which also says that as it is without a permanent sign it is called "signless," animitta.

<sup>12</sup> MA. iv. 154 says that animitta is spoken of again in order to show vipassanāya paṭivipassanaṃ, the insight that is complementary to (? paṭi-) insight, or a reflex of it.

<sup>13</sup> Cf. M. i. 350, iii. 244, S. ii. 65, A. v. 343.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
3. Suññata Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Emptiness

122. The Greater Discourse on Emptiness

Mahā Suññata Sutta

---

[152]

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying among the Sakyans near Kapilavatthu in Nigrodha's park.<sup>1</sup>

Then the Lord, having dressed early in the morning, taking his bowl and robe entered Kapilavatthu for almsfood.

When he had walked in Kapilavatthu for almsfood and was returning from the alms gathering after the meal, he approached the dwelling-place of the Sakyan Kālakhe- [153] maka<sup>2</sup> for the day-sojourn.

Now at that time many lodgings<sup>3</sup> were prepared in the dwelling-place of Kālakhemaka the Sakyan.

The Lord saw these many [110] lodgings prepared in the dwelling-place of Kāḷākhemaka the Sakyan, and when the Lord had seen them it occurred to him:

"Many lodgings are prepared in the dwelling-place of Kāḷākhemaka the Sakyan.
Are many monks staying here?"

Now at that time the venerable Ānanda together with many monks was making up robe-material in the dwelling-place of Ghaṭāya the Sakyan.<sup>4</sup>

Then the Lord, emerging from solitary meditation towards evening, approached the dwelling-place of Ghaṭāya the Sakyan; having approached, he sat down on a seat that was ready.
While he was sitting down the Lord addressed the venerable Ānanda,
saying:

"Many lodgings, Ānanda, are prepared in the dwelling-place of Kāḷākhemaka the Sakyan.
Are many monks staying there?"

"Many lodgings, revered sir, are prepared in the dwelling-place of Kāḷākhemaka the Sakyan;
many monks are staying there.
It is our time, revered sir, for making up robe-material."

"Ānanda, a monk does not shine<sup>5</sup> who delights in his own group,<sup>6</sup> is delighted by his own group, is intent on delight in his own group,<sup>7</sup> who delights in some other group, is delighted by some other group, is rejoiced by some other group.

Indeed, Ānanda, the situation does not exist when a monk,
delighting in his own group,

delighted by his own group,
intent on delight in his own group,
delighting in some other group,
delighted by some other group,
rejoicing in some other group, can be one who acquires at will,
without trouble, without difficulty, that which is the happiness of renunciation,<sup>8</sup> the happiness of aloofness,<sup>9</sup> the happiness of calm,<sup>10</sup> the happiness of self-awakening.<sup>11</sup>

But, Ānanda, the situation exists [154] when it is expected of a monk who dwells alone, remote from a group,
that he will be one who acquires at will,
without trouble, without difficulty,
that which is the happiness of renunciation,
the happiness of aloofness,
the happiness of calm,
the happiness of self-awakening.

Indeed, Ānanda, the situation does not exist when a monk,
delighting in his own group,
delighted by his own group,
intent on delight in his own group,
delighting in some other group,
delighted by some other group,
rejoicing in some other group, entering on the freedom of mind that is temporal and pleasing<sup>12</sup> or on that which is not temporal and is unshakable, <sup>13</sup> will abide in it.

But Ānanda, the situation exists
when it is expected of a monk who dwells alone,
remote from a group,
that, entering on the freedom of mind that is temporal and pleasing

[111] or on that which is not temporal and is unshakable, he will abide in it.

I, Ānanda, do not behold one material shape<sup>14</sup> wherein is delight, wherein is content, but that from its changing and becoming otherwise there will not arise grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
lamentation
and despair.

But this abiding, Ānanda, has been fully awakened to by the Tathāgata,
that is to say,
by not attending to any signs,<sup>15</sup> the entering on and abiding<sup>16</sup> in an inward (concept of) emptiness.<sup>17</sup>

And if, Ānanda, while the Tathāgata is abiding in this abiding there are monks, nuns, men and women lay followers, kings and kings' ministers, leaders and disciples of other sects who approach him, then, Ānanda, the Tathāgata with his whole mind tending to aloofness, leaning to aloofness,
inclining to aloofness, remote,
delighting in renunciation, bringing to an end all the things on which the cankers are founded, speaks there<sup>18</sup> as one intent only on inspiring them.<sup>19</sup>

Wherefore, Ānanda, if a monk should desire:
'Entering on [155] an inward (concept of) emptiness, may I dwell therein,'

that monk, Ānanda,
should steady, calm, make one-pointed and concentrate<sup>20</sup> his mind precisely on what is inward.

And how, Ānanda, does a monk steady, calm, make one-pointed and concentrate his mind precisely on what is inward?

As to this, Ānanda, a monk,
aloof from pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
entering on it abides in the first meditation,
which is accompanied by initial thought and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness
and is rapturous and joyful.

And again, Ānanda, a monk,
by allaying initial thought and discursive thought,
his mind subjectively tranquillised and fixed on one point,
enters and abides in the second meditation,
which is devoid of initial thought and discursive thought,
is born of concentration
and is rapturous and joyful.

And again, Ānanda, a monk,
by the fading out of rapture,
dwells with equanimity,
attentive and clearly conscious,
and he experiences in his person
that joy of which the Ariyans say:
'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful.'
and he enters and abides in the third meditation.

And again, Ānanda, a monk,
by getting rid of joy,
by getting rid of anguish,

by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows,
enters and abides in the fourth meditation,
which has neither anguish nor joy,
and which is entirely purified by equanimity and mindfulness.

Even so, Ānanda, does a monk steady, calm,
make one-pointed
and concentrate his mind
precisely on what is inward.

[112] He attends to in inward (concept of) emptiness.

While he is attending to the inward (concept of) emptiness, his mind is not satisfied with,
not pleased with,
not set on,
not freed in
the inward (concept of) emptiness.

This being so, Ānanda, the monk comprehends thus:
'While I was attending to an inward (concept of) emptiness my mind was not satisfied with,
not pleased with,
not set on,
not freed in
the inward (concept of) emptiness.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.

He attends to an external (concept of) emptiness.<sup>21</sup>

He attends to an inward and to an external (concept of) emptiness.<sup>22</sup>

He attends to imperturbability.<sup>23</sup>

While he is attending to imperturbability his [156] mind is not satisfied with,
not pleased with,
not set on,
not freed in
imperturbability.

This being so, Ānanda, the monk comprehends thus;
'While I was attending to imperturbability my mind was not satisfied with,
not pleased with,
not set on,
not freed in
imperturbability.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.

Ānanda, that monk should steady,
calm,
make one-pointed
and concentrate his mind
precisely on what is inward in that earlier<sup>24</sup> sign of concentration itself.

He attends to the inward (concept of) emptiness,
his mind is satisfied with,
pleased with,
set on
and freed in
the inward (concept of) emptiness.

This being so, Ānanda, the monk comprehends thus:
'While I was attending to an inward (concept of) emptiness my mind was satisfied with,
pleased with,
set on
and freed in
the inward (concept of) emptiness.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.

He attends to an external (concept of) emptiness.

He attends to imperturbability.

While he is attending to imperturbability
his mind is satisfied with,
pleased with,
set on
and freed in
imperturbability.

This being so, Ānanda, the monk comprehends thus:
'While I was attending to imperturbability my mind was satisfied with,
pleased with,
set on
and freed in
imperturbability.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.

If, Ānanda, while this monk is abiding in this abiding,<sup>25</sup> he turns his mind to pacing up and down, then he paces up and down, thinking:
'While I am pacing up and down thus,
no covetousness or dejection
— evil, unskilled states — [113] will flow in.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.<sup>26</sup>

If, Ānanda, while this monk is abiding in this abiding, he turns his mind to standing then he stands, thinking:
'While I am standing thus,
no covetousness or dejection

— evil, unskilled states —
will flow in.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.

If, Ānanda, while this monk is abiding in this abiding,
he turns his mind to sitting down, then he sits down, thinking:
'While I am sitting down thus,
no covetousness or dejection
— evil, unskilled states —
will flow in.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.

If, Ānanda, while this monk is abiding in this abiding,
he turns his mind to lying down, then he lies down, thinking:
'While I am lying down thus,
no covetousness or dejection
— evil, unskilled states —
will flow in.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.

If, Ānanda, while this monk is abiding in this abiding,
he turns his mind to speaking, then he thinks:
'I will not talk that kind of talk which is low,
of the village,
of the ordinary folk,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal, which does not conduce to turning away from nor to detachment
nor to stopping
nor to calm
nor to super-knowledge [157]

nor to self-awakening
nor to Nibbāna
— that is to say
talk of kings,
talk of thieves,
talk of great ministers,
talk of armies,
talk of fears,
talk of battles,
talk of food,
talk of drink,
talk of clothes,
talk of beds,
talk of garlands,
talk of scents,
talk of relations,
talk of vehicles,
talk of villages,
talk of market towns,
talk of towns,
talk of the country,
talk of women,
talk of valiant men,<sup>27</sup> talk of streets,
talk of wells,
talk of those departed before,
talk of diversity,
speculation about the world,
speculation about the sea,
talk on becoming or not becoming such or so.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.

But, Ānanda, in regard to that talk which is austere,<sup>28</sup> a help to opening up the mind
and which conduces to complete turning away from,

to detachment,
stopping,
calm,
super-knowledge,
self-awakening
and Nibbāna,
— that is to say talk about wanting little,
talk about contentment,
talk about aloofness,
talk about ungregariousness,
talk about putting forth energy,
talk about moral habit,
talk about concentration,
talk about intuitive wisdom,
talk about freedom,
talk about the knowledge and vision of freedom,
he thinks:
'I will talk talk like this.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.

If, Ānanda, while this monk is abiding in this abiding [114] he turns his mind to thought,<sup>29</sup> he thinks:
'I will not think those kinds of thought which are low,
of the village,
of the ordinary folk,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal and which do not conduce to turning away from nor to detachment
nor to stopping
nor to calm
nor to super-knowledge
nor to self-awakening
nor to Nibbāna,
— that is to say thoughts of sense-pleasures, thoughts of malevolence, thoughts of harming.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.

But, Ānanda, in regard to those thoughts which are Ariyan, leading forward,
which lead forward the thinker (of them) to the complete destruction of anguish,<sup>30</sup> — that is to say thoughts of renunciation, thoughts of non-malevolence, thoughts of harmlessness,
he thinks:
'I will think thoughts like these.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to them.

[158] Ānanda, there are these five strands of sense-pleasures.<sup>31</sup>
What five?

Material shapes cognizable by the eye, agreeable, pleasant, liked, enticing,
connected with sensual pleasure,
alluring.

Sounds cognizable by the ear,
agreeable, pleasant, liked, enticing,
connected with sensual pleasure,
alluring.

Smells cognizable by the nose,
agreeable, pleasant, liked, enticing,
connected with sensual pleasure,
alluring.

Tastes cognizable by the tongue,
agreeable, pleasant, liked, enticing,
connected with sensual pleasure,
alluring.

Touches cognizable by the body,
agreeable, pleasant, liked, enticing,
connected with sensual pleasure,
alluring.

These, Ānanda, are the five strands of sense-pleasures.

Wherefore a monk should constantly reflect in his own mind:
'Does there arise in my mind any dealing with this or that field
of the five strands of sense-pleasures?'

If, Ānanda, while the monk is reflecting he comprehends thus:
'There does arise in my mind some dealing with this or that field
of the five strands of sense-pleasures'
— this being so, Ānanda, the monk comprehends thus:
'That which is my desire and attachment to the five strands of sense-pleasures has not been got rid of.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.

But if, Ānanda, while the monk is reflecting he comprehends thus:
'No dealing arises in my mind with this or that field
of the five strands of sense-pleasures'
— this being so, Ānanda, the monk comprehends thus:
'That which was my desire and attachment
to the five strands of sense-pleasures has been got rid of by me.'<sup>32</sup>

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.

And, Ānanda, there are these five groups of grasping.
Wherefore they should be forsaken by a monk who realizes (their) rise and fall, with the thought:

'This is material shape, this the arising of material shape, this the setting of material shape;

'This is feeling,
this [115] the arising of feeling, this the setting of feeling;

'This is perception
this the arising of perception, this the setting of perception.

'These are the habitual tendencies this the arising of the habitual tendencies, this the setting of the habitual tendencies.

'This is consciousness, this the arising of consciousness, this the setting of consciousness.'

While he is abiding realizing the rise and fall of these five groups of grasping,
whatever among these five groups of grasping was his bias towards "I am," that is got rid of.

This being so, Ānanda, the monk comprehends thus:
'Whatever among these five groups of grasping was my bias towards "I am," that has been got rid of by me.'

So he is clearly conscious in regard to it.

These states, Ānanda, concerned solely with what is skilled,<sup>33</sup> are Ariyan, supermundane, beyond the range of the Malign One.

[159]What do you think about this, Ānanda?
From his beholding what reason does a disciple regard it as fit that, even though he is being repulsed,<sup>34</sup> he should follow after a teacher?"

"Things for us,<sup>35</sup> revered sir, are rooted in the Lord, have the Lord for conduit,
the Lord for arbiter.
It were good indeed, revered sir, if this speech of the Lord's were explained;
having heard it from the Lord, the monks would remember it."

"Ānanda, it is not fit that a disciple should follow after a teacher if it is for the sake of an exposition of the Discourses that are in prose and in prose and verse.<sup>36</sup>

What is the reason for this?

It is that for a long time, Ānanda, these things have been heard,
borne in mind,
repeated out loud,
pondered over in the mind,
well comprehended by (right) understanding.<sup>37</sup>

But, Ānanda, that talk which is austere,
a help to opening up the mind
and which conduces to complete turning away from,

to detachment,
stopping,
calm,
super-knowledge,
self-awakening
and Nibbāna,
— that is to say talk about wanting little,
talk about contentment,
talk about aloofness,
talk about ungregariousness,
talk about putting forth energy,
talk about moral habit,
talk about concentration,
talk about intuitive wisdom,
talk about freedom,
talk about the knowledge and vision of freedom
— it is fit, Ānanda, that a disciple, even though being repulsed, should follow after a teacher for the sake of talk like this.

This being so,<sup>38</sup> Ānanda, there is affliction for teachers;
this being so, there is affliction for pupils;
this being so, there is affliction for Brahma-farers.

And how, Ānanda, is there affliction for teachers?

As to this, Ānanda, some teacher<sup>39</sup> chooses a secluded lodging in a forest,
at the [160] root of a tree,
on a mountain slope,
in a wilderness,
a hill-cave,
a cemetery,
[116] a forest-haunt,
in the open air
or on a heap of straw.

While he is living remote like this brahman householders crowd in on him
and townsfolk
as well as countryfolk.

When the brahman householders,
the townsfolk
and the countryfolk
crowd in on him
he becomes infatuated,<sup>40</sup> he falls in love,
he becomes envious,
he reverts to abundance.

This, Ānanda, is called the afflicted teacher.

Because of the teacher's affliction evil unskilled states that are connected with the defilements, with again-becoming,
that are fearful,
and the results of which are anguish,
leading to birth,
ageing
and dying in the future,<sup>41</sup> strike at him.

In this way, Ānanda,
is there affliction for teachers.

And how, Ānanda, is there affliction for pupils?

As to this, Ānanda, a teacher's pupil, imitating<sup>42</sup> the teacher's aloofness, chooses a secluded lodging in a forest,
at the root of a tree,
on a mountain slope,

in a wilderness,
a hill-cave,
a cemetery,
a forest-haunt,
in the open air
or on a heap of straw.

While he is living remote like this brahman householders,
the townsfolk
and the countryfolk
crowd in on him
he becomes infatuated,
he falls in love,
he becomes envious,
he reverts to abundance.

This, Ānanda, is called the afflicted pupil.

Because of the pupil's affliction evil unskilled states that are connected with the defilements,
with again-becoming,
that are fearful,
and the results of which are anguish,
leading to birth,
ageing
and dying in the future,
strike at him.

In this way, Ānanda, is there affliction for pupils.

And how, Ānanda, is there affliction for Brahma-farers?

As to this, Ānanda, a Tathāgata arises in the world,
perfected one,
fully Self-awakened one,
endowed with knowledge and right conduct,

well-farer,
knower of the world(s),
incomparable charioteer of men to be tamed,
teacher of devas and men,
an Awakened One,
a Lord.

He chooses a secluded lodging in a forest,
at the root of a tree,
on a mountain slope,
in a wilderness,
a hill-cave,
a cemetery,
a forest-haunt,
in the open air
or on a heap of straw.

While he is living remote like this brahman householders crowd in on him
and townsfolk
as well as country folk.

When the brahman householders,
the townsfolk
and the countryfolk
crowd in on him
he does not become infatuated, he does not fall in love,
he does not become envious, he does not revert to abundance.

[117] But a disciple of this Teacher, applying himself to this Teacher's aloofness, cultivating<sup>43</sup> it, chooses [161] a remote lodging in a forest,
at the root of a tree,
on a mountain slope,
in a wilderness,
a hill-cave,

a cemetery,
a forest-haunt,
in the open air
or on a heap of straw.

While he is living remote like this brahman householders crowd in on him
and townsfolk
as well as country folk.
When the brahman householders,
the townsfolk
and the countryfolk crowd in on him he becomes infatuated,
falls in love,
becomes envious
and reverts to abundance.

This, Ānanda, is called the afflicted Brahma-farer.

Because of the Brahma-farer's affliction evil unskilled states connected with the defilements, with again-becoming,
that are fearful
and the results of which are anguish,
leading to birth,
ageing and dying in the future,
strike at him.

In this way, Ānanda,
is there affliction for Brahma-farers.

But, Ānanda, this affliction of Brahma-farers is more ill in result, 44 more terrible in result than either the affliction of teachers or the affliction of pupils; and moreover it conduces to the Downfall.45

Wherefore, [118] Ānanda, conduct yourselves towards me with friendliness,
not with hostility;
and for a long time that will be for your welfare and happiness.

And how, Ānanda, do disciples conduct themselves towards a teacher with hostility,
not with friendliness?

As to this, Ānanda, the teacher,
compassionate,
teaches dhamma to disciples,
seeking their welfare,
out of compassion, saying:
'This is for your welfare,
this is for your happiness.'
But his disciples do not listen,
do not lend ear,
do not prepare their minds for profound knowledge but,
turning aside,
they move away from the teacher's instruction.

Even so, Ānanda, do a teacher's disciples conduct themselves towards him with hostility,
not with friendliness.

And how, Ānanda, do disciples conduct themselves towards a teacher with friendliness,
not with hostility?

As to this, Ānanda, the teacher,
compassionate,
teaches dhamma to disciples,
seeking their welfare,
out of compassion, saying:
'This is for your welfare,
this is for your happiness.'

And his disciples listen, lend ear,<sup>46</sup> prepare their minds for profound knowledge and,
not turning aside, they do not<sup>47</sup> move away from the teacher's instruction.

Even so, Ānanda, do a teacher's disciples conduct themselves towards him with friendliness,
not with hostility.

Wherefore, [118] Ānanda, conduct yourselves towards me with friendliness,
not with hostility;
[162] for a long time that will be for your welfare and happiness.

And I, Ānanda, will not proceed with you as does a potter with an unbaked (vessel), not fully dry.<sup>48</sup>

I will speak, Ānanda, constantly reprovng,<sup>49</sup> constantly cleansing.<sup>50</sup>

That which is the pith will stand fast."<sup>51</sup>

Thus spoke the Lord. Delighted, the venerable Ānanda rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

---

More Suññata Resources

---

<sup>1</sup> See M.L.S. i. 119

<sup>2</sup> Khemaka was his name; his complexion was dark, kā'a, MA. iv. 155

<sup>3</sup> Of various kinds: beds, seats, mattresses, squatting mats, straw mats, strips of hide, grass, leaves, branches, all placed touching one another, for this is where groups of monks were staying. MA. iv. 155.

<sup>4</sup> Like the dwelling-place of Kālakhemaka, Ghaṭāya's was also built in Nigrodha's park (or, monastery), MA. iv. 157

<sup>5</sup> In the Buddha's teaching, MA. iv. 158

<sup>6</sup> saṅgaṇika is explained as a coming together of one's own company, while a group, gaṇa, is a coming together of various persons, MA. iv. 158. It is only the monk who delights in solitude who "shines."

<sup>7</sup> As at D. ii. 78

<sup>8</sup> Of the sense-pleasures, MA. iv. 158

<sup>9</sup> From the sense-pleasures.

<sup>10</sup> This conduces to allaying attachment, aversion and confusion

<sup>11</sup> This conduces to the goal of awakening to the way(s).

<sup>12</sup> sāmāyikā kantā cetovimutti. At the time the mind is concentrated there is freedom from the defilements. MA. iv. 158, quoting Pts. ii 40 says that this temporal (or temporary) deliverance consists in the attainments of the four jhānā and the four planes of immateriality. See *M. i.*196f., and M.L.S. i. 243.

<sup>13</sup> asāmāyikā akuppā cetovimutti. This is freedom from the defilements and has not to do with things of time. So it is freedom that is immovable, supermundane. It consists of the four Ariyan Ways and the four fruits of recluship. MA. iv. 159, quoting Pts. ii. 40 which adds Nibbāna.

<sup>14</sup> rūpa, called sarīra, body, at MA. iv. 159

<sup>15</sup> nimitta, signs of the phenomenal world

<sup>16</sup> viharitum, with v.ll. viharataṃ, viharati

<sup>17</sup> As though alone, even though sitting in the midst of a company.

<sup>18</sup> In the midst of that company, MA. iv. 160

<sup>19</sup> aññadatthu uyyojaniyapaṭisaṇyuttam̐ yeva katham̐ kattā hoti; also at A. iv 233. This is a passage of great difficulty, partly because of the two meanings of uyyojeti: (1) to incite, instigate, (2) to dismiss. MA. iv 160, reading uyyojanikapapaṭisaṇyuttam̐, says that, in saying, "Go away, you," the expression is thus connected with words of dismissal, uyyojanikena vacanena. And it proceeds: When the Lord had arisen after lying down after a meal ... he attained the attainment of the fruit(s). At that time the company assembled to hear dhamma. The Lord ... taught dhamma, and without letting pass the right time (to hear it), he vivekaninnena cittena parisam̐ uyyojeti. This could mean either: with his mind tending to aloofness he dismissed the company; or: with his mind tending to aloofness he inspired the company. E.M. Hare at G.S. iv 158 renders the phrase as: "entirely confines his talk to the subject of going apart." It is possible that uyyojeti should be understood in both its meanings: that the Lord incited the company to seek aloofness for themselves and also dismissed them in order that they might do so. If we were to take uyyojeti only as "to dismiss," this would imply a certain selfishness on the Lord's part, and the AA. (iv 122) is apparently against this: teasm̐ upaṭṭhānagamanaṃ yevā ti attho, the meaning is going to their service (i.e. helping them).

<sup>20</sup> Cf. M. i. 116, A. ii. 94

<sup>21</sup> To the five khandhā of another (person), MA. iv 161.

<sup>22</sup> Sometimes to the one and sometimes to the other, MA iv 161. Cf. the internal and external contemplation of the body at M.i 56 (M.L.S. i. 72 and see there n. 4)

<sup>23</sup> ānañja. Cf. M. ii 229, Vin. iii 4. "Thinking, I will become freed both ways," he attends to the attainment of immateriality and imperturbability, āñaja-arūpasamāpatti, MA iv 161, VinA. 157 glosses by acala, unshaking, steady.

<sup>24</sup> The text reads parimasmim. P.E.D. and Geiger, Pali Lit. u. Sprache §19, say that parima is equivalent to parama. But MA. iv 161 reads purimasmim, and I follow this. I think the meaning is that the monk should make another attempt to enter and abide in the inward concept of emptiness.

<sup>25</sup> An abiding in calm and insight, MA. iv 162

<sup>26</sup> That is, to this kammaṭṭhāna, or exercise in meditation, MA. iv. 162

<sup>27</sup> Here reading sūrakathā. See notes on these kinds of talk at B.D. iii. 82

<sup>28</sup> As at Ud. 36, <sup>A.</sup> iii 117, iv. 352, v. 67; quoted at MA. i. 97

<sup>29</sup> vitakka.

<sup>30</sup> niyyanti (niyyāti) takkarassa sammādukkhakkhayāya is stock, e.g. at MA. i. 68, 81, 322. It is suggested that in the above passage kara, normally "doing" (i.e., in takkarassa, of one doing thus), would be better rendered as "thinker."

<sup>31</sup> As at M. i. 85, etc.

<sup>32</sup> me is not in the text at the corresponding passage above.

<sup>33</sup> kusalāyatakā; MA. iv 163 says kusalato āgatā, derived from what is skilled; but the sense of the exegesis and of the v.ll. seems to be 'leading on (step by step) to what is skilled.'

<sup>34</sup> The reading above, and again below, is payujjamāno, passive present participle of payuñjati, to harness, yoke, employ. I have taken it however as

panujjamāno as at M. i. 108.

<sup>35</sup> Cf. M. i. 310

<sup>36</sup> Of the nine divisions into which the Teaching was classified only the first two are mentioned here, sutta and geyya. The word veyyākaraṇa, "exposition," which also occurs in the above passage, is not being used there with the special sense of the third division of the Teaching, "the Expositions," but in a general and untechnical sense.

<sup>37</sup> As at M. i. 213

<sup>38</sup> evam sante. While some disciples are living alone, the matter (connected with the ten topics of talk) does not prosper; therefore, to show the peril, ādīnava, besetting solitude, he said evam sante, which means: being in solitude thus, evam ekībhāve sante, MA. iv 164-165

<sup>39</sup> MA iv 165, an outside teacher who is a ford-maker, i.e., the leader of an "heretical" sect.

<sup>40</sup> Text reads mucchati kāmāyati; but Siam. Version and MA. iv 165 read muccham nikāmāyati. The latter explains: mucchanataṇhaṃ pattheti pavatteti, which seems to mean: he longs for and sets going the craving for infatuation, i.e. for falling in love, a meaning which kāmeti (kāmāyati) bears at e.g. M. ii 40.

<sup>41</sup> Cf. M. i. 280

<sup>42</sup> anubrūhayamāno.

<sup>43</sup> vivekam anuyutto brūhayamāno. Cf. M. Sta. 6, "the cultivator of empty places."

<sup>44</sup> Those who have gone forth in this Dispensation, sāsana, should be able to attain the four ways, the four fruits and Nibbāna but, failing of the instructions, sāsana, they fail of these nine strands of the supermundane.

<sup>45</sup> Cf. S. ii 128

<sup>46</sup> The na of the text should be omitted as it is in some MSS.

<sup>47</sup> The ca should read na ca as in one MS. version.

<sup>48</sup> āmake āmakamatte. MA. iv 166 says āmake is apakkhe, and āmakamatte ti āmake nātisukkhe bhājane, "an unbaked vessel, not quite dry." "The potter gently takes these vessels in both hands, saying: 'Do not break'; but I will not proceed with you as the potter proceeds." I do not see the full force of this simile; therefore my translation must remain very tentative. But I believe it means that whereas the potter gives, and can give, his vessels one chance only, the Teacher is undefeated by any initial failure there may be, and proceeds undeterred with the expectation of final success on the part of his pupil.

<sup>49</sup> niggayha niggayha MA iv 166 says, "having exhorted once, I will not be silent; constantly reproving (niggahetvā niggahetvā) again and again I will exhort, I will instruct." Cf. niggayhavādin at Dhp. 76; and see DhA. ii 108 which quotes the above passage.

<sup>50</sup> pavayha pavayha as at M. i. 442, 443. From pavāhati, to cause to be carried away, to remove (stains), hence to cleanse: of faults or taints, dosa, as at MA. iv 166 which also says: as a potter, having removed, pavāhetvā (v.l. pajahitvā) the cracked and broken vessels (reading with Siam. Edn. bhinnachinnabhājanāni) from among those that have been baked, takes the well baked ones, tapping (i.e. testing) them again and again. So too I, having repeatedly removed (stains from you), will again and again exhort and instruct (you).

<sup>51</sup> yo sāro so thassati: "While you are being exhorted thus by me that which is the pith of the ways and the fruits will persist," MA. iv 167. Sāra is the heartwood, pith, core. It is no doubt meant that this will persist and endure (like well baked vessels) when all the mistakes and errors that dog a learner's path have been cleared away and removed (like the cracked and broken vessels from among those that have been well baked).

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
3. Suññata Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Emptiness

123. Discourse on Wonderful and Marvellous Qualities

Acchariya-Bhuta-Dhamma Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattthī in the Jeta Grove in Anathapiṇḍika's monastery.

Then this conversation arose among a number of monks who, having returned from the alms-gathering after the meal, were seated gathered together in an assembly hall:

"Wonderful,<sup>1</sup> your reverences, marvellous, your reverences,
are the great psychic power
and the great majesty
of the Tathāgata
inasmuch as he should know<sup>2</sup> of former Awakened Ones<sup>3</sup> who have attained nibbāna with the impediments<sup>4</sup> cut off, the whirligig cut through,<sup>5</sup> the rolling on finished<sup>6</sup> and all anguish spent,<sup>7</sup> that these Lords were of such a family

and that these Lords were of such a name
and that these Lords were of such a clan
and that these Lords were of such moral habit and that these Lords were of such mental habits<sup>8</sup> and that these Lords were of such intuitive wisdom and that these Lords were of such an abiding<sup>9</sup> and that these Lords were of such freedom."<sup>10</sup>

[164] When this had been said,
the venerable Ānanda spoke thus to these monks:

"Indeed, your reverences, Tathāgatas are wonderful and possessed of wonderful qualities;
indeed, your reverences, Tathāgatas are marvellous and possessed of marvellous qualities."

And this was the conversation of these monks
that was interrupted.

Then the Lord,
emerging from solitary meditation towards evening,
approached the assembly hall;
having approached,
he sat down on the appointed seat.

As he was sitting down,
the Lord addressed the monks,
saying:

"What, monks, were you talking about just now?"

What was your conversation that was interrupted?"

"Revered sir, when we had returned from the alms-gathering after the meal and were seated gathered together in the assembly hall, this conversation arose among us:

"Wonderful, your reverences,
marvellous, your reverences,
are the great psychic power
and the great majesty
of the Tathāgata
inasmuch as he should know of former Awakened Ones who have attained nibbāna with the impediments cut off, the whirligig cut through,
the rolling on finished and all anguish spent,
that these Lords were of such a family
and that these Lords were of such a name
and that these Lords were of such a clan
and that these Lords were of such moral habit and that these Lords were of such mental habits and that these Lords were of such intuitive wisdom and that these Lords were of such an abiding and that these Lords were of such freedom."

When this had been said,
the venerable Ānanda spoke thus to these monks:

"Indeed, your reverences, Tathāgatas are wonderful
and possessed of wonderful qualities;
indeed, your reverences, Tathāgatas are marvellous
and possessed of marvellous qualities."

This was our conversation, revered sir, that was interrupted.

And then the Lord arrived."

Then the Lord addressed the venerable Ānanda, saying:

"Wherefore, Ānanda, deliver<sup>11</sup> at greater length the Tathāgata's wonderful and marvellous qualities."

---

"Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'The Bodhisatta arose in the Tusita group<sup>12</sup> mindful and clearly conscious, Ānanda.'

And inasmuch, revered sir, as the Bodhisatta arose in the Tusita group
mindful and clearly conscious,
I regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'The Bodhisatta remained in the Tusita group
mindful and clearly conscious, Ānanda.'

And inasmuch, revered sir, as the Bodhisatta remained in the Tusita group
mindful and clearly conscious,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

[165] Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'The Bodhisatta remained in the Tusita group for as long as his life-span lasted, <sup>13</sup> Ānanda.'

And inasmuch, revered sir, as the Bodhisatta remained in the Tusita group for as long as his life-span lasted,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'The Bodhisatta, deceasing from the Tusita group
mindful and clearly conscious, entered his mother's womb, Ānanda.'

And inasmuch, revered sir, as the Bodhisatta, deceasing from the Tusita group
mindful and clearly conscious,
entered his mother's womb,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'When, Ānanda, the Bodhisatta, having deceased from the Tusita group,
entered his mother's womb,
then an illimitable glorious radiance,
surpassing even the deva-majesty of devas,
appeared in the world
with its devas,
its Māras,
its Brahmās,
among the generations
with recluses and brahmans,
devas and men.

And even in those spaces between the worlds,<sup>14</sup> gloomy,<sup>15</sup> baseless,<sup>16</sup> regions of blackness
plunged in blackness,
where the moon and the sun,
powerful and majestic though they are,
cannot make their light prevail<sup>17</sup> - even there
there appeared the illimitable glorious radiance,
surpassing even the deva-majesty of devas.

And those beings who had uprisen there<sup>18</sup> recognised one another
by means of this radiance,
and they thought:

"Indeed there are other beings
who are uprising here."

And this ten-thousand-world-system quaked, trembled
and shook,
and there appeared there the illimitable glorious radiance [166] surpassing even the deva-majesty of devas.'

And inasmuch, revered sir, as the Bodhisatta, having deceased from the Tusita group,
entered his mother's womb,
then an illimitable glorious radiance,
surpassing even the deva-majesty of devas,
appeared in the world
with its devas,
its Māras,
its Brahmās,
among the generations
with recluses and brahmans,
devas and men.

And even in those spaces between the worlds,
gloomy,
baseless,
regions of blackness
plunged in blackness,
where the moon and the sun,
powerful and majestic though they are,
cannot make their light prevail -
even there
there appeared the illimitable glorious radiance,
surpassing even the deva-majesty of devas.

And those beings who had uprisen there recognised one another
by means of this radiance,
and they thought:

"Indeed there are other beings
who are uprising here."

And this ten-thousand-world-system quaked, trembled
and shook,
and there appeared there
the illimitable glorious radiance surpassing even the deva-majesty of devas,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'When, Ānanda, the Bodhisatta is entering his mother's womb, four devas<sup>19</sup> approach so as to guard the four quarters, saying:

"Do not let a human being or a non-human being
or anyone whatever
annoy the Bodhisatta
or the Bodhisatta's mother."

And inasmuch, revered sir, as when the Bodhisatta is entering his mother's womb,
four devas approach so as to guard the four quarters, saying:

"Do not let a human being
or a non-human being
or anyone whatever
annoy the Bodhisatta
or the Bodhisatta's mother",
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'When, Ānanda, the Bodhisatta is entering his mother's womb,
the Bodhisatta's mother is virtuous through her own nature,
restrained from onslaught on creatures,
restrained from taking what has not been given,
restrained from wrong enjoyment of pleasures of the senses,
restrained from lying speech,
restrained from the occasions of slothfulness resulting from (drinking) strong intoxicants.'<sup>20</sup>

And inasmuch, revered sir, as when the Bodhisatta is entering his mother's womb,
the Bodhisatta's mother is virtuous through her own nature,
restrained from onslaught on creatures,
restrained from taking what has not been given,
restrained from wrong enjoyment of pleasures of the senses,
restrained from lying speech,
restrained from the occasions of slothfulness resulting from (drinking) strong intoxicants,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'When, Ānanda, the Bodhisatta is entering his mother's womb,
no desire connected with the strands of sensual pleasures arises in the Bodhisatta's mother towards men, and the Bodhisatta's mother is not to be transgressed against

by any man of infatuated thoughts.'

And inasmuch, revered sir, as when the Bodhisatta is entering his mother's womb,
no desire connected with the strands of sensual pleasures
arises in the Bodhisatta's mother towards men,
and the Bodhisatta's mother
is not to be transgressed against
by any man of infatuated thoughts,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'When, Ānanda, the Bodhisatta is entering his mother's womb, the Bodhisatta's mother is enjoying the five strands of sensual pleasures and she diverts herself, endowed with and possessed of the five strands of sensual pleasures.'

And inasmuch, revered sir, as when the Bodhisatta is entering his mother's womb,
the Bodhisatta's mother is enjoying the five strands of sensual pleasures
and she diverts herself,
endowed with and possessed of the five strands of sensual pleasures,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,

face to face have I learnt:

'When the Bodhisatta is entering his mother's womb, no ailment whatever arises in the Bodhisatta's mother;
the Bodhisatta's mother is at ease,
her body not tired;
and within her [167] womb the Bodhisatta's mother sees the Bodhisatta,
complete in all his limbs,
his sense-organs perfect.<sup>21</sup>

As, Ānanda, an emerald jewel<sup>22</sup>
of lovely water
and well cut into eight facets might be strung on a thread - a deep green
or yellow
or red
or white
or an orange-coloured thread,
and as a man with vision,
having taken it in his hand,
might reflect:

"This is an emerald jewel
of lovely water,
it is well cut into eight facets
and strung on a thread - a deep green
or yellow
or red
or white
or an orange-coloured thread,";

even so, Ānanda, when the Bodhisatta is entering his mother's womb no ailment whatever arises in the Bodhisatta's mother;
the Bodhisatta's mother is at ease,

her body not tired;
and within her womb the Bodhisatta's mother sees the Bodhisatta,
complete in all his limbs,
his sense-organs perfect.'

And inasmuch, revered sir, as when the Bodhisatta is entering his mother's womb,
no ailment whatever arises in the Bodhisatta's mother;
the Bodhisatta's mother is at ease,
her body not tired;
and within her womb the Bodhisatta's mother sees the Bodhisatta,
complete in all his limbs,
his sense-organs perfect.

As, an emerald jewel
of lovely water
and well cut into eight facets might be strung on a thread - a deep green
or yellow
or red
or white
or an orange-coloured thread,
and as a man with vision,
having taken it in his hand,
might reflect:

"This is an emerald jewel
of lovely water,
it is well cut into eight facets
and strung on a thread -
a deep green
or yellow
or red
or white
or an orange-coloured thread

I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'Ānanda, the Bodhisatta's mother dies seven days after the Bodhisatta is born and arises in the Tusita group.'

And inasmuch, revered sir, as the Bodhisatta's mother dies seven days after the Bodhisatta is born
and arises in the Tusita group,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'While, Ānanda, other women carry the child in their womb for nine or ten months<sup>23</sup> before they give birth,
the Bodhisatta's mother
does not give birth to the Bodhisatta in this way.

The Bodhisatta's mother carries the Bodhisatta in her womb for exactly ten months
before she gives birth.'

And inasmuch, revered sir, as other women carry the child in their womb for nine or ten months

before they give birth,
the Bodhisatta's mother
does not give birth to the Bodhisatta in this way.

The Bodhisatta's mother carries the Bodhisatta in her womb
for exactly ten months
before she gives birth,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'While, Ānanda, other women give birth sitting or lying down,
the Bodhisatta's mother does not give birth to the Bodhisatta in this way:
the Bodhisatta's mother gives birth to the Bodhisatta while she is standing.'<sup>24</sup>

And inasmuch, revered sir, as while other women give birth sitting or lying down,
the Bodhisatta's mother does not give birth to the Bodhisatta in this way:
the Bodhisatta's mother gives birth to the Bodhisatta while she is standing,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face [168] have I learnt:

'When, Ānanda, the Bodhisatta is issuing from his mother's womb,
devas receive him first,
men afterwards.'

And inasmuch, revered sir, as when the Bodhisatta is issuing from his mother's womb,
devas receive him first,
men afterwards,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'When, Ānanda, the Bodhisatta is issuing from his mother's womb, the Bodhisatta does not at once touch the earth;
the four devas,
having received him,
place him in front of his mother,
saying:

"Rejoice, lady,
mighty is the son that is born to you."<sup>25</sup>

And inasmuch, revered sir, as when the Bodhisatta is issuing from his mother's womb,
the Bodhisatta does not at once touch the earth;
the four devas,
having received him,
place him in front of his mother,
saying:

'Rejoice, lady,
mighty is the son that is born to you',

I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'When, Ānanda, the Bodhisatta is issuing from his mother's womb,
he issues quite stainless,
undefiled by watery matter,
undefiled by mucus,
undefiled by blood,
undefiled by any impurity,
pure and unstained.

Ānanda, it is as when a jewel is laid on Benares muslin, neither does the jewel stain the Benares muslin nor does the Benares muslin stain the jewel.

What is the reason for this?

It is due to the purity of both.

Even so, Ānanda, when the Bodhisatta is issuing from his mother's womb,
he issues quite stainless,
undefiled by watery matter,
undefiled by mucus,
undefiled by blood,
undefiled by any impurity,
pure and unstained.'

And inasmuch, revered sir, as when the Bodhisatta is issuing from his mother's womb,
he issues quite stainless,
undefiled by watery matter,

undefiled by mucus,
undefiled by blood,
undefiled by any impurity,
pure and unstained,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'When, Ānanda, the Bodhisatta is issuing from his mother's womb, two streams of water appear from the sky,<sup>26</sup>
the one cool,
the other warm,
wherewith they perform a water-libation
for the Bodhisatta and his mother.'

And inasmuch, revered sir, as when the Bodhisatta is issuing from his
mother's womb,
two streams of water appear from the sky,
the one cool,
the other warm,
wherewith they perform a water-libation
for the Bodhisatta and his mother,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'The moment, Ānanda, the Bodhisatta has come to birth, standing on even feet
and facing north,
he takes seven strides,<sup>27</sup>
and while a white sunshade is being held over him, he scans all the quarters<sup>28</sup> and utters as with the voice of a bull:<sup>29</sup>

"I am chief in the world,
I am best in the world,
I am eldest in the world.

This is the last birth,
there is not now again-becoming."

And inasmuch, [169] revered sir, as the moment the Bodhisatta has come to birth, standing on even feet
and facing north,
he takes seven strides,
and while a white sunshade is being held over him, he scans all the quarters and utters as with the voice of a bull:

'I am chief in the world,
I am best in the world,
I am eldest in the world.

This is the last birth,
there is not now again-becoming,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's.

■

Face to face with the Lord, revered sir,
have I heard this,
face to face have I learnt:

'When, Ānanda, the Bodhisatta was issuing from his mother's womb,
then an illimitable glorious radiance,
surpassing even the deva-majesty of devas,
appeared in the world
with its devas,
its Māras,
its Brahmās,
among the generations
with recluses and brahmans,
devas and men.

And even in those spaces between the worlds,
gloomy,
baseless,
regions of blackness
plunged in blackness,
where the moon and the sun,
powerful and majestic though they are,
cannot make their light prevail -
even there
there appeared the illimitable glorious radiance,
surpassing even the deva-majesty of devas.

And those beings who had uprisen there
recognised one another
by means of this radiance,
and they thought:

"Indeed there are other beings
who are uprising here."

And this ten-thousand-world-system quaked, trembled
and shook,
and there appeared there
the illimitable glorious radiance surpassing even the deva-majesty of devas.

And inasmuch, revered sir, as when the Bodhisatta was issuing from his mother's womb,
then an illimitable glorious radiance,
surpassing even the deva-majesty of devas,
appeared in the world
with its devas,
its Māras,
its Brahmās,
among the generations
with recluses and brahmans,
devas and men.

And even in those spaces between the worlds,
gloomy,
baseless,
regions of blackness
plunged in blackness,
where the moon and the sun,
powerful and majestic though they are,
cannot make their light prevail -
even there
there appeared the illimitable glorious radiance,
surpassing even the deva-majesty of devas.

And those beings who had uprisen there
recognised one another
by means of this radiance,
and they thought:

"Indeed there are other beings
who are uprising here."

And this ten-thousand-world-system quaked, trembled
and shook,
and there appeared there
the illimitable glorious radiance surpassing even the deva-majesty of devas,
I regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's."

■

"Wherefore do you, Ānanda, regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Tathāgata's:

As to this, Ānanda,
the feelings that arise in the Tathāgata are known;
known they persist;
known they go to destruction;
perceptions are known;
known they persist;
known they go to destruction;
the thoughts that arise are known;
known they persist;
known they go to destruction.

So do you, Ānanda, regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Tathāgata's."

"Inasmuch, revered sir, as the feelings that arise in the Lord are known;
known they persist;
known they go to destruction;<sup>30</sup> perceptions are known;
known they persist;
known they go to destruction;

the thoughts that arise are known;
known they persist;
known they go to destruction -
I regard this too, revered sir, as a wonder,
a marvellous quality of the Lord's."

Thus spoke the venerable Ānanda.

The Teacher approved.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the venerable Ānanda, had said.

Discourse on Wonderful and Marvellous Qualities:
The Third

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. the whole of this Discourse with D. Sta. 14; and see Dial. ii. 8 ff. for notes.

<sup>2</sup> jānissati. D. ii. 8 reads anussarissati, (will), should recollect.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. S. iv. 62.

<sup>4</sup> papañca, i.e. to progress along the Way. Given at MA. iv. 167, DA. ii. 425 as "craving, pride, false views: these three defilements (kīlesa)."

<sup>5</sup> chinnavaṭuma. Vaṭuma, from root v.r̥ṣ, to revolve, turn round, referring to the cycle, circle, revolution (on, or of, the wheel of samsāra). MA. iv. 167, DA. ii. 425 say, "here the whirligig is called the rolling on of skilled and unskilled deeds."

<sup>6</sup> A synonym for the former phrase, DA. ii. 425 adding that the rolling on of all deeds is finished.

<sup>7</sup> As to result or effects in the future.

<sup>8</sup> Here dhamma is the middle term of the triad usually appearing as sīla samādhi paññā. MA. iv. 107-108 says that here evaṃ-dhammā means the mental states, dhammā, that are allied to samādhi, concentration, a concentration concerned (both) with what is worldly and what is supermundane. DA. ii. 420 adds that the meaning is concentration on the Way(s) and concentration on the fruits.

<sup>9</sup> MA. iv. 168 and DA. ii. 420 say that these Lords were abiders in the attainment of stopping, i.e., the stopping of knowing and feeling. This is the ninth and culminating plane of the meditative process.

<sup>10</sup> Five kinds of freedom given at MA. iv. 168, DA. ii. 426: freed by eliminating (the hindrances); freed for certain; freed by cutting off (the defilements); freed by the subsiding of the defilements; the freedom of escape (which is nibbāna). They are freed in respect of these five freedoms.

<sup>11</sup> MA. iv. 168, "Since you say that Tathāgatas are wonderful, so let there occur to you," paṭibhantu, i.e. deliver, speak forth, speak out.

<sup>12</sup> I.e. of devas.

<sup>13</sup> Owing to his having fulfilled all the pārami, excellences or "goings beyond," there being no gift he had not given, no sīla he had not observed, MA. iv. 170.

<sup>14</sup> lokaniarikā, which appear to be Niraya Hells, see MA. iv. 177, Jā. i. 76, VbhA. 4. With this passage cf. A. ii. 130, D. ii. 12, S. v. 464, and Mhvu. i. 35, and see notes at Mhvu. Transin. (J.J. Jones), vol. i. p. 36 which I have largely followed.

<sup>15</sup> aghā, meaning dark. MA. iv, 177 explains by niccavivaṭṭā perpetually concealed (i.e. from the light).

<sup>16</sup> asaṃvutā, explained at MA. iv. 177 as heṭṭhāpi appatiṭṭhā, "not supported from below."

<sup>17</sup> ābhāya nānubhonti. MA. iv. 178 says: attano pabhāya nappahonti, they are unable with their own light.

<sup>18</sup> In a great Niraya Hell, MA. iv. 178.

<sup>19</sup> devaputta: the four Great Kings (of the quarters), MA. iv. 179. They wanted to ward off pisācas and yakkhas and terrifying non-human beings in case they frightened the mother.

<sup>20</sup> Cf. Mhvu. i. 145.

<sup>21</sup> abhinindriya, see P.E.D. He was sitting cross-legged, facing East, like a teacher of dhamma on a dhamma-seat, MA. iv. 181. But cf. Mhvu. i. 144 where Bodhisattas are said to stand in their mothers' womb. It is interesting to find the following simile occurring there too, but in rather a different form.

<sup>22</sup> See also D. ii. 13, M. ii. 17.

<sup>23</sup> MA. iv. 182 says this is to be understood as meaning children born after seven or eight or eleven or twelve months. All live except the eight months' child (reading at MA. iv. 182 should be atthamāsajāto na jīvati as at DA. ii. 437), but the seven months' child cannot stand heat or cold.

<sup>24</sup> Cf. Mhvu. i. 217.

<sup>25</sup> Cf. Mhvu. i. 149-150.

<sup>26</sup> Cf. Mhvu. i. 220-222. According to MA. iv. 184 = DA. ii. 438, as these streams of water were not needed to wash away any defilements, the warm one was for playing in and the cool one for drinking.

<sup>27</sup> Cf. Mhvu. i. 221.

<sup>28</sup> See Jā. i 63.

<sup>29</sup> MA. iv. 185, DA. ii. 439 say āsabhin ti uttamam.

<sup>30</sup> Buddhas have nothing not capable of (being known by) insight, therefore knowing the three marks, tilakkhaṇa, they get rid of them, MA. iv. 190.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
3. Suññata Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Emptiness

124. Discourse by Bakkula

Bakkula Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the venerable Bakkula<sup>1</sup> was staying near Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels' feeding place.

Then Kassapa the Unclothed<sup>2</sup> (wanderer)<sup>3</sup> who had formerly been a friend of the venerable Bakkula when he was a householder, approached the venerable Bakkula; having approached and exchanged greetings of courtesy and friendliness with the venerable Bakkula he sat down at a respectful distance.

As Kassapa the Unclothed was sitting down at a respectful distance, he spoke thus to the venerable Bakkula:

"How long is it since you, reverend Bakkula, went forth?"

"It must be eighty years, friend, since I went forth."

"And how many times during these eighty years
have you, reverend Bakkula,
indulged in sexual intercourse?"

"Friend Kassapa, you should not question me thus:

'And how many times during these eighty years
have you, reverend Bakkula,
indulged in sexual intercourse?'

But you could question me thus, friend Kassapa:

'And how many times during these eighty years, reverend Bakkula, did perceptions of sensual pleasure rise in you?'

"And how many times during these eighty years, reverend Bakkula, did perceptions of sensual pleasure rise in you?"

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, friend Kassapa, [171] I am not aware of (any) perception of sensual pleasure rising in me."

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of (any) perception of sensual pleasure rising in him -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]<sup>4</sup>

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence,<sup>5</sup> I am not aware of (any) perception of malevolence or (any) perception of harming rising in me."

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of (any) perception of malevolence or (any) perception of harming rising in him -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence,
I am not aware of (any) thought of sensual pleasure,
(any) thought of malevolence or (any) thought of harming rising in me."

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of (any) thought of sensual pleasure,
(any) thought of malevolence or (any) thought of harming rising in him -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having accepted householder's robe-material."<sup>6</sup>

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having accepted householder's robe-material -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having cut out robe-material with a knife."<sup>7</sup>

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having cut out robe-material with a knife -

we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having sewn robe-material with a needle."<sup>8</sup>

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having sewn robe-material with a needle -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having dyed robe-material with dye."<sup>9</sup>

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having dyed robe-material with dye -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

[172] "During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having sewn robe-material on a kedhina-frame."<sup>10</sup>

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having sewn robe-material on a kedhina-frame -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having been occupied with making up the robe-material of fellow Brahma-farers."

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having been occupied with making up the robe-material

of fellow Brahma-farers -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having accepted an invitation."<sup>11</sup>

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having accepted an invitation -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of a thought having ever arisen such as this:

'O that someone might invite me.'"

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of a thought having ever arisen such as this:
'O that someone might invite me.' -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having sat down amid the houses."<sup>12</sup>

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having sat down amid the houses -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having eaten amid the houses."

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having eaten amid the houses -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having observed in detail the characteristics of women-kind."

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having observed in detail the characteristics of women-kind -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having taught dhamma to women, even a verse of four feet."<sup>13</sup>

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having taught dhamma to women, even a verse of four feet -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having approached nuns' quarters."<sup>14</sup>

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having approached nuns' quarters -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having taught dhamma to nuns."

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having taught dhamma to nuns -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having taught dhamma to probationers."<sup>15</sup>

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having taught dhamma to probationers -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having taught dhamma to female novices."

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having taught dhamma to female novices -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having let (anyone) go forth."

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having let (anyone) go forth -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having ordained (anyone)."

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having ordained (anyone) -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having given guidance."16

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having given guidance -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence,
I am not aware of having had a novice to attend me."17

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having had a novice to attend me -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having bathed in a bathroom."18

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having bathed in a bathroom -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having bathed with chunam."18

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having bathed with chunam -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having had fellow Brahma-farers massage my limbs."

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having had fellow Brahma-farers massage his limbs -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not [173] aware that (any) illness has ever arisen even for an instant."19

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware that (any) illness has ever arisen even for an instant -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having carried medicine, even bits from the yellow myrobalan tree."20

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having carried medicine, even bits from the yellow myrobalan tree -

we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having reclined against a reclining board."<sup>21</sup>

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having reclined against a reclining board -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having lain down to sleep."

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having lain down to sleep -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"During the eighty years that I have gone forth, your reverence, I am not aware of having gone for the rains to a lodging near a village."<sup>22</sup>

["Inasmuch as for eighty years
the venerable Bakkula is not aware of having gone for the rains to a lodging near a village -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"For exactly seven days<sup>23</sup> I, your reverence, (still) having defilements,<sup>24</sup> ate the country's almsfood;<sup>25</sup> then on the eighth day
profound knowledge arose."<sup>26</sup>

["Inasmuch as for exactly seven days, the venerable Bakkula, (still) having defilements, ate the country's almsfood;
then on the eighth day
profound knowledge arose -
we regard this as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

"May I, reverend Bakkula, receive the going forth
in this dhamma and discipline,
may I receive ordination."

And Kassapa the Unclothed received the going forth
in this dhamma and discipline, he received ordination.<sup>27</sup>

Not long after he had been ordained,
living alone,
aloof,
diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
the venerable Kassapa having soon attained here and now [174] through his own super-knowledge
that incomparable goal of the Brahma-faring
for the sake of which young men of family
rightly go forth from home into homelessness,
entering on it,
abided in it.

And he knew:

"Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so."

And the venerable Kassapa was one of the perfected ones.

Then after a time the venerable Bakkula took his key and going from dwelling-place to dwelling-place, spoke thus:

"Let the venerable ones come forward,
let the venerable ones come forward, today I will attain final nibbāna."<sup>28</sup> ["Inasmuch as the venerable Bakkula took his key and going from dwelling-place to dwelling-place, spoke thus:

'Let the venerable ones come forward,
let the venerable ones come forward, today I will attain final nibbāna' - we regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

Then the venerable Bakkula, as he was sitting in the midst of the Order of monks,<sup>29</sup> attained final nibbāna. ["Inasmuch as that the venerable Bakkula, as he was sitting in the midst of the Order of monks,
attained final nibbāna -
we regard this too as a wonder,
a marvellous quality in the venerable Bakkula."]

Discourse by Bakkula<sup>30</sup>

The Fourth

---

<sup>1</sup> Bakkula means "two families," dvakkula, dvikkula, for according to MA. iv. 190 ff. the king judged him to belong to his own mother and to the councillor's wife who had cherished him after he had been found, unhurt, inside a fish that was caught in a river; cf. ThagA. ii. 87 ff., AA. i. 304 ff. See the explanation of bakkula (as a word, not a proper name) at J.P.T.S. 1886, pp. 94 ff. At A. i. 25 Bakkula is called the monk foremost in good health. This gives rise to a dilemma at Miln. 215 f. Verses are ascribed to him at Thag. 225-227.

<sup>2</sup> Acela-Kassapa, an ascetic. At the end of the Kassapa-Sīhanāda-suttanta, D. i. 161 ff., he is said to have undergone a four months' probation (usual for members of other sects joining the Buddhist Order of monks) and then to have gained arahantship.

<sup>3</sup> DA. ii. 349 calls him a paribbājaka.

<sup>4</sup> According to MA. iv. 193 all these portions, beginning here were spoken by the Elders who made the recension of dhamma.

<sup>5</sup> āvuso, whereas formerly (with one exception) he had said āvuso Kassapa.

<sup>6</sup> This layman's gift (of robe-material) is the easy way to obtain it, the difficult or ascetic way, dhutaṅga, being to collect rags from the refuse-heaps. Cf. M. i. 31, A. iii. 391 f., Vin. iii. 172. At MA. iv. 193 this kind of robe-material is said to be for the rains-residence.

<sup>7</sup> MA. iv. 193 explains satthena by pipphalikena, with scissors (?). Cf. pipphalaka at DA. i. 70.

<sup>8</sup> Needles allowed to be used by monks at Vin. ii. 115.

<sup>9</sup> Rules for dyeing by monks are given at Vin. i. 286.

<sup>10</sup> Allowed at Vin. ii. 116 where regulations for the use of this kāthina are given. See B.D. v. 158 ff. MA. iv. 103 here asks how the thera got his robes if he did not accept material from householders and did not cut out or sew robe-material; and it answers that he was well known in two towns and that the people made and dyed the robe-material for him and then hung it out while he was bathing. He then clothed himself. So he got things as easily as did the thera Nigrodha from Asoka.

<sup>11</sup> I.e. to a meal.

<sup>12</sup> MA. iv. 194-195 says that in the Mahāsakuludāyi Sutta (M. Sta. 77, MA. iii, 240) "amid the houses" means from the village post, but here it means from the nimbodakapātanaṭṭhāna. The thera simply went up to the doors of the houses with his almsbowl and the people filled this with foods of various flavours.

<sup>13</sup> At Vin. iv. 21 monks are prohibited to teach dhamma to women in more than five or six sentences. MA. iv. 195 says that the thera did not do this even though it was allowable, and although practically all the theras who depended on families did so.

<sup>14</sup> Although it was allowable to go if asked by an ill nun (Vin. iv. 67, Pāc. 23), the thera did not do this.

<sup>15</sup> Always women; defined at Vin. iv. 332.

<sup>16</sup> nismyam detā; rules for giving guidance are laid down at Vin. i. 60 ff.

<sup>17</sup> See Vin. i. 62 ff.

<sup>18</sup> Procedure for bathing in a bathroom and using chunam is laid down at Vin. i. 47.

<sup>19</sup> gaddūhanamattam, explained at MA. iv. 195 and SA. ii. 224 as the time it would take to get one drop of milk by pulling a cow's teat. The word occurs at S. ii. 264 but in another connection. That the thera was free from illness is said to be due to the deeds of healing done by him under the former Buddhas, Padumuttara and Kassapa.

<sup>20</sup> harītakīkhaṇḍa, Monks allowed to eat the fruits of this tree when they were ill, Vin. i. 201. Cf. also Vin. i. 206.

<sup>21</sup> When he was sleeping he therefore maintained the sitting posture (one of the dhutaṅga and called nesajjika), as the next also shows. Reclining boards allowed at Vin. ii. 175.

<sup>22</sup> Cf. M. i. 31.

<sup>23</sup> As at S. ii. 221.

<sup>24</sup> Sāṇa. *MA.*IV. 186, reading saraṇa (= sa + raṇa, desire or fault), explains by sa-kilesa. *SA.*ii. 199 reads sāṇno ti sakilesa, sa-iṇo (with a debt) hutvā. I think Bakkula means to point to the suddenness with which aññā, profound knowledge or gnosis, arises and thus wipes out the debt, to the past and to past kamma. He is now free of this, being an arahant. See a-raṇa in M. Sta. 139.

<sup>25</sup> The gifts of those with faith; cf. Dhp. 308.

<sup>26</sup> He was therefore no longer just a thera; he was also an arahant: na thero ahan arahā ti āha, MA. iv. 196.

<sup>27</sup> MA. iv. 196 explains that though the thera (Bakkula) did not himself let go forth or ordain, he got this done by other monks.

<sup>28</sup> ajja me parinibbānaṃ bhavissati.

<sup>29</sup> He did not want his body to be a burden to any other monk after his parinibbāna so he entered into the condition of heat, tejodhātu; a flame sprang from his body, and his skin, flesh and blood burnt like ghee and were destroyed, MA. iv. 196.

<sup>30</sup> Also called Bakkulatheracchariyabbhuta sutta and Bakkulassa acchariyabbhuta suttanta. MA. iv. 197 says idaṃ pana suttam dutiyasaṅgahe saṅgahītam, "this Discourse was included in the second collection (or recension)." It will be noted that there is no mention of the Buddha in this Discourse.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
3. Suññata Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Emptiness

125. The Discourse on the "Tamed Stage"

Dantabhūmi Sutta

---

Thus have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels' feeding place.

Now at that time the novice Aciravata was staying in the Forest Hut.<sup>1</sup>

Then prince Jayasena,<sup>2</sup> who was always pacing up and down, always roaming about on foot, approached the novice Aciravata; having approached he exchanged greetings with the novice Aciravata; having exchanged greetings of friendliness and courtesy, he sat down at a respectful distance.

While he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Prince Jayasena spoke thus to the novice Aciravata:

"I have heard, good Aggivessana, that if a monk is abiding here diligent, ardent, self-resolute, he may attain one-pointedness of mind."

"That is so, prince; that is so, prince.

A monk abiding here diligent, ardent, self-resolute, may attain one-pointedness of mind."

"It were good if the reverend Aggivessana were to teach me dhamma as he has heard it, as he has mastered it."

"I, prince, am not able to teach you dhamma as I have heard it, as I have mastered it.

Now, if I were to teach you dhamma as I have heard it, as I have mastered it, and if you could not understand the meaning of what I said, that would be weariness to me, that would be a vexation to me."

"Let the reverend Aggivessana teach me dhamma as he has heard it, as he has mastered it.

Perhaps I could understand the meaning of what the good Aggivessana says."

"If I were to teach you dhamma, prince, as I have heard it, as I have mastered it, and if you were to understand the meaning of what I say, that would be good; if you should not understand the meaning of what I say, you must remain as you are: you must not question me further on the matter."

"Let the reverend Aggivessana teach me dhamma as he has heard it, as he has mastered it.

If I understand the meaning of what the good Aggivessana says, that will be good; if I do not understand the meaning of what the good Aggivessana says, I will remain as I am; I will not question the reverend Aggivessana further on this matter."

Then the novice Aciravata taught dhamma to Prince Jayasena as he had heard it, as he had mastered it.

When this had been said, Prince Jayasena spoke thus to the novice Aciravata:

"This is impossible, good Aggivessana, it cannot come to pass that a monk abiding diligent, ardent, self-resolute, should attain one-pointedness of mind."

Then Prince Jayasena, having declared to the novice Aciravata that this was impossible and could not come to pass, rising from his seat, departed.

And soon after Prince Jayasena had departed, the novice Aciravata approached the Lord; having approached and greeted the Lord, he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the novice Aciravata told the Lord the whole of the conversation he had with Prince Jayasena as far as it had gone.

When this had been said, the Lord spoke thus to the novice Aciravata:

"What is the good of that, Aggivessana?"

That Prince Jayasena, living as he does in the midst of sense-pleasures, enjoying sense-pleasures, being consumed by thoughts of sense-pleasures, burning with the fever of sense-pleasures, eager in the search for sense-pleasures, should know or see or attain or realize that which can be known by renunciation, seen by renunciation, attained by renunciation, realized by renunciation — such a situation does not exist.

It is as if, Aggivessana, among elephants or horses or oxen to be tamed, two elephants, two horses or two oxen are well tamed, well trained, and two are not tamed, not trained.

What do you think about this, Aggivessana?

Would these two elephants or horses or oxen that were to be tamed and that were well tamed, well trained — would these on being tamed reach tamed capacity, would they, being tamed, attain a tamed stage?"

"Yes, revered sir."

"But those two elephants or horses or oxen that were to be tamed but that were neither tamed nor trained — would these, not being tamed, attain a tamed stage as do the two elephants or horses or oxen to be tamed that were well tamed, well trained?"

"No, revered sir."

"Even so, Aggivessana, that Prince Jayasena, living as he does in the midst of sense-pleasures ... should know or see or attain or realize that which can be known and realized by renunciation — such a situation does not exist.

It is as if, Aggivessana, there were a great mountain slope near a village or a market-town which two friends, coming hand in hand from that village or market-town might approach; having approached the mountain slope one friend might remain at the foot while the other might climb to the top.

Then the friend standing at the foot of the mountain slope might speak thus to the one standing on the top:

'My dear, what do you see as you stand on the top of the mountain slope?'

He might reply:

'As I stand on the top of the mountain slope I, my dear, see delightful parks, delightful woods, delightful stretches of level ground delightful ponds.'

But the other might speak thus:

'This is impossible, it cannot come to pass, my dear, that, as you stand on the top of the mountain slope, you should see ... delightful ponds.'

Then the friend who had been standing on top of the mountain slope having come down to the foot and taken his friend by the arm, making him climb to the top of the mountain slope and giving him a moment in which to regain his breath, might speak to him thus:

'Now, my dear, what is it that you see as you stand on the top of the mountain slope?'

He might speak thus:

'I, my dear, as I stand on the top of the mountain slope, see delightful parks ... delightful ponds.'

He might speak thus:

'Just now, my dear, we understood you to say:

This is impossible, it cannot come to pass that, as you stand on the top of the mountain slope, you should see delightful ... ponds. But now we understand you to say:

'I, my dear, as I stand on the top of the mountain slope, see delightful parks ... delightful ponds.'

He might speak thus:

'That was because I, my dear, hemmed in by this great mountain slope, could not see what was to be seen.'

"Even so but to a still greater degree, Aggivessana, is Prince Jayasena hemmed in, blocked, obstructed, enveloped by this mass of ignorance.

Indeed, that Prince Jayasena, living as he does in the midst of sense-pleasures, enjoying sense-pleasures, being consumed by thoughts of sense-pleasures, eager in the search for sense-pleasures, should know or see or attain or realize that which can be known ... seen ... attained ... realized by renunciation — such a situation does not exist.

Had these two similes occurred to you, Aggivessana, for Prince Jayasena, Prince Jayasena naturally would have acted in the manner of one having trust in you."

"But how could these two similes for Prince Jayasena have occurred to me, revered sir, seeing that they are spontaneous, that is to say to the Lord, and have never been heard before?"

"As, Aggivessana, a noble anointed king addresses an elephant hunter saying:

'You, good elephant hunter, mount the king's elephant and go into an elephant forest.

When you see a forest elephant, tie him to the neck of the king's elephant.'

And, Aggivessana, the elephant hunter having answered: 'Yes, sire,' in assent to the noble anointed king, mounts the king's elephant and goes into an elephant forest.

Seeing a forest elephant, he ties him to the neck of the king's elephant.

So the king's elephant brings him out into the open.

But, Aggivessana, the forest elephant has this longing, that is to say for the elephant forest.

But in regard to him the elephant hunter tells the noble anointed king that the forest elephant has got out into the open.

The noble anointed king then addresses an elephant tamer, saying:

'Come you, good elephant tamer, tame the forest elephant by subduing his forest ways, by subduing his forest memories, and aspirations and by subduing his distress, his fretting and fever for the forest, by making him pleased with the villages and by accustoming him to human ways.'

"And, Aggivessana, the elephant tamer, having answered 'Yes, sire,' in assent to the noble anointed king, driving a great post into the ground ties the forest elephant to it by his neck so as to subdue his forest ways ... and accustom him to human ways.

Then the elephant tamer addresses him with such words as are gentle, pleasing to the ear, affectionate, going to the heart, urbane, pleasant to the manyfolk, liked by the manyfolk.

And, Aggivessana, the forest elephant, on being addressed with words that are gentle ... liked by the manyfolk, listens, lends ear and bends his mind to learning.

Next the elephant tamer supplies him with grass-fodder and water.

When, Aggivessana, the forest elephant has accepted the grass-fodder and water from the elephant tamer, it occurs to the elephant tamer:

'The king's elephant will now live.'

Then the elephant tamer makes him do a further task, saying:

'Take up, put down.'

When, Aggivessana the king's elephant is obedient to the elephant tamer and acts on his instructions to take up and put down, then the elephant tamer makes him do a further task, saying:

'Get up, sit down.'

When, Aggivessana, the king's elephant is obedient to the elephant tamer and acts on his instructions to get up and sit down, then the elephant tamer makes him do a further task; known as 'standing your ground': he ties a shield to the great beast's trunk; a man holding a lance is sitting on his neck, and men holding lances are standing surrounding him on all sides; and the elephant tamer, holding a lance with a long shaft, is standing in front.

While he is doing the task of 'standing your ground' he does not move a fore-leg nor does he move a hind-leg, nor does he move the forepart of his body, nor does he move the hindpart of his body, nor does he move his head, nor does he move an ear, nor does he move a tusk, nor does he move his tail, nor does he move his trunk.

A king's elephant is one who endures blows of sword, axe, arrow, hatchet, and the resounding din of drum and kettle-drum, conch and tam-tam, he is [like] purified gold purged of all its dross and impurities, fit for a king, a royal possession and reckoned as a kingly attribute.

Acquisition of faith

"Even so, Aggivessana, does a Tathāgata arise here in the world, a perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, endowed with right knowledge and conduct, well-farer, knower of the worlds, the matchless charioteer of men to be tamed, the Awakened One, the Lord.

He makes known this world with the devas, with Mara, with Brahma, the creation with its recluses and brahmans, its devas and men, having realized them by his own super-knowledge.

He teaches dhamma which is lovely at the beginning, lovely in the middle, lovely at the ending, with the spirit and the letters; he proclaims the Brahma-faring,<sup>3</sup> wholly fulfilled, quite purified.

A householder or a householder's son or one born in another family hears that dhamma.

Having heard that dhamma he gains faith in the Tathāgata.

Endowed with this faith that he has acquired, he reflects in this way:

"The household life is confined and dusty, going forth is in the open; it is not easy for one who lives in a house to fare the Brahma-faring wholly fulfilled, wholly pure, polished like a conch-shell.

Suppose now that I, having cut off hair and beard, having put on saffron robes, should go forth from home into homelessness?'

After a time, getting rid of his wealth, be it small or great, getting rid of his circle of relations, be it small or great, having cut off his hair and beard, having put on saffron robes, he goes forth from home into homelessness.

To this extent, Aggivessana, the ariyan disciple gets out into the open.

Morality

"But, Aggivessana, devas and mankind have this longing, that is to say, for the five strands of sense-pleasures.

The Tathāgata disciplines him further, saying:

'Come you, monk, be moral, live controlled by the control of the Obligations, possessed of [right] behaviour and posture, seeing danger in the slightest faults; undertaking them, train yourself in the rules of training.'

Sense-Control

"And when, Aggivessana, the ariyan disciple is moral, lives controlled by the control ..., undertaking them, trains himself in the rules of training, then the Tathāgata disciplines him further, saying:

'Come you, monk, be guarded as to the doors of the sense-organs. Having seen a material shape with the eye ...(as above).

Having cognized a mental state with the mind, be not entranced by the general appearance, be not entranced by the detail.

For if you dwell with the organ of mind uncontrolled, covetousness and dejection, evil unskillful states of mind, might flow in.

So fare along with its control, guard the organ of mind, achieve control over the organ of the mind.'

Moderation in eating

"And when, Aggivessana, the ariyan disciple is guarded as to the doors of the sense-organs, then the Tathāgata disciplines him further, saying:

'Come you, monk, be moderate in eating ...(as above) ... abiding in comfort.'

Vigilance

"When, Aggivessana, the ariyan disciple is moderate in eating, the Tathāgata disciplines him further, saying:

'Come you, monk, abide intent on vigilance ...(as above) ... you should cleanse the mind of obstructive mental states.

Mindfulness and clear consciousness

"And when, Aggivessana, the ariyan disciple is intent on vigilance, then the Tathāgata disciplines him further, saying:

'Come you, monk, be possessed of mindfulness and clear consciousness.

Be one who acts with clear consciousness ... (as above) ... talking, silent.'

Overcoming of the five hindrances

"And when, Aggivessana, the ariyan disciple is possessed of mindfulness and clear consciousness, then the Tathāgata disciplines him further, saying:

'Come you, monk, choose a remote lodging in a forest, at the root of a tree, on a mountain slope, in a wilderness, in a hill-cave, a cemetery, a forest haunt, in the open or on a heap of straw.'

He chooses a remote lodging in the forest ... or on a heap of straw.

Returning from alms-gathering, after the meal, he sits down cross-legged, holding the back erect, having made mindfulness rise up in front of him, he, by getting rid of coveting for the world, dwells with a mind devoid of coveting, he purifies the mind of coveting.

By getting rid of the taint of ill-will, he dwells benevolent in mind, compassionate for the welfare of all creatures and beings, he purifies the mind of the taint of ill-will.

By getting rid of sloth and torpor, he dwells devoid of sloth and torpor; perceiving the light, mindful, clearly conscious, he purifies the mind of sloth and torpor.

By getting rid of restlessness and worry, he dwells calmly the mind subjectively tranquilized, he purifies the mind of restlessness and worry.

By getting rid of doubt, he dwells doubt-crossed, unperplexed as to the states that are skillful, he purifies the mind of doubt.

The four applications of mindfulness

"He, by getting rid of these five hindrances which are defilements of the mind and weakening to intuitive wisdom, dwells contemplating the body in the body, ardent, clearly conscious [of it], mindful [of it] so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world.

He fares along contemplating the feelings ... the mind ... the mental states in mental states, ardent, clearly conscious [of them], mindful [of them] so as to control the covetousness and dejection in the world.

"As, Aggivessana, an elephant tamer, driving a great post into the ground, ties a forest elephant to it by his neck so as to subdue his forest ways, so as to subdue his forest aspirations, and so as to subdue his distress, his fretting and fever for the forest, so as to make him pleased with villages and accustom him to human ways — even so, Aggivessana, these four applications of mindfulness are ties of the mind so as to subdue the ways of householders and to subdue the aspirations of householders and to subdue the distress, the fretting and fever of householders; they are for leading to the right path, for realizing nibbana.

"The Tathāgata then disciplines him further, saying:

'Come you, monk, fare along contemplating the body in the body, but do not apply yourself to a train of thought connected with the body; fare along contemplating the feelings in the feelings ... the mind in the mind ... mental states in mental states, but do not apply yourself to a train of thought connected with mental states.'

Jhana

"He by allaying initial thought and discursive thought, with the mind subjectively tranquilized and fixed on one point, enters on and abides in the second meditation<sup>4</sup> which is devoid of initial and discursive thought, is born of concentration and is rapturous and joyful.

By the fading out of rapture, he dwells with equanimity, attentive and clearly conscious, and experiences in his person that joy of which the ariyans say: 'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,' and he enters and abides in the third meditation.

By getting rid of joy, by getting rid of anguish, by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows, he enters and abides in the fourth meditation which has neither anguish nor joy, and which is entirely purified by equanimity and mindfulness.

The three knowledges

1. Recollection of former habitations

"Then with the mind composed thus, quite purified, quite clarified, without blemish, without defilement, grown pliant and workable, fixed, immovable, he directs his mind to the knowledge and recollection of former habitation: he remembers a variety of former habitations, thus: one birth, two births, three ... four ... five ... ten ... twenty ... thirty ... forty ... fifty ... a hundred ... a thousand ... a hundred thousand births, and many an eon of integration and many an eon of disintegration and many an eon of integration-disintegration:

'Such a one was I by name, having such a clan, such and such a colour, so was I nourished, such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine, so did the span of life end.

Passing from this, I came to be in another state where such a one was I by name, having such and such a clan, such and such a colour, so was I nourished, such and such pleasant and painful experiences were mine, so did the span of life end.

Passing from this, I arose here.'

Thus he remembers divers former habitations in all their modes and details.

2. The Divine Eye

"Then with the mind composed, quite purified, quite clarified, without blemish, without defilement, grown pliant and workable, fixed, immovable, he directs his mind to the knowledge of the passing hence and the arising of beings. With the purified deva-vision surpassing that of men, he sees beings as they pass hence or come to be; he comprehends that beings are mean, excellent, comely, ugly, well-going, ill-going, according to the consequence of their deeds, the he thinks:

Indeed these worthy beings who were possessed of wrong conduct in body, who were possessed of wrong conduct in speech, who were possessed of wrong conduct of thought, scoffers at the ariyans, holding a wrong view, incurring deeds consequent on a wrong view — these, at the breaking up of the body after dying, have arisen in a sorrowful state, a bad bourn, the abyss, Niraya hell.

But these worthy beings who were possessed of good conduct in body, who were possessed of good conduct in speech, who were possessed of good conduct in thought, who did not scoff at the ariyans, holding a right view, incurring deeds consequent on a right view — these, at the breaking up of the body, after dying, have arisen in a good bourn, a heaven world.

3. Destruction of Cankers: Sainthood

"Then with the mind composed ... immovable, he directs his mind to the knowledge of the destruction of the cankers.<sup>5</sup>

He understands as it really is:

This is anguish,<sup>6</sup> this is the arising of anguish, this is the stopping of anguish, this is the course leading to the stopping of anguish.

He understands as it really is:

These are the cankers, this is the arising of the cankers, this is the stopping of the cankers, this is the course leading to the stopping of the cankers.

Knowing thus, seeing thus, his mind is freed from the canker of sense pleasures, is freed from the canker of becoming, freed from the canker of ignorance.

In freedom the knowledge came to be:

I am freed; and he comprehends:

Destroyed is birth, brought to a close is the Brahma-faring, done is what was to be done, there is no more of being such or such.

"That monk is able to endure, heat, cold, hunger, thirst, the touch of mosquitoes, gadflies, wind, sun and creeping things, abusive language and unwelcome modes of speech: he has grown to bear bodily feelings which as they arise are painful, acute, sharp, severe, wretched, miserable, deadly.

Purged of all the dross and impurities of attachment, aversion and confusion,<sup>7</sup> he is worthy of oblations, offerings, respect and homage, an unsurpassed field of merit in the world.

"If, Aggivessana, a king's elephant dies in old age, untamed, untrained, the king's old elephant that has died is reckoned as one that has died untamed: And so, Aggivessana, of a king's elephant that is middle-aged.

And too, Aggivessana, if a king's elephant dies young, untamed, untrained, the king's young elephant that has died is reckoned as one that has died untamed.

Even so, Aggivessana, if a monk who is an elder dies with the cankers not destroyed, the monk who is an elder that has died is reckoned as one that has died untamed.

And so of a monk of middle standing.

And too, Aggivessana, if a newly ordained monk dies with the cankers not destroyed, the newly ordained monk that has died is reckoned as one that has died untamed.

If, Aggivessana, a king's elephant dies in old age, well tamed, well trained, the king's old elephant that has died is reckoned as one that has died tamed.

And so, Aggivessana of a king's elephant that is middle-aged.

And too, Aggivessana, if a king's elephant dies young, well tamed, well trained, the king's young elephant that has died is reckoned as one that has died tamed.

Even so, Aggivessana, if a monk who is an elder dies with the cankers destroyed, the monk who is an elder that has died is reckoned as one that has died tamed.

And so, Aggivessana, of a monk of middle standing.

And too, Aggivessana, if a newly ordained monk dies with cankers destroyed, the newly ordained monk that has died is reckoned as one that has died tamed."

Thus spoke the Lord. Delighted, the novice Aciravata rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

---

<sup>1</sup> A hut in a secluded part of the Bamboo Grove for the use of monks who wanted to practice striving, padhana — [Commentary].

<sup>2</sup> A son of King Bimbisara.

<sup>3</sup> Brahmacariyam: the pure life of a celibate recluse [Ed., The Wheel].

<sup>4</sup> It is noteworthy that the section on the Four Applications of Mindfulness (satipatthana) is here followed by the second meditation (jhana) without mention of the first. This may either refer to a meditator who, already previously, has attained to the first jhana, or, which seems more probable, it is meant to indicate that the intensive practice of Satipatthana which, through emphasis on bare observation, tends to reduce discursive thought, and enables the meditator to enter directly into the second jhana, which is free from initial and discursive thought (vitakka-vicara). This latter explanation is favoured by the facts that (1) in our text, the practice of Satipatthana is preceded by the temporary abandonment of the five Hindrances, which indicates a high degree of concentration approaching that of the jhana; (2) in our text, the meditator is advised not to engage in the thought about the body, feelings, etc. — that is, in discursive thinking, which is still present in the first jhana. [Ed., The Wheel].

<sup>5</sup> Asava.

<sup>6</sup> Dukkha: usually rendered by "suffering" or "ill" [Ed., The Wheel].

<sup>7</sup> Raga, dosa, moha.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
3. Suññata Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Emptiness

126. Discourse to Bhūmija

Bhūmija Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Rājagaha
in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels' feeding place.

Then the venerable Bhūmija,<sup>1</sup> having dressed early in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe,
approached Prince Jayasena's abode;
[184] having approached,
he sat down on the appointed seat.

And Prince Jayasena approached the venerable Bhūmija;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the venerable Bhūmija;
having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance,
Prince Jayasena spoke thus to the venerable Bhūmija:

"There are, good Bhūmija, some recluses and brahmans
who speak thus
and are of these views:

'If one fares the Brahma-faring with an expectation,<sup>2</sup>
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if one fares the Brahma-faring
without an expectation,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if one fares the Brahma-faring both with an expectation and without,<sup>3</sup>
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if one fares the Brahma-faring neither with an expectation nor without,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.'

What does the good Bhūmija's teacher say about this,
what does he point out?"

"I have not heard this face to face with the Lord, Prince,
nor have I learnt it face to face.

But the situation exists
that the Lord might explain it thus:

If, with an expectation,
one fares the Brahma-faring inattentively,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if, without an expectation,
one fares the Brahma-faring inattentively,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if, both with an expectation and without an expectation,
one fares the Brahma-faring inattentively,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if, neither with an expectation nor without an expectation,
one fares the Brahma-faring inattentively,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

■

But if, with an expectation,
one fares the Brahma-faring attentively,
one is capable of obtaining the fruit.

But if, without an expectation,
one fares the Brahma-faring attentively,
one is capable of obtaining the fruit.

But if, both with an expectation and without,
one fares the Brahma-faring attentively,
one is capable of obtaining the fruit.

But if, neither with an expectation nor without,
one fares the Brahma-faring attentively,
one is capable of obtaining the fruit.

I have not heard this face to face with the Lord, Prince,
I have not learnt it face to face.

But the situation exists
that the Lord might explain it thus."

"If the good Bhūmija's teacher speaks thus,
points out thus,
it seems to me that the good Bhūmija's teacher stands head and shoulders above<sup>4</sup> all ordinary recluses and brahmans."

Then Prince Jayasena offered the venerable Bhūmija his own (dish of) rice cooked in milk.

---

Then the venerable Bhūmija,
returning from alms-gathering after [185] the meal,
approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the venerable Bhūmija spoke thus to the Lord:

"Now, revered sir, I, having dressed early in the morning<sup>5</sup>, taking bowl and robe,
approached Prince Jayasena's abode;
having approached,
I sat down on the appointed seat.

And Prince Jayasena approached me;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with me;
having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Prince Jayasena spoke thus to me:

"There are, good Bhūmija, some recluses and brahmins
who speak thus
and are of these views:

'If one fares the Brahma-faring with an expectation,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if one fares the Brahma-faring
without an expectation,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if one fares the Brahma-faring both with an expectation and without,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if one fares the Brahma-faring neither with an expectation nor without,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.'

What does the good Bhūmija's teacher say about this,
what does he point out?"

"I have not heard this face to face with the Lord, Prince,
nor have I learnt it face to face.

But the situation exists
that the Lord might explain it thus:

If, with an expectation,
one fares the Brahma-faring inattentively,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if, without an expectation,
one fares the Brahma-faring inattentively,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if, both with an expectation and without an expectation,
one fares the Brahma-faring inattentively,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if, neither with an expectation nor without an expectation,
one fares the Brahma-faring inattentively,
one is incapable of obtaining the fruit.

■

But if, with an expectation,
one fares the Brahma-faring attentively,
one is capable of obtaining the fruit.

But if, without an expectation,
one fares the Brahma-faring attentively,
one is capable of obtaining the fruit.

But if, both with an expectation and without,
one fares the Brahma-faring attentively,
one is capable of obtaining the fruit.

But if, neither with an expectation nor without,
one fares the Brahma-faring attentively,
one is capable of obtaining the fruit.

I have not heard this face to face with the Lord, Prince,
I have not learnt it face to face.

But the situation exists
that the Lord might explain it thus."

"If the good Bhūmija's teacher speaks thus,
points out thus,
it seems to me that the good Bhūmija's teacher stands head and shoulders above all ordinary recluses and brahmans."

I hope, revered sir, that when questioned thus
and answering thus,
I was asserting (fairly) what the Lord affirms, that I was not misrepresenting the Lord
with what is not fact,
but was explaining a dhamma
that conforms to dhamma
and that no fellow dhamma-man, a holder of (my) views, comes to a position incurring blame?"<sup>6</sup>

"Indeed, Bhūmija, when questioned thus
and answering thus,
you were asserting (fairly) what I<sup>7</sup> affirm, you were not misrepresenting me
with what is not fact,
you were explaining a dhamma
that conforms to dhamma
and no fellow dhamma-man, a holder of (your) views, comes to a position incurring blame.

If, Bhūmija, those recluses or brahmans who are of wrong view,
wrong aspiration,
wrong speech,
wrong action,
wrong mode of livelihood,
wrong endeavour,

wrong mindfulness,
wrong concentration,
fare the Brahma-faring with an expectation,
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring without an expectation
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring both with an expectation and without
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring neither with an expectation nor without,
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

What is the reason for this?

This is not the method,<sup>8</sup> Bhūmija, for obtaining the fruit.

■

Bhūmija, it is like a man walking about in need of oil, seeking for oil,
looking about for oil
who, having heaped sand into a trough, should press it
while sprinkling it continuously with water.

Even though he had an expectation,
he would be incapable of obtaining oil by heaping sand into a trough
and pressing it
while sprinkling it continuously with water.

And even though he were without an expectation,
he would be incapable of obtaining oil
by heaping sand into a trough

and pressing it
while sprinkling it continuously with water.

And even though he were both with an expectation and without,
he would be incapable of obtaining oil
by heaping sand into a trough
and pressing it
while sprinkling it continuously with water.

And even though he were neither with an expectation nor without,
he would be incapable of obtaining oil
by heaping sand into a trough
and pressing it
while sprinkling it continuously with water.

What is the reason for this?

[186] This is not the method, Bhūmija, for obtaining oil.

In the same way, Bhūmija,
if those recluses or brahmans
who are of wrong view,
wrong aspiration,
wrong speech,
wrong action,
wrong mode of livelihood,
wrong endeavour,
wrong mindfulness,
wrong concentration,
fare the Brahma-faring with an expectation,
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring without an expectation
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring both with an expectation and without they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring neither with an expectation nor without, they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

What is the reason for this?

This is not the method, Bhūmija,
for obtaining the fruit.

■

Bhūmija, it is like a man walking about in need of milk, seeking for milk,
looking about for milk,
who should pull a young cow by the horn.

Even though he had an expectation,
he would be incapable of obtaining milk
by pulling the young cow by the horn.

And even though he were without an expectation,
he would be incapable of obtaining milk
by pulling the young cow by the horn.

And even though he were both with an expectation and without,
he would be incapable of obtaining milk
by pulling the young cow by the horn.

And even though he were neither with an expectation nor without,
he would be incapable of obtaining milk
by pulling the young cow by the horn.

What is the reason for this?

This is not the method, Bhūmija, for obtaining milk.

In the same way, Bhūmija,
if those recluses or brahmans
who are of wrong view,
wrong aspiration,
wrong speech,
wrong action,
wrong mode of livelihood,
wrong endeavour,
wrong mindfulness,
wrong concentration,
fare the Brahma-faring with an expectation,
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring without an expectation
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring both with an expectation and without
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring neither with an expectation nor without,
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

What is the reason for this?

This is not the method, Bhūmija,
for obtaining the fruit.

■

Bhūmija, it is like a man walking about in need of butter, seeking for butter,
looking about for butter who, having sprinkled water into a jar, should swirl it round with a churning-stick.<sup>9</sup>

Even though he had an expectation,
he would be incapable of obtaining butter

by sprinkling water into a jar
and swirling it round with a churning-stick.

And even though he were without an expectation,
he would be incapable of obtaining butter
by sprinkling water into a jar
and swirling it round with a churning-stick.

And even though he were both with an expectation and without,
he would be incapable of obtaining butter
by sprinkling water into a jar
and swirling it round with a churning-stick.

And even though he were neither with an expectation nor without,
he would be incapable of obtaining butter
by sprinkling water into a jar
and swirling it round with a churning-stick.

What is the reason for this?

This is not the method, Bhūmija, for obtaining butter.

In the same way, Bhūmija,
if those recluses or brahmans
who are of wrong view,
wrong aspiration,
wrong speech,
wrong action,
wrong mode of livelihood,
wrong endeavour,
wrong mindfulness,
wrong concentration,
fare the Brahma-faring with an expectation,
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring without an expectation
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring both with an expectation and without they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring neither with an expectation nor without, they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

What is the reason for this?

This is not the method, Bhūmija,
for obtaining the fruit.

■

[187] Bhūmija, it is like a man walking about in need of fire, seeking for fire,
looking about for fire
who, bringing an upper piece of fire-stick, should rub a wet sappy stick (with it).<sup>10</sup>

Even though he had an expectation,
he would be incapable of obtaining fire
by bringing an upper piece of fire-stick
and rubbing a wet sappy stick (with it).

And even though he were without an expectation,
he would be incapable of obtaining fire
by bringing an upper piece of fire-stick
and rubbing a wet sappy stick (with it).

And even though he were both with an expectation and without,
he would be incapable of obtaining fire
by bringing an upper piece of fire-stick
and rubbing a wet sappy stick (with it).

And even though he were neither with an expectation nor without,
he would be incapable of obtaining fire

by bringing an upper piece of fire-stick
and rubbing a wet sappy stick (with it).

What is the reason for this?

This is not the method, Bhūmija,
for obtaining fire.

In the same way, Bhūmija,
if those recluses or brahmans
who are of wrong view,
wrong aspiration,
wrong speech,
wrong action,
wrong mode of livelihood,
wrong endeavour,
wrong mindfulness,
wrong concentration,
fare the Brahma-faring with an expectation,
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring without an expectation
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring both with an expectation and without
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring neither with an expectation nor without,
they are incapable of obtaining the fruit.

What is the reason for this?

This is not the method, Bhūmija,
for obtaining the fruit.

---

But if, Bhūmija, those recluses or brahmans who are of right view,
right aspiration,
right speech,
right action,
right mode of livelihood,
right endeavour,
right mindfulness,
right concentration,
fare the Brahma-faring with an expectation,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring without an expectation,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring both with an expectation and without,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring neither with an expectation nor without,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

What is the reason for this?

This is the method, Bhūmija,
for obtaining the fruit.

■

Bhūmija, it is like a man walking about in need of oil,
seeking for oil,
looking about for oil
who, having heaped oil-seeds into a trough, should press them
while sprinkling them continuously with water.

If he had an expectation,
he would be capable of obtaining oil by heaping oil-seeds into a trough
and pressing them
while sprinkling them continuously with water.

What is the reason for this?

This is the method, Bhūmija, for obtaining oil.

And if he were without an expectation,
he would be capable of obtaining oil
by heaping oil-seeds into a trough
and pressing them
while sprinkling them continuously with water.

What is the reason for this?

This is the method, Bhūmija, for obtaining oil.

And if he were both with an expectation and without,
he would be capable of obtaining oil
by heaping oil-seeds into a trough
and pressing them
while sprinkling them continuously with water.

What is the reason for this?

This is the method, Bhūmija, for obtaining oil.

And if he were neither with an expectation nor without,
he would be capable of obtaining oil
by heaping oil-seeds into a trough
and pressing them
while sprinkling them continuously with water.

What is the reason for this?

This is the method, Bhūmija, for obtaining oil.

In the same way, Bhūmija, those recluses or brahmans
who are of right view,
right aspiration,
right speech,
right action,
right mode of livelihood,
right endeavour,
right mindfulness,
right concentration,
fare the Brahma-faring with an expectation,
they are capable of [188] obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring without an expectation,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring both with an expectation and without,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring neither with an expectation nor without,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

What is the reason for this?

This is the method, Bhūmija,
for obtaining the fruit.

■

Bhūmija, it is like a man walking about in need of milk,
seeking for milk,
looking about for milk,
who should pull a young cow by the teat.

If he had an expectation
he would be capable of obtaining milk

by pulling the young cow by the teat.

And if he were without an expectation
he would be capable of obtaining milk
by pulling the young cow by the teat.

And if he were both with an expectation and without
he would be capable of obtaining milk
by pulling the young cow by the teat.

And if he were neither with an expectation nor without
he would be capable of obtaining milk
by pulling the young cow by the teat.

What is the reason for this?

This is the method, Bhūmija, for obtaining milk.

In the same way, Bhūmija, those recluses or brahmins
who are of right view,
right aspiration,
right speech,
right action,
right mode of livelihood,
right endeavour,
right mindfulness,
right concentration,
fare the Brahma-faring with an expectation,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring without an expectation,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring both with an expectation and without,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring neither with an expectation nor without, they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

What is the reason for this?

This is the method, Bhūmija, for obtaining the fruit.

■

Bhūmija, it is like a man walking about in need of butter, seeking for butter, looking about for butter who, having sprinkled curds into a jar, should swirl them around with a churning-stick.

If he had an expectation he would be capable of obtaining butter by sprinkling curds into a jar and swirling them around with a churning-stick.

And if he were without an expectation he would be capable of obtaining butter by sprinkling curds into a jar and swirling them around with a churning-stick.

And if he were both with an expectation and without he would be capable of obtaining butter by sprinkling curds into a jar and swirling them around with a churning-stick.

And if he were neither with an expectation nor without he would be capable of obtaining butter by sprinkling curds into a jar and swirling them around with a churning-stick.

What is the reason for this?

This is the method, Bhūmija, for obtaining butter.

In the same way, Bhūmija, those recluses or brahmans
who are of right view,
right aspiration,
right speech,
right action,
right mode of livelihood,
right endeavour,
right mindfulness,
right concentration,
fare the Brahma-faring with an expectation,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring without an expectation,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring both with an expectation and without,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring neither with an expectation nor without,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

What is the reason for this?

This is the method, Bhūmija,
for obtaining the fruit.

■

Bhūmija, it is like a man walking about in need of fire,
seeking for fire,
looking about for fire
who, bringing an upper piece of fire-stick, should rub a dry sapless stick (with it).<sup>11</sup>

And if he had an expectation he would be capable of obtaining fire
by bringing an upper piece [189] of fire-stick and rubbing a dry sapless stick (with it).<sup>12</sup>

And if he were without an expectation,
he would be capable of obtaining fire
by bringing an upper piece of fire-stick
and rubbing a dry sapless stick (with it).

And if he were both with an expectation and without,
he would be capable of obtaining fire
by bringing an upper piece of fire-stick
and rubbing a dry sapless stick (with it).

And if he were neither with an expectation nor without,
he would be capable of obtaining fire
by bringing an upper piece of fire-stick
and rubbing a dry sapless stick (with it).

What is the reason for this?

This is the method, Bhūmija,
for obtaining fire.

In the same way, Bhūmija, those recluses or brahmans
who are of right view,
right aspiration,
right speech,
right action,
right mode of livelihood,
right endeavour,
right mindfulness,
right concentration,
fare the Brahma-faring with an expectation,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring without an expectation,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring both with an expectation and without,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

And if they fare the Brahma-faring neither with an expectation nor without,
they are capable of obtaining the fruit.

What is the reason for this?

This is the method, Bhūmija,
for obtaining the fruit.

If, Bhūmija, these four similes<sup>13</sup> had occurred to you for Prince Jayasena, Prince Jayasena would naturally have trusted you and, having trust,
would have acted in the manner of one having trust in you."

"But how could these four similes for Prince Jayasena have occurred to me,
revered sir,
seeing that they are spontaneous, that is to say to the Lord, and had never been heard before?"<sup>14</sup>

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the venerable Bhūmija rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse to Bhūmija:
The Sixth

---

<sup>1</sup> Uncle of Jayasena, MA. iv. 199. He entered the Order with his friends Sambhūta (Sītavaniya), Jeyyasena and Abhirādhana, ThagA. i. 47.

<sup>2</sup> āsañ ce pi karitvāā, having made a longing, hope or expectation. The word as occurs at e.g. Vin. i. 260.

<sup>3</sup> At times the one, at times the other, MA. iv. 199.

<sup>4</sup> muddhānam āhacca tiṭṭhati, stands striking the head, or pressing it down, therefore above it.

<sup>5</sup> Bhūmija repeats the whole of his conversation with Jayasena. [Ed.: included in this edition]

<sup>6</sup> As at Vin. i. 234.

<sup>7</sup> I follow the v.l. me instead of text's Bhagavato.

<sup>8</sup> ayoni h'esā. Cf. S. i. 203, ayonim patinissajja.

<sup>9</sup> matthena āviñjeyya. In the simile of pulling the young cow by the horn we get visāṇato āviñjeyya. But the precise meaning of āviñjati in these similes is obscure. In this one it seems to mean to twirl, to churn. Matthena should perhaps read matthakena, top, summit. Or has some confusion with the verb mathati, to stir, crept in (cf. abhimattheyya in the next simile)? Or should the reading be manthena, with a churning-stick? I have adopted tentatively this last alternative as it makes here, and in the "favourable" simile below, the greater amount of sense.

<sup>10</sup> Cf. M. i. 240.

<sup>11</sup> Cf. M. i. 242.

<sup>12</sup> This phrase, from "And if," missed out in the text, is needed both for the balance of these expectation clauses and for that of this favourable firesimile with the unfavourable one, no less than for that of the construction of all the simile-paragraphs.

<sup>13</sup> Cf. M. iii. 131 (two similes).

<sup>14</sup> This is a very curious ending to a Discourse, and seems little more than an absent-minded repetition of M. iii. 131.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
3. Suññata Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Emptiness

127. Discourse with Anuruddha

Anuruddha Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Then the carpenter Fivetools<sup>1</sup> addressed a certain man,
saying:

"Come you, my good man,
approach the venerable Anuruddha;
having approached him,
in my name salute the venerable Anuruddha's feet with your head and speak thus:

'Fivetools the carpenter, revered sir, salutes the venerable Anuruddha's feet with his head
and speaks thus:

'Revered sir,
may the venerable Anuruddha and three others<sup>2</sup> consent to a meal with Fivetools the carpenter
on the morrow;
and, revered sir,
may the venerable Anuruddha arrive punctually as Fivetools the carpenter is very busy and has much to do
that is to be done for the king.'

And the man, having answered
"Yes, sir,"
in assent to Fivetools the carpenter, approached the venerable Anuruddha;
having approached and greeted the venerable Anuruddha,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance this man spoke thus to the venerable Anuruddha:

"Fivetools the carpenter salutes the venerable Anuruddha's feet with his head
and speaks thus:

'Revered sir,
may the venerable Anuruddha
and three others
consent to a meal with Fivetools the carpenter
on the morrow;
and, revered sir,
may the venerable Anuruddha arrive punctually
as Fivetools the carpenter is very busy
and has much to do
that is to be done for the king.'

The venerable Anuruddha consented by becoming silent.

Then the venerable Anuruddha,
towards the end of that night, having dressed in the early morning,
taking his bowl and robe approached the abode of Fivetools the carpenter;
having approached,
he sat down on the appointed seat.

Then Fivetools the carpenter
with his own hand
served and satisfied the venerable Anuruddha with sumptuous food,
solid and soft.

And when the venerable Anuruddha had eaten and had withdrawn his hand from the bowl, [191] Fivetools the carpenter, taking a low seat,
sat down at a respectful distance.

As Fivetools the carpenter was sitting down at a respectful distance, he spoke thus to the venerable Anuruddha:

"Now, revered sir,
monks who are elders,
have approached me and spoken thus:

'Householder, develop boundless<sup>3</sup> freedom of mind.'

Some elders spoke thus:

'Householder, develop widespread<sup>4</sup> freedom of mind.'

Revered sir, as to boundless freedom of mind and widespread freedom of mind - are these states different in connotation

as well as different in denotation, or are they identical in connotation and different only in denotation?"<sup>5</sup>

"Well then, householder, speak forth what occurs to you about this;
from doing so it will become clear to you."

"Revered sir, it occurs to me thus:

That which is boundless freedom of mind and that which is widespread freedom of mind - these states are identical in connotation, differing only in denotation."

"Householder, as to that which is boundless freedom of mind and that which is wide-spread freedom of mind - these states are different in connotation
as well as different in denotation.

Wherefore, householder, this should be understood according to the method whereby these states are different in connotation
as well as different in denotation.

And what, householder, is boundless freedom of mind?

As to this, householder, a monk abides,
having suffused the first quarter with a mind of friendliness,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;

he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of friendliness
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of compassion,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of compassion
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of sympathetic joy,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,

below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of sympathetic joy
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

■

He dwelt, having suffused the first quarter with a mind of equanimity,
likewise the second,
likewise the third,
likewise the fourth;
just so above,
below,
across;
he dwelt having suffused the whole world
everywhere,
in every way,
with a mind of equanimity
that was far-reaching,
wide-spread,
immeasurable,
without enmity,
without malevolence.

This, householder, is called boundless freedom of mind.

---

And what, householder, is widespread freedom of mind?

As to this, householder, a monk,
thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as a single root of a tree, dwells suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation).<sup>6</sup>

This, householder, is called the freedom of mind [192] that is widespread.

As to this, householder, a monk,
thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as two or three roots of a tree, dwells suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation).

This, householder, is called the freedom of mind that is widespread.

As to this, householder, a monk,
thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as one village-field, dwells suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation).

This, householder, is called the freedom of mind that is widespread.

As to this, householder, a monk,
thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as two or three village-fields,
dwells suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation).

This, householder, is called the freedom of mind that is widespread.

As to this, householder, a monk,
thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as one kingdom,
dwells suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation).

This, householder, is called the freedom of mind that is widespread.

As to this, householder, a monk,
thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as two or three kingdoms,
dwells suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation).

This, householder, is called the freedom of mind that is widespread.

As to this, householder, a monk,
thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as the seagirt earth,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation).

This, householder, is called the freedom of mind that is widespread.

Wherefore, householder, this should be understood according to the method whereby these states are different in connotation
as well as different in denotation.

---

These, householder, are four uprisings into a (new) becoming.

What four?

As to this, householder, someone,
thinking of limited light,
abides suffusing and pervading (it in meditation);
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in companionship with the devas of limited Light.

As to this, householder, someone,
thinking of boundless light<sup>7</sup>,
abides suffusing and pervading (it in meditation);
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in companionship with the devas of boundless Light.

As to this, householder, someone,
thinking of tarnished Light,
abides suffusing and pervading (it in meditation);
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in companionship
with the devas of tarnished Light.

As to this, householder, someone,
thinking of pure light,
abides suffusing and pervading (it in meditation);
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in companionship
with the devas of pure Light.

These, householder, are four uprisings
into a (new) becoming.

There is a time, householder, when those that are devatās gather together;
when they are gathered together a difference in colour<sup>8</sup> can be seen but not a difference in light.

It is as though, householder,
a man should take several oil-lamps into a house;
when they are being taken into the house a difference in flame would be discernible but not a difference in light.

Even so, householder,
at the time when those that are devatās gather together;
when they are gathered together a difference in colour can be seen but not a difference in light.

There is a time, householder, when those that are [193] devatās go away from there;
when they are going away from there
not only can a difference in colour be seen but also a difference in light.

It is as though, householder,
a man should take out those several oil-lamps from that house; when these are being taken out from there not only would a difference in flame be discernible but also a difference in light.

Even so, householder,
there is a time when those that are devatās go away from there;
when they are going away from there
not only can a difference in colour be seen
but also a difference in light.

Householder, this does not occur to those devatās:

'This is permanent
or steadfast
or eternal for us.'

Moreover, wherever it may be that these devatās are dwelling it is there that these devatās enjoy themselves.

As, householder, it does not occur to flies as they are being borne along on a pingo<sup>9</sup> or basket:

'This is permanent
or steadfast
or eternal for us,'

and as, moreover, wherever it may be that those flies are living it is there that these flies enjoy themselves; in the same way, householder, it does not occur to those devatās:

'This is permanent
or steadfast
or eternal for us,'

and, moreover, wherever it may be that those devatās are dwelling it is there that these devatās enjoy themselves,"

---

When this had been said, the venerable Abhiya Kaccāna<sup>10</sup> spoke thus to the venerable Anuruddha:

"It is good, revered Anuruddha,
but I have something further to ask on this matter.

Are those that are devas of Light, revered sir, all of limited Light or are there some devatās of boundless Light?"

"According to circumstances,<sup>11</sup> reverend Kaccāna, some devatās there are of limited Light but other devatās there are of boundless Light."

"What is the cause, revered Anuruddha,
what the reason
that, although these devatās have uprisen into a single class of devatās, there are some devatās there of limited Light and other devatās there of boundless Light?"

"Well then, reverend Kaccāna, on this matter I will ask you a question in return.

As it pleases you so you may answer it.

What do you think about this, reverend Kaccāna?

This that the monk, when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as a single root of [194] a tree,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation);
and this that the monk,
when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as two or three roots of a tree, abides suffusing and pervading (that size) - of these two developments of mind<sup>12</sup> which is the more widespread?"

"This that the monk, revered sir,
when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as two or three roots of a tree,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size) -
this of these two developments of mind
is the more widespread."

"What do you think about this, reverend Kaecāna?

This that the monk,
when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as two or three roots of a tree,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation);

and this that the monk,
when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as a single village-field,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size) -
of these two developments of mind
which is the more widespread?"

"This that the monk, revered sir, when thinking (meditation) is widespread like,
like as a single village-field,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size) -
this of these two developments of mind
is the more widespread."

"What do you think about this, reverend Kaecāna?"

This that the monk,
when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as a single village-field,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation);
and this that the monk,
when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as two or three village-fields,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size) -
of these two developments of mind
which is the more widespread?"

"This that the monk, revered sir,
when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as two or three village-fields,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation) -
this of these two developments of mind
is the more widespread."

"What do you think about this, reverend Kaccāna?"

This that the monk, when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as two or three village-fields,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation);
and this that the monk, when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as a single kingdom,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation) -
of these two developments of mind
which is the more widespread?"

"This that the monk, revered sir, when thinking (meditation) is [195] widespread like as a single kingdom,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size) -
this of these two developments of mind
is the more widespread."

"What do you think about this, reverend Kaccāna?"

This that the monk, when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as a single kingdom,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation);
and this that the monk, when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as two or three kingdoms,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation) -
of these two developments of mind
which is the more widespread?"

"This that the monk, revered sir,
when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as two or three kingdoms,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size) -
this of these two developments of mind
is the more widespread."

"What do you think about this, reverend Kaccāna?"

This that the monk,
when thinking (meditation) is widespread

like as two or three kingdoms,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation);
and this that the monk,
when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as the sea-girt earth,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size in meditation) -
of these two developments of mind
which is the more widespread?"

"This that the monk, revered sir,
when thinking (meditation) is widespread
like as the sea-girt earth,
abides suffusing and pervading (that size) -
this of these two developments of mind
is the more widespread."

"This is the cause, reverend Kaccāna, this is the reason
that, although these devatās have uprisen into a single class of devatās, there are some devatās there of limited Light
and other devatās there of boundless Light."

"It is good, revered Anuruddha,
but I have something further to ask on this matter.

---

Are those that<sup>13</sup> are devas of Light, revered sir, all of tarnished Light, or are there some devatās there of pure Light?"

"According to circumstances, revered Kaccāna, some devatās there are of tarnished Light but other devatās there are of pure Light."

"What is the cause, revered Anuruddha, what the reason that, although these devatās have uprisen into a single class of devatās, there are some devatās there of tarnished Light and other devatās there of pure Light?"

[196] "Well then, reverend Kaccāna, I will make a simile for you.

For it is by a simile that some intelligent man here understands the meaning of what is said.

It is as though, reverend Kaccāna, the oil of a burning oil-lamp is foul and the wick is foul.

Because of the foulness of the oil and the foulness of the wick, (the lamp) burns but dimly.

Even so, reverend Kaccāna, some monk here, thinking of tarnished light, abides suffusing and pervading (it in meditation); his bodily unchastity<sup>14</sup> is not properly suppressed, his sloth and torpor are not properly removed,

and his restlessness and worry are not properly disciplined.<sup>15</sup>

Because his bodily unchastity is not properly suppressed, and because his sloth and torpor are not properly removed,
and because his restlessness and worry are not properly disciplined, he burns<sup>16</sup> but dimly.

At the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in companionship
with the devas of tarnished Light.

It is as though, reverend Kaccāna, the oil of a burning oil-lamp is pure and the wick is pure.

Because of the purity of the oil and the purity of the wick, (the lamp) does not burn but dimly.

Even so, reverend Kaccāna, some monk here,
thinking of pure light,
abides suffusing and pervading (it in meditation);
his bodily unchastity
is properly suppressed,
and his sloth and torpor are properly removed,
and his restlessness and worry
are properly disciplined.

Because his bodily unchastity
is properly suppressed,
and because his sloth and torpor

are properly removed,
and because his restlessness and worry
are properly disciplined, he does not burn but dimly.

At the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in companionship
with the devas of pure Light.

This, reverend Kaccāna, is the cause, this the reason
that, although these devatās have uprisen into a single class of devatās,
there are some devatās there of tarnished Light,
and other devatās there of pure Light."

When this had been said, the venerable Abhiya Kaccāna spoke thus to the venerable Anuruddha:

"It is good, revered Anuruddha.

[197] Revered sir, the venerable Anuruddha did not speak thus:

'Thus have I heard'

or

'It ought to be so.'<sup>17</sup>

On the contrary, revered sir, the venerable Anuruddha merely said that these devatās are such and those devatās are thus.

Revered sir, it occurs to me thus:

The venerable Anuruddha must certainly have lived previously and talked previously and held converse previously with these devatās."

"This speech of yours, reverend Kaccāna, comes close and challenges me to a statement;<sup>18</sup> and I, moreover, will answer you.

For a long time have I, reverend Kaccāna, lived previously with these devatās and talked previously to them and held converse previously with them."<sup>19</sup>

When this had been said, the venerable Abhiya Kaccāna spoke thus to Fivetools the carpenter:

"It is a gain for you, householder, it is well gotten by you, householder, that you got rid of the doubt you had and also obtained a chance to hear this disquisition on dhamma."

Discourse with Anuruddha:
The Seventh

---

<sup>1</sup> Pañcakaṅga. See M. i. 386.

<sup>2</sup> attacattuttho as at M. i. 383.

<sup>3</sup> Defined at M. i. 297. Appamāṇa is "boundless" or "immeasurable."

<sup>4</sup> Mahaggata. This and appamāṇa are two words regularly connected with the brahmavihāra.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. M. i. 297.

<sup>6</sup> On pharitvā adhinuccitva see Intr., p. xx.

<sup>7</sup> Text's reading appamāṇā ti should be appamāṇābhā ti, for which there is commentarial support as well as the gaining of the necessary textual consistency.

<sup>8</sup> Of their bodies, sarīra, MA. iv. 201.

<sup>9</sup> For carrying conje, rice, oil, butter, fish, meat, MA. iv. 202.

<sup>10</sup> A variant reading calls him Sabhiya Kaccāna; this is adopted by D.P.P.N. (s.v. Sabhiya 3). There is a Sabhiya Kaccāna at S. iv. 401 f. See also K.S. iv. p. 202, n. 3.

<sup>11</sup> tadaṅgena; explained at MA. iv. 202 as taasā bhavupapattiyā aṅgena, according to the character of their uprising in a (new) becoming.

<sup>12</sup> cittabhāvanānaṃ.

<sup>13</sup> The yāvatā of the text should read yā tā as on text p. 148.

<sup>14</sup> kāyaduṭṭhulla; called kāyālasīyābhāvo at MA. iv. 202, "physical laziness."

<sup>15</sup> Restlessness and worry, and sloth and torpor are two of the five hindrances barring a man's attainment of the jhāna. I suspect that kāyaduṭṭhulla; is here in place of the more usual kāmacchanda, desire for sense-pleasures, the first of these five hindrances.

<sup>16</sup> The verb jhāyati means both to burn and to meditate; but the former is from the Skrt. kṣāyati and the latter from dhyāyati. It seems however that

MA. iv. 202 interprets jhāyati (the monk's "burning" or meditation) by jalati, to burn, to shine. This only shows that meditation, jhāna, is a state of mental incandescence, a burning up of what is to be got rid of, a consuming of it, so that the pure light can shine forth.

<sup>17</sup> evam arahati bhavitum.

<sup>18</sup> āsajja upanīyavācā bhāsītā, as at A. i. 172; see note at G.S. i. 166.

<sup>19</sup> MA. iv. 202 says that, fulfilling the excellences (pāramiyo), having gone forth in the going forth of sages, having practised the attainments, after 300 existences, he attained the Brahma-world.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
3. Suññata Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Emptiness

128. The Discourse on Defilements

Upakkilesa Sutta

---

Thus have I heard:<sup>1</sup>

At one time the Lord was staying near Kosambī in Ghosita's monastery.

Now at that time the monks of Kosambī, who were disputatious,
quarrelsome
and contentious,
lived wounding one another with the weapons of the tongue.<sup>2</sup>

Then a certain monk approached the Lord;
[153] having approached and greeted the Lord,
he stood at a respectful distance.

As he was standing at a respectful [198] distance, this monk spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, the monks of Kosambī, who are disputatious,
quarrelsome
and contentious,
live wounding one another with the weapons of the tongue.

It would be good, revered sir, if the Lord
out of compassion
were to approach these monks."

The Lord consented by becoming silent.

Then the Lord approached those monks
and having approached,
he spoke thus to those monks:

"Enough, monks;
no disputes,
no quarrels,
no contention,
no argument."

When this had been said, a certain monk<sup>3</sup> spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, let the Lord,
the Dhamma-master, wait;
revered sir, let the Lord,
untroubled,
abide intent
on abiding in ease here and now,<sup>4</sup> for it is we who will be (held) accountable for this dispute,

quarrel,
contention
and argument."

■

And a second time the Lord spoke thus to those monks:

"Enough, monks;
no disputes,
no quarrels,
no contention,
no argument."

And a second time did that monk speak thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, let the Lord,
the Dhamma-master, wait;
revered sir, let the Lord,
untroubled,
abide intent
on abiding in ease here and now,
for it is we who will be (held) accountable
for this dispute,
quarrel,
contention
and argument."

And a third time the Lord spoke thus to those monks:

"Enough, monks;
no disputes,
no quarrels,
no contention,
no argument."

And a third time did that monk speak thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, let the Lord,
the Dhamma-master, wait;
revered sir, let the Lord,
untroubled,
abide intent
on abiding in ease here and now,
for it is we who will be (held) accountable
for this dispute,
quarrel,
contention
and argument."

Then the Lord,<sup>5</sup> having dressed early in the morning,
taking his bowl and robe,
entered Kosambī for almsfood.

Having walked in Kosambī for almsfood and returning from the alms-gathering
after the meal,
he packed away his lodging
and, taking his bowl and robe, spoke these verses as he was standing:

[154]"When all in chorus bawl, none feels a fool, nor though the Order is divided, thinks otherwise.

With wandering wits the wiseacres range all the field of talk; with mouths agape to full extent, what leads them on they know not.

They who (in thought) belabour this: That man has me abused, has hurt, has worsted me, has me despoiled: in these wrath's not allayed.

They who do not belabour this: That man has me abused, has hurt, has worsted me,

has me despoiled: in them is wrath allayed.

[199] Nay, not by wrath are wrathful moods allayed here (and) at any time, but by not-wrath are they allayed: this is an (ageless) endless rule.

Some others don't discern that here we straitened are (in life, in time), but those who do discern, thereby their quarrels are allayed.

Ruffians who maim and kill, steal cattle, steeds, and wealth, who plunder realms - for these is concord.
Why should there not be for you?

If one find friend with whom to fare Rapt in the well-abiding, apt, surmounting dangers one and all,
with joy fare with him mindfully.

Finding none apt with whom to fare, none in the well-abiding rapt, as rajah quits the conquered realm, fare lonely as bull-elephant in elephant-jungle.

Better the faring of one alone than companionship with the foolish; fare lonely, unconcerned, working no evil, as bull-elephant in elephant-jungle."

Then the Lord, having spoken these verses as he was standing, approached Bālakaloṇakāra village.

Now at that [155] time
the venerable Bhagu was staying in Bālakaloṇakāra village.

Then the venerable Bhagu saw the Lord coming from afar;
seeing him,

he made ready a seat
and water for the feet.

The Lord sat down on the seat made ready, and as he was sitting down he bathed his feet.

Then the venerable Bhagu,
having greeted the Lord,
sat down at a respectful distance.

The Lord spoke thus to the venerable Bhagu
as he was sitting down at a respectful distance:

"I hope, monk,
things are going well with you,
I hope you are keeping going,
I hope you are not short of almsfood?"

"Things are going well with me, Lord, I am keeping going, Lord, and I, revered sir,
am not short of almsfood."

Then the Lord, [200]
having delighted,
rejoiced,
roused,
gladdened
the venerable Bhagu with talk on dhamma,
rising from his seat,
approached the Eastern Bamboo Grove.

Now at that time<sup>6</sup> the venerable Anuruddha and the venerable Nandiya

and the venerable Kimbila were staying in the Eastern Bamboo Grove.

The keeper of the grove saw the Lord coming in the distance, and seeing him
he spoke thus to the Lord:

"Do not, recluse,
enter this grove;
there are three young men of family staying here desiring Self;
do not cause them discomfort."

But the venerable Anuruddha heard the keeper of the grove conferring with the Lord;
on hearing him,
he spoke thus to the keeper of the grove:

"Do not, good grove-keeper, impede the Lord.

It is our Teacher,
the Lord,
who is arriving."

Then the venerable Anuruddha approached the venerable Nandiya
and the venerable Kimbila,
and having approached
he spoke thus to the venerable Nandiya
and the venerable Kimbila:

"Go forward, venerable ones,
go forward, venerable ones,
our Teacher,

the Lord,
is arriving."

Then the venerable Anuruddha
and the venerable Nandiya
and the venerable Kimbila, went out to meet the Lord.

One received his bowl and robe, one made ready a seat,
one set out water for the feet.

Then the Lord sat down on the seat made ready;
as he was sitting down
the Lord bathed his feet.

Then these venerable ones,
having greeted the Lord,
sat down at a respectful distance.

As the venerable Anuruddha was sitting down at a respectful distance,
the Lord spoke thus:

"I hope things are going well with you, Anuruddhas,<sup>7</sup>
I hope you are keeping going,
I hope you are not short of almsfood?

[156] "Things are going well with us, Lord, we are keeping going, Lord,
and, revered sir,
we are not short of almsfood."

"I hope that you, Anuruddhas, are living all together
on friendly terms

and harmoniously,
as milk and water blend,
regarding one another
with the eye of affection?"

"Yes, certainly, revered sir, we are living all together on friendly terms
and harmoniously,
as milk and water blend,
regarding one another
with the eye of affection."

"And how is it that you, Anuruddhas,
are living all together
on friendly terms
and harmoniously,
as milk and water blend,
regarding one another
with the eye of affection?"

"As to this, revered sir,
it occurred to me:

'Indeed it is a gain for [201] me,
indeed it is well gotten by me,
that I am living with such fellow Brahma-farers.'

On account of this, revered sir, for these venerable ones
friendliness as to acts of body friendliness as to acts of speech friendliness as to acts of thought,
whether openly or in private,
has risen up in me.

Because of this, revered sir,
it occurred to me:

'Now, suppose that I,
having surrendered my own mind,
should live only according to the mind
of these venerable ones?

So I, revered sir,
having surrendered my own mind,
am living only according to the mind
of these venerable ones.

Revered sir, we have divers bodies, but assuredly only one mind."

■

And the venerable Nandiya too
spoke thus to the Lord:

"As to this, revered sir,
it occurred to me:

'Indeed it is a gain for me,
indeed it is well gotten by me,
that I am living with such fellow Brahma-farers.'

On account of this, revered sir,
for these venerable ones
friendliness as to acts of body
friendliness as to acts of speech
friendliness as to acts of thought,
whether openly or in private,
has risen up in me.

Because of this, revered sir,
it occurred to me:

'Now, suppose that I,
having surrendered my own mind,
should live only according to the mind
of these venerable ones?

So I, revered sir,
having surrendered my own mind,
am living only according to the mind
of these venerable ones.

Revered sir, we have divers bodies,
but assuredly only one mind."

■

And the venerable Kimbila too
spoke thus to the Lord:

"As to this, revered sir,
it occurred to me:

'Indeed it is a gain for me,
indeed it is well gotten by me,
that I am living with such fellow Brahma-farers.'

On account of this, revered sir,
for these venerable ones
friendliness as to acts of body
friendliness as to acts of speech
friendliness as to acts of thought,
whether openly or in private,
has risen up in me.

Because of this, revered sir,
it occurred to me:

'Now, suppose that I,
having surrendered my own mind,
should live only according to the mind
of these venerable ones?

So I, revered sir,
having surrendered my own mind,
am living only according to the mind
of these venerable ones.

Revered sir, we have divers bodies,
but assuredly only one mind."

"Thus it is that we, revered sir,
are living all together
on friendly terms
and harmoniously,
as milk and water blend,
regarding one another
with the eye of affection."

"Good, it is good, Anuruddhas.

---

But I hope that you, Anuruddhas, are living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute?"

[157] "Yes, certainly, revered sir, we are living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute."

"And how is it that you, Anuruddhas,
are living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute?"

"As to this, revered sir, whoever of us returns first from (going to) a village for almsfood makes ready a seat, sets out water for drinking and water for washing (the feet), and sets out a refuse-bowl.

Whoever returns last
from (going to) a village for almsfood, if there are the remains of a meal and if he so desires,
he eats them;
if he does not desire to do so,
he throws them out
where there are no crops, or he drops them into water where there are no living creatures;
he puts up the seat,
he puts away the water for drinking and the water for washing, he puts away the refuse-bowl, he sweeps the refectory.

Whoever sees a vessel for drinking-water or a vessel for washing-water or a vessel (for water) for rinsing after evacuation, void and empty,

he sets out (water).

If it is impossible for him (to do this) by a movement of his hand, having invited a companion to help us by signalling (to him) with the hand, we set out (the water);
but we do not, revered sir, for such a reason,
break into speech.

And then we, revered sir, once in every five nights sit down together for talk on dhamma.

It is thus, revered sir, that we are living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute."<sup>8</sup>

[202] "Good, it is good, Anuruddhas.

But have you, Anuruddhas, while living thus diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
attained states of further-men, the excellent knowledge and insight
befitting the ariyans,
an abiding in comfort?"<sup>9</sup>

---

"As to this, we, revered sir, while living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
perceive the light-manifestation<sup>10</sup> as well as the appearance<sup>11</sup> of material shapes.<sup>12</sup>

But soon the light-manifestation vanishes for us
as well as the appearance of material shapes; and we do not understand the reason."<sup>13</sup>

■

"But the reason
should be understood by you, Anuruddhas.

I, too, Anuruddhas, before the Self-Awakening while I was yet the Bodhisatta,
not fully awakened,
perceived the light-manifestation
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

But soon the light-manifestation [158] vanished for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Now what is the cause,
what the reason
that the light-manifestation vanishes for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes?'

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Doubt has arisen in me;
and because there was [203] doubt, concentration fell away from<sup>14</sup> me;

when concentration falls away,
the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

So I will act in such a way
that doubt will not arise in me again.'

So I, Anuruddhas, living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
perceived the light-manifestation
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

■

But soon the light-manifestation vanished for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Now what is the cause,
what the reason
that the light-manifestation vanishes for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes?'

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Lack of proper attention<sup>15</sup> has arisen in me;
and because there was lack of proper attention,
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,
the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

So I will act in such a way
that doubt will not arise in me again
nor lack of proper attention.'

So I, Anuruddhas, living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
perceived the light-manifestation
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

■

But soon the light-manifestation vanished for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Now what is the cause,
what the reason
that the light-manifestation vanishes for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes?'

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Sloth and torpor has arisen in me;
and because there was sloth and torpor,
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,
the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

So I will act in such a way
that doubt will not arise in me again
nor lack of proper attention
nor sloth and torpor.'

So I, Anuruddhas, living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
perceived the light-manifestation
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

■

But soon the light-manifestation vanished for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Now what is the cause,
what the reason
that the light-manifestation vanishes for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes?'

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Consternation has arisen in me;
and because there was consternation,
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,
the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.'

Anuruddhas, it is as though a man were going along a high road and murderers should jump out at him from both sides;
consternation would arise in him from such a source.<sup>16</sup>

Even so, Anuruddhas, did consternation arise in me,
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,

the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

So I thought:

'I will act [159] in such a way
that doubt will not arise in me again
nor lack [204]of proper attention
nor sloth and torpor
nor consternation.'

So I, Anuruddhas, living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
perceived the light-manifestation
as well as the appear-ance of material shapes.

■

But soon the light-manifestation vanished for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Now what is the cause,
what the reason
that the light-manifestation vanishes for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes?'

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Elation<sup>17</sup> has arisen in me;
and because there was elation,
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,
the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.'

Anuruddhas, it is as though a man who was seeking for one opening to (some hidden) treasure were to come at one and the same time on five openings to the treasure;<sup>18</sup> from that source
elation would arise in him.

Even so, Anuruddhas,
elation arose in me;
and because there was elation,
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,
the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

So I thought:

'I will act in such a way
that doubt will not arise in me again
nor lack of proper attention
nor sloth and torpor
nor consternation
nor elation.'

So I, Anuruddhas, living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
perceived the light-manifestation
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

■

But soon the light-manifestation vanished for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Now what is the cause,
what the reason
that the light-manifestation vanishes for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes?'

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Distress has arisen in me;
and because there was distress,
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,
the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

So I will act in such a way
that doubt will not arise in me again
nor lack of proper attention
nor sloth and torpor
nor consternation
nor elation
nor distress.'

So I, Anuruddhas, living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
perceived the light-manifestation
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

■

But soon the light-manifestation vanished for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Now what is the cause,
what the reason

that the light-manifestation vanishes for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes?'

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Too much energy<sup>19</sup> has arisen in me;
and because there was too much energy,
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,
the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

Anuruddhas, it is as though a man were to take such a tight grip of a quail that it died then and there.

Even so, Anuruddhas,
did too much energy arise in me;
and because there was too much energy,
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,
the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

So I thought:

'I will act in such a way
that doubt will not arise in me again
nor lack of proper attention
nor sloth and torpor
nor consternation
nor elation
nor distress
nor too much energy.'

So I, Anuruddhas, living diligent,
ardent,

self-resolute,
perceived the light-manifestation
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

■

But soon the light-manifestation vanished for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Now what is the cause,
what the reason
that the light-manifestation vanishes for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes?'

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Too feeble an energy [160] has arisen in me;
and because there was too feeble an energy;
and because there was too much energy,
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,
the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

Anuruddhas, it is as though a man were to take such a loose [205] grip of a quail that it could fly up out of his hand.

Even so, Anuruddhas, did too feeble an energy arise in me;
and because there was too feeble an energy,
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,
the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

So I thought:

'I will act in such a way
that doubt will not arise in me again
nor lack of proper attention
nor sloth and torpor
nor consternation
nor elation
nor distress
nor too much energy
nor too feeble an energy.'

So I, Anuruddhas, living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
perceived the light-manifestation
as well as the appear-ance of material shapes.

■

But soon the light-manifestation vanished for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Now what is the cause,
what the reason
that the light-manifestation vanishes for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes?'

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Longing<sup>20</sup> has arisen in me;
and because there was longing,
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,

the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

So I thought:

'I will act in such a way
that doubt will not arise in me again
nor lack of proper attention
nor sloth and torpor
nor consternation
nor elation
nor distress
nor too much energy
nor too feeble an energy
nor longing.'

So I, Anuruddhas, living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
perceived the light-manifestation
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

■

But soon the light-manifestation vanished for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Now what is the cause,
what the reason
that the light-manifestation vanishes for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes?'

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Perception of diversity has arisen in me;
and because there was perception of diversity;
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,
the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

So I thought:

'I will act in such a way
that doubt will not arise in me again
nor lack of proper attention
nor sloth and torpor
nor consternation
nor elation
nor distress
nor too much energy
nor too feeble an energy
nor longing
nor perception of diversity.'

So I, Anuruddhas, living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
perceived the light-manifestation
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

■

But soon the light-manifestation vanished for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'Now what is the cause,
what the reason

that the light-manifestation vanishes for me
as well as the appearance of material shapes?'

Anuruddhas, this occurred to me:

'A state of being too intent on material shapes has arisen in me;
and because there was a state of being too intent on material shapes;
concentration fell away from me;
when concentration falls away,
the light-manifestation vanishes
as well as the appearance of material shapes.

So I thought:

'I will act in such a way
that doubt will not arise in me again
nor lack of proper attention
nor sloth and torpor
nor consternation
nor elation
nor distress
nor too much energy
nor too feeble an energy
nor longing
nor perception of diversity
nor the state of being too intent on material shapes.'

So I, Anuruddhas,
knowing that doubt is a defilement of the mind,<sup>21</sup> got rid of the defilement of the mind that is doubt.

Knowing that lack of proper attention is a defilement of the mind,
I got rid of the defilement of the mind
that is lack of proper attention.

Knowing that sloth and torpor
is a defilement of the mind,
I got rid of the defilement of the mind
that is sloth and torpor.

Knowing that consternation
is a defilement of the mind,
I got rid of the defilement of the mind
that is consternation.

Knowing that elation
is a defilement of the mind,
I got rid of the defilement of the mind
that is elation.

Knowing that distress
is a defilement of the mind,
I got rid of the defilement of the mind
that is distress.

Knowing that too much [206] energy
is a defilement of the mind,
I got rid of the defilement of the mind
that is too much energy.

Knowing that too feeble an energy
is a defilement of the mind,
I got rid of the defilement of the mind
that is too feeble an energy.

Knowing that longing
is a defilement of the mind,
I got rid of the defilement of the mind
that is longing.

Knowing that perception of diversity
is a defilement of the mind,

I got rid of the defilement of the mind
that is perception of diversity.

Knowing that the state of being too intent on material shapes [161] is a defilement of the mind,
I got rid of the defilement of the mind
that is the state of being too intent on material shapes.

So I, Anuruddhas, living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
perceived the light-manifestation
but did not see material shapes; then for a whole night
and a whole day
and a whole night and day
I saw material shapes
but did not perceive the light-manifestation.

Concerning this, Anuruddhas,
it occurred to me:

'Now, what is the cause,
what the reason
that I perceived the light-manifestation
but did not see material shapes;
and then for a whole night
and a whole day
and a whole night and day
I saw material shapes
but did not perceive the light-manifestation?'

Concerning this, Anuruddhas,
it occurred to me:

'It was at the time when I,
not paying proper attention to the reflex-image of material shapes,<sup>22</sup> was paying attention

to the reflex-image of the light-manifestation
that I perceived the light-manifestation
but did not see material shapes.

But it was at the time when I,
not paying proper attention
to the reflex-image of the light-manifestation,
was paying attention to the reflex-image of material shapes that, for a whole night
and a whole day
and a whole night and day,
I saw material shapes
but did not perceive the light-manifestation.'

So I, Anuruddhas, living diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute,
both perceived a limited light-manifestation<sup>23</sup> and saw a limited (number of) material shapes; and for a whole night
and a whole day
and a whole night and day
I perceived a boundless light-manifestation and saw a boundless (number of) material shapes.

Concerning this,
it occurred to me, Anuruddhas:

' Now, what is the cause,
what the reason
that I both perceive a limited light-manifestation and see a limited (number of) material shapes as well as for a whole night

and a whole day
and a whole night and day perceive a boundless light-manifestation and see a boundless (number of) material shapes?'

Concerning this,
it occurred to me, Anuruddhas:

'At the time when concentration is limited my vision is limited, so with limited vision [207] I both perceive a limited light-manifestation and see a limited (number of) material shapes.

But at the time
when my concentration is not limited my vision is boundless, so with boundless vision for a whole night
and a whole day
and a whole night and day
I both perceive a boundless light-manifestation and see a boundless (number of) material shapes.'

When [162] I knew, Anuruddhas, that doubt was a defilement of the mind,
the defilement of the mind that is doubt
was got rid of.

When I knew that lack of proper attention was a defilement of the mind,
the defilement of the mind
that is lack of proper attention
was got rid of.

When I knew sloth and torpor was a defilement of the mind,
the defilement of the mind
that is sloth and torpor
was got rid of.

When I knew that consternation was a defilement of the mind,
the defilement of the mind
that is consternation
was got rid of.

When I knew that elation was a defilement of the mind,
the defilement of the mind
that is elation
was got rid of.

When I knew that distress was a defilement of the mind,
the defilement of the mind
that is distress
was got rid of.

When I knew that too much energy was a defilement of the mind,
the defilement of the mind
that is too much energy
was got rid of.

When I knew that too feeble an energy was a defilement of the mind,
the defilement of the mind
that is too feeble an energy
was got rid of.

When I knew that longing was a defilement of the mind,
the defilement of the mind
that is longing
was got rid of.

When I knew that perception of diversity
was a defilement of the mind,

the defilement of the mind
that is perception of diversity
was got rid of.

When I knew that the state of being too intent on material shapes
was a defilement of the mind,
the defilement of the mind
that is the state of being too intent on material shapes
was got rid of.

Concerning this, it occurred to me, Anuruddhas:

'Those that were defilements of my mind are got rid of by me.

Truly now
I am developing concentration by three modes.'<sup>24</sup>

So I, Anuruddhas,
developed the concentration that has initial thought and discursive thought;
and I developed the concentration that is without initial thought and has only discursive thought;<sup>25</sup>
and I developed the concentration
that is without initial thought
and without discursive thought.

And I developed the concentration that has rapture;<sup>26</sup>
and [208] I developed the concentration that is without rapture;<sup>27</sup>
and I developed the concentration that is accompanied by delight;<sup>28</sup>

and I developed the concentration that is accompanied by equanimity.<sup>29</sup>

When, Anuruddhas, there was developed in me the concentration that has initial and discursive thought, when there was developed the concentration
that is without initial thought and has only discursive thought,
when there was developed the concentration
that is without initial thought
and without discursive thought,
and when there was developed the concentration that has rapture,
and when there was developed the concentration that is without rapture,
and when there was developed the concentration that is accompanied by delight,
and when there was developed the concentration that is accompanied by equanimity, then the knowledge and vision arose in me:

Unshakable is freedom of mind for me,
this is the last birth,
there is not now again-becoming."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the venerable Anuruddha
rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on Defilements;
The Eighth

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Vin. i. 341, 349 ff., and see notes at B.D. iv. 488 f. and 498 ff.

<sup>2</sup> This is the same as the opening of the Kosambīyasutta (M. Sta. 48).

<sup>3</sup> Called at Vin. i. 341 "one who spoke what was not-dhamma."

<sup>4</sup> See M.L.S. ii. Intr., p. xxvii ff.

<sup>5</sup> As at Vin. i. 349 ff. See B.D. iv. 498 ff. for notes.

<sup>6</sup> From here also at M. i. 205 ff. See M.L.S. i. 267 ff. for notes.

<sup>7</sup> The plural, Anuruddhā, is used in place of the names of the three separate monks.

<sup>8</sup> Vin. i. 352 goes on differently from here.

<sup>9</sup> M. i. 207 goes on differently from here.

<sup>10</sup> obhāsa. See Intr., p. xxi; P.T.C. s.v. obhāsa for further references; and also A. iv. 302 where obhāsa occurs and is translated at G.S. iv. 201 by E.M. Hare as "auras," and he quotes the Comy.; "rays known to the clairvoyant." The "clairvoyant" must be understood as one who, in meditation, has won the knowledge of deva-vision; it is with this that he "sees," cf. MA. iv. 207: dibbacakkhunā rūpadasmnañ ca sañjānāma. Nyanatiloka, in Bud. Dicty., says, s.v. obhāsa, "Effulgence of light, Aura appearing at times during deep Insight (vipassanā) may become a 'defilement of insight,' vipassanūpakkilesa." Obhāsa is a difficult word for a translator and its meaning or meanings, for these seem to vary from context to context, need further investigation. "Effulgence of light" is perhaps rather too strong, and "aura" can hardly be accepted as the right rendering. Nor will "light" do for, though light is implied, there is the definite and important word āloka. This and obhāsa occur in the same passage at D. i, 220 and certainly appear to have different meanings. At M. iii. 120 I have translated obhāsa in a context that has nothing to do with meditation as "radiance," that is "effulgence of light," and for the above I tentatively suggest light-manifestation or light-radiation; see under avabhāsa in the Skrt. lexicons. According to MA. iv. 207 the obhāsa in this passage is preparatory, parikammobhāsa.

<sup>11</sup> dassana, appearance, showing.

<sup>12</sup> This appears to mean they are perceived extra-sensibly for MA. iv. 207 says "We perceive the appearance of material shapes through deva-vision ... seeing a variety of material shapes through deva-vision," and the whole passage points to processes in meditation.

<sup>13</sup> nimitta.

<sup>14</sup> According to MA. iv. 207 this is parikammasamādhi, preparatory concentration. Cavi, which I have here rendered as "fell away," is the aorist of cavati, a verb used regularly for the passing, deceasing or falling from one existence (to be reborn in another). Above however it is clearly not being used in this special sense.

<sup>15</sup> amanasikāra.

<sup>16</sup> I follow the v.l.'s tato nidānaṃ in preference to the text's ubhatonidānaṃ, from both sources, perhaps thinking of the two murderers.

<sup>17</sup> ubbilla pleasurable excitement. The word appears to occur only here in the Pali canon, although ubbillāvitatta occurs at M. i. 140 and a few other passages.

<sup>18</sup> Cf. M. i. 352.

<sup>19</sup> On too much and too little energy, see the Parable of the Lute, Vin. i. 182, A. iii. 375.

<sup>20</sup> abhijappā, explained at MA. iv. 208 by taṇhā, arising when one has made the light, āloka, increase as far as the confines of the deva-world and has seen a company of devas. The word also occurs at Dhs. 1059, Vbh. 361.

<sup>21</sup> None of these states appears as a defilement of the mind, cittassa upakkilesa, at M. i. 36.

<sup>22</sup> rūpanimitta. Probably nimitta is here the reflex-image which, by means of certain exercises in concentration, appears as if seen by the eye.

<sup>23</sup> paritta obhāsa, explained at MA. iv. 209 as parittakammattṭhāne obhāsaṃ light-manifestation in regard to a limited object of meditational exercise.

<sup>24</sup> These are usually taken to be the first three of the following modes of concentration, samādhi. At Kvu. 413 it is agreed that these three (forms of) samādhi were spoken of by the Lord: e.g. at D. iii. 219, above (M. iii. 102), S. iv. 360, A. iv. 300 which last is identical with M. iii. 162 and appears to speak of seven forms of samadhi. At S. iv. 360, 302-363 the three forms, among a number of other attainments, are called the Way leading to the Uncompounded. See also A. iv. 440 ff., Miln. 337, Vism. 96; and Pts. Contr. p. 239, n. 1, Bud. Psych. Ethics, p. 62, n. 1, Comp. p. 86; and also A. i. 299, n. 2.

<sup>25</sup> This has reference to the fivefold system of jhāna, obtained by successive instead of simultaneous elimination of vitakka and vicara. This happens in the second jhāna, but the "three (forms of) samādhi in jhāna occur both in the (more usual) fourfold system of jhāna as well as in the fivefold," MA. iv. 209.

<sup>26</sup> sappītika. This belongs to the second and third jhānas, MA. iv. 209, but according to AA. ii. 153 it is the happiness, sukha, of the first and second jhānas. This, and the three succeeding forms of concentration are also mentioned at A. iv. 300 f., while at A. i. 91 they form two of the various forms of happiness, dve sukhāni: the happiness without rapture being chief over that with rapture, and the happiness of even-mindedness or equanimity being chief over the happiness of delight, sāta.

<sup>27</sup> The samādhi of the third and fourth jhānas, MA. iv. 209; the sukha of these at AA. ii. 153.

<sup>28</sup> sāta; again belonging to the third and fourth jhānas, MA. iv. 209; but AA. ii. 153 discriminates, saying sātasukha is happiness among the three jhānas, while upekhāsukha is the happiness of the fourth jhāna. At Vism. 86 sukha takes the place of sāta.

<sup>29</sup> upekhā. MA. iv. 209 says "this belongs to the fourth jhāna in the fourfold system, and to the fifth in the fivefold system. But when did the Lord develop this threefold samādhi? During the last watch (of the night) when he was sitting at the root of the great Bo-tree, His first Way is connected with the first jhāna, his second, third and fourth Ways with the second, third and fourth jhānas. In the fivefold system there is no way of the fifth jhāna." Are the three modes of samādhi really (1) that connected with initial and discursive thought, (2) that connected with rapture, (3) that connected with delight and equanimity? (Or are they taken to be so in this Discourse?) On this point see the numbered classification of samādhi at Vism. 85. See also above, Intr., p. xxii.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
3. Suññata Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Emptiness

129. Discourse on Fools and the Wise

Bālapaṇḍita Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattthī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Monks, these are the three marks of a fool,<sup>1</sup> signs of a fool, stamps of a fool.

What three?

As to this, monks, a fool is one thinking wrong thoughts,<sup>2</sup> speaking wrong words,<sup>3</sup> a doer of deeds wrongly done.<sup>4</sup>

If, monks, a fool were not one thinking wrong thoughts, speaking wrong words,
and a doer of deeds wrongly done,
how could the wise know of him:

This fine fellow is a fool,
not a true man?

It is because, monks, a fool is one thinking wrong thoughts,
speaking wrong words,
and a doer of deeds wrongly done,
that the wise know of him:

This fine fellow is a fool,
not a true man.

---

Monks, he who is a fool experiences a threefold anguish and dejection
here and now.

If, monks, a fool is sitting down in an assembly room
or by a carriage-road
or at a cross-roads
and if the people there held appropriate suitable talk about him and if, monks, the fool were one who made onslaught on creatures, were a taker of what had not been given, one who behaved wrongly in regard to sense-pleasures,

a liar,
and one given up to occasions for sloth consequent upon (drinking) arrack, toddy
and strong liquor,
and if, monks, it then occurs to that fool:

'These people are holding an appropriate suitable talk about me, for these states exist in me and I engage in<sup>5</sup> these states,' this, monks, is the first (kind of) anguish and dejection that the fool experiences

here and now.

■

And again, monks, a fool sees kings who, having arrested a thief,
an evil-doer,
are meting out various punishments:<sup>6</sup> they lash [210] him with whips,
and they lash him with canes,
and they lash him with (birch) rods,
and they cut off his hand,
and they cut off his foot,
and they cut off his hand and foot,
and they cut off his his ear,
and they cut off his his nose,
and they cut off his his ear and nose,
and they give him the 'gruel-pot' punishment,
and they give him the 'shell-tonsure' punishment,
and they give him the 'Rāhu's mouth' punishment,
and they give him the 'fire-garland' punishment,
and they give him the 'flaming hand' punishment,
and they give him the 'hay-twist' punishment,

and they give him the 'bark-dress' punishment,
and they give him the 'antelope' punishment,
and they give him the 'flesh-hooking' punishment,
and they give him the 'disc-slice' punishment,
and they give him the 'pickling process' punishment,
and they give him the 'circling the pin' punishment,
and they give him the 'straw-mattress',
and they spray him with burning oil,
give him as food to the dogs,
impale him alive on stakes,
and they decapitate him with a sword.

Thereupon, monks, it occurs to the fool:

'Because of such and such evil deeds kings, having arrested a thief,
an evil-doer,
mete out various punishments:
they lash him with whips,
and they lash him with canes,
and they lash him with (birch) rods,
and they cut off his hand,
and they cut off his foot,
and they cut off his hand and foot,
and they cut off his his ear,
and they cut off his his nose,
and they cut off his his ear and nose,
and they give him the 'gruel-pot' punishment,
and they give him the 'shell-tonsure' punishment,
and they give him the 'Rāhu's mouth' punishment,
and they give him the 'fire-garland' punishment,
and they give him the 'flaming hand' punishment,
and they give him the 'hay-twist' punishment,
and they give him the 'bark-dress' punishment,
and they give him the 'antelope' punishment,
and they give him the 'flesh-hooking' punishment,

and they give him the 'disc-slice' punishment,
and they give him the 'pickling process' punishment,
and they give him the 'circling the pin' punishment,
and they give him the 'straw-mattress,'
and they spray him with burning oil,
give him as food to the dogs,
impale him alive on stakes,
and they decapitate him with a sword.

But these states exist in me and I engage in these states.

So if kings should know about me, they might have me arrested too, and mete out various punishments:
they might lash me with whips, they might lash me with canes, they might lash me with (birch) rods, they might cut off my hand, they might cut off my foot, they might cut off my hand and foot, they might cut off my my ear, they might cut off my my nose, they might cut off my his ear and nose, they might give me the 'gruel-pot' punishment, they might give me the 'shell-tonsure' punishment, they might give me the 'Rāhu's mouth' punishment, they might give me the 'fire-garland' punishment, they might give me the 'flaming hand' punishment, they might give me the 'hay-twist' punishment, they might give me the 'bark-dress' punishment, they might give me the 'antelope' punishment, they might give me the 'flesh-hooking' punishment, they might give me the 'disc-slice' punishment, they might give me the 'pickling process' punishment, they might give me the 'circling the pin' punishment, they might give me the 'straw-mattress,' they might spray me with burning oil, give me as food to the dogs, impale me alive on stakes, and they decapitate me with a sword.'

This, monks, is the second (kind' of) anguish and dejection that the fool experiences
here and now.

■

And again, monks,
while a fool is on a chair or bed
or lying on the ground, at such a time those evil deeds that he has formerly wrongly done by body,
speech
and thought
rest on him,
lie on him,
settle on him.<sup>7</sup>

Monks, as at eventide
the shadows of the great mountain peaks rest,
lie
and settle on the earth, so, monks, do these evil deeds that the fool has formerly wrongly done
by body,
speech
and thought
rest,

lie
and settle on him
as he is on a chair
or bed
or lying on the ground.

Thereupon, monks, it occurs thus to the fool:

'Indeed what is lovely has not been done by me,<sup>8</sup>
what is skilled
has not been done, no refuge against fearful (consequences)<sup>9</sup> has been made,
evil has been done,
cruelty has been done,
violence has been done.

Insofar as there is a bourn for those who have not done what is lovely, have not done what is skilled,
have not made a refuge against fearful (consequences), who have done evil, cruelty and violence,
to that bourn I am going hereafter.'

He grieves,
mourns,
laments,
beats his breast,
wails
and falls into disillusionment.

This, [211] monks, is the third (kind of) anguish and dejection that the fool experiences
here and now.

■

He, monks,<sup>10</sup> who is a fool, having fared wrongly in body,
having fared wrongly in speech, having fared wrongly in thought,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

Anyone, monks, speaking rightly of him would say he is thoroughly undesirable, thoroughly disagreeable,
thoroughly unpleasant,
as in speaking rightly of Niraya Hell he would say it is thoroughly undesirable,
thoroughly disagreeable,
thoroughly unpleasant.

As to this, monks,
even a simile is not easy,
so many are the anguishes of Niraya Hell."

When this had been said,
a certain monk spoke thus to the Lord:

"But is it possible to make a simile for me, revered sir?"

"It is possible, monk,"
the Lord said.

"It is as though, monk,
men should arrest a thief,
an evil-doer,

and bring him before the king,
with the words:

'This, sire, is a thief,
an evil-doer to you.

Decree for him
whatever punishment you wish,'

and the king should speak thus concerning him:

'Go along, good sirs,
stab<sup>11</sup> this man early in the morning with a hundred spears.'

And early in the morning
they would stab him with a hundred spears.

Then at midday the king would speak thus:

'My good fellows,
how is that man?'

'He is still alive, sire.'

Then the king would speak thus concerning him:

'Go along, good sirs,
stab this man at midday
with a hundred spears.'

And at midday they would stab him with a hundred spears.

Then towards evening the king would speak thus:

'My good fellows,
how is that man?'

'He is still alive, sire.'

Then the king would speak thus concerning him:

'Go along, good sirs,
stab this man towards evening
with a hundred spears.'

And towards evening
they would stab him with a hundred spears.

What do you think about this, monks,
would not that man,
while he was being stabbed with three hundred spears, from that source experience anguish and dejection?"

"That man, revered sir, being stabbed with only one spear from that source would experience anguish and dejection.

How much more then<sup>12</sup> with three hundred spears?"

[212] Then the Lord, having picked up a small stone the size of his hand,
addressed the monks,
saying:

"What do you think about this, monks?"

Now, which is the greater,
this small stone,
the size of my hand,
that I have picked up,
or the Himalaya,<sup>13</sup> lord of mountains?"

"This small stone, revered sir,
that the Lord picked up,
the size of his hand,
is insignificant;
compared with the Himalaya, lord of mountains,
it does not count,
it does not amount even to an infinitesimal fraction (of it),
it cannot even be compared (with it)."<sup>14</sup>

"Even so, monks, that anguish and dejection that that man experiences while he is being stabbed with three hundred spears, compared with the anguish of Niraya Hell does not count,
it does not amount even to an infinitesimal fraction (of it),
it cannot even be compared (with it).

Monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell subject him to what is called the fivefold pinion.<sup>15</sup>

They drive a red-hot iron stake
through each hand
and each foot
and a red-hot iron stake
through the middle of his breast.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time<sup>16</sup>
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then the guardians of Niraya Hell
lay him down
and plane him with adzes.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then, monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell place him feet up
and head down
and plane him with razors.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then, monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell
bind him to a chariot
and drive him up and down over ground that is burning,
aflake,
ablaze.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then, monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell push him up and down
a great mountain slope
of glowing cinders,

burning,
aflame,
ablaze.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then, monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell
take him,
feet up and head down,
and plunge him into a glowing brazen cauldron,
burning,
aflame,
ablaze.

There he is boiled
and rises to the surface with the [213] scum.

Boiling there
and rising to the surface with the scum,
he comes up once
and goes down once
and once he goes across.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then, monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell
toss him into the Great Niraya Hell.

Now, monks, this Great Niraya Hell<sup>17</sup> (is so described):

Four-cornered and with four gates,<sup>18</sup>
It is divided into equal portions,
Encircled by an iron wall, with a roof of iron above;
Its incandescent floor is made of glowing iron;
All round it stands a hundred yojanas square.<sup>19</sup>

In many a disquisition could I, monks, talk a talk about Niraya Hell, but it is not easy to describe in full,<sup>20</sup> monks, so many are the anguishes of Niraya Hell.

There are, monks, animals,
breathing creatures
that are grass-eaters.

These eat moist and dry grasses, chewing them with their teeth.

And which, monks, are the animals,
the breathing creatures,
that are grass-eaters?

Horses,
cattle,
asses,
sheep,
deer,
and whatever other animals,
breathing creatures
there are that are grass-eaters.

Monks, that fool
who formerly enjoyed tastes here,

having done evil deeds here,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in companionship with those beings that are grass-eaters.

There are, monks, animals,
breathing creatures
that are dung-eaters.

Having smelt the smell of dung from afar they run up,
thinking:

'We will eat here,
we will eat here.'

Monks, it is like brahmans who run up at the smell of a sacrifice,
thinking:

'We will eat here,
we will eat here' -

even so, monks, there are animals,
breathing creatures
that are dung-eaters.

These having smelt the smell of dung from afar run up,
thinking:

'We will eat here,
we will eat here.'

And which, monks are the animals,
the breathing creatures
that are dung-eaters?

Cocks,
swine,
dogs,
jackals,
and whatever other animals,
breathing creatures
there are
that are dung-eaters.

Monks, that fool
who formerly enjoyed tastes here, [214] having done evil deeds here,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in companionship
with those beings that are dung-eaters.

There are, monks, animals,
breathing creatures
that are born in the dark, grow old in the dark
and die in the dark.

And which, monks, are the animals,
the breathing creatures
that are born,
grow old
and die
in the dark?

Beetles,
maggots,
earth-worms
and whatever other animals, breathing creatures there are
that are born,
grow old

and die
in the dark.

Monks, that fool
who formerly enjoyed tastes here
having done evil deeds here,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in companionship with those beings that are born,
grow old
and die in the dark.

There are, monks, animals,
breathing creatures
that are born in water, grow old in water,
die in water.

And which, monks, are the animals,
the breathing creatures
that are born,
grow old
and die in water?

Fishes, turtles, crocodiles
and whatever other animals, breathing creatures
there are
that are born,
grow old
and die
in water.

Monks, that fool
who formerly enjoyed tastes here
having done evil deeds here,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in companionship
with those beings that are born,
grow old
and die
in water.

There are, monks, animals,
breathing creatures
that are born in filth, grow old in filth,
die in filth.

And which, monks, are the animals,
the breathing creatures
that are born,
grow old
and die in filth?

Those beings, monks,
that are born in rotting fish or that grow old in rotting fish or that die in rotting fish; that are born in rotting carcasses or that grow old in rotting carcasses or that die in rotting carcasses; that are born in rotting rice or that grow old in rotting rice or that die in rotting rice; that are born in a pool at the entrance to a village or that grow old in a pool at the entrance to a village or that die in a pool at the entrance to a village; that are born in a dirty pool near a village or that grow old in a dirty pool near a village or that die in a dirty pool near a village.

Monks, that fool who formerly enjoyed tastes here,
having done evil deeds here,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in companionship
with those beings that are born in filth,
grow old in filth,
die in filth.

In many a disquisition could I, monks, talk a talk about animal birth, but it is not easy to describe in full, monks, so many are the anguishes of animal birth.

Monks, it is like a man who might throw a yoke with one hole<sup>21</sup> into the sea.

An easterly wind might take it westwards, a westerly wind might take it eastwards, a northerly wind might take it southwards, a southerly wind might take it northwards.

There might be [215] a blind turtle there who came to the surface once in a hundred years.

What do you think about this, monks?

Could that blind turtle push his neck through that one hole in the yoke?"

"If at all,<sup>22</sup> revered sir, then only once in a very long while."

"Sooner or later, monks, could the blind turtle push his neck through the one hole in the yoke; more difficult than that,
do I say, monks,
is human status once again for the fool who has gone to the Downfall.

What is the cause of that?

Monks, there is no dhamma-faring there, no even-faring,
no doing of what is skilled,
no doing of what is good.

Monks, there is devouring of one another there and feeding on the weak.<sup>23</sup>

Monks, if some time or other
once in a very long while that fool came to human status (again), he would be born into those families that are low,<sup>24</sup> a family of low caste or a family of hunters or a family of bamboo-plaiters or a family of cartwrights or a family of refuse-scavengers,<sup>25</sup> in such a family as is needy, without enough to drink or to eat,
where a covering for the back is with difficulty obtained.

Moreover, he would be ill-favoured,
ugly,
dwarfish,

sickly,
blind
or deformed or lame
or paralysed;
he would be unable to get food,
drink,
clothes,
vehicles,
garlands,
scents and perfumes,
bed,
dwelling,
and lights;
he would fare wrongly in body,
wrongly in speech,
wrongly in thought.

Because he had fared wrongly in body,
speech
and thought,
at the breaking up of the body after dying he would arise in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

Monks, it is as though a gambler at the very first losing throw (at dice) were to lose his son,
his wife
and all his property
and, further,
were to undergo imprisonment himself.

Insignificant, monks,
is that losing throw by which the gambler
at the very first losing throw
were to lose his son,
his wife
and all his property
and, further,
were to undergo imprisonment himself.

Greater than this is the losing throw
by which the fool,
having fared wrongly in body,
wrongly in speech,
wrongly in thought,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

This, monks, is the fool's condition, completed in its entirety.<sup>26</sup>

§

[216] These, monks, are the three marks of a wise man, signs of a wise man,
stamps of a wise man.

What three?

As to this, monks,
a wise man is one thinking right thoughts,
speaking right words,
and a doer of deeds rightly done.

If, monks, a wise man were not one thinking right thoughts, speaking right words,
a doer of deeds rightly done,
how could the wise know of him:

This worthy man is a wise man,
a true man?

It is because, monks, a wise man is one thinking right thoughts,
speaking right words,
a doer of deeds rightly done,
that the wise know of him:

This worthy man is a wise man,
a true man.

Monks, he who is a wise man experiences a threefold happiness and joy
here and now.

If, monks, the wise man is sitting down in an assembly room
or by a carriage road
or at a cross-roads
and the people there held appropriate suitable talk about him, and if, monks, the wise man abstained from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what had not been given,
from wrong behaviour in regard to the sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from occasions for sloth

consequent upon (drinking) arrack,
toddy
and strong liquor,
and if, monks, it thereupon occurred to the wise man:

'These people are holding an appropriate suitable talk about me;
these states exist in me
and I engage in these states' - this, monks, is the first (kind of) happiness and joy that the wise man experiences
here and now.

And again, monks, a wise man sees kings who having arrested a thief,
an evil-doer,
are meting out various punishments:
they lash him with whips,
and they lash him with canes,
and they lash him with (birch) rods,
and they cut off his hand,
and they cut off his foot,
and they cut off his hand and foot,
and they cut off his his ear,
and they cut off his his nose,
and they cut off his his ear and nose,
and they give him the 'gruel-pot' punishment,
and they give him the 'shell-tonsure' punishment,
and they give him the 'Rāhu's mouth' punishment,
and they give him the 'fire-garland' punishment,
and they give him the 'flaming hand' punishment,
and they give him the 'hay-twist' punishment,
and they give him the 'bark-dress' punishment,
and they give him the 'antelope' punishment,
and they give him the 'flesh-hooking' punishment,
and they give him the 'disc-slice' punishment,
and they give him the 'pickling process' punishment,

and they give him the 'circling the pin' punishment,
and they give him the 'straw-mattress,'
and they spray him with burning oil,
give him as food to the dogs,
impale him alive on stakes,
and they decapitate him with a sword.

Thereupon, monks, it occurs to the wise man:

'Because of such and such evil deeds
kings, having arrested a thief,
an evil-doer,
mete out various punishments:
they lash him with whips,
and they lash him with canes,
and they lash him with (birch) rods,
and they cut off his hand,
and they cut off his foot,
and they cut off his hand and foot,
and they cut off his his ear,
and they cut off his his nose,
and they cut off his his ear and nose,
and they give him the 'gruel-pot' punishment,
and they give him the 'shell-tonsure' punishment,
and they give him the 'Rāhu's mouth' punishment,
and they give him the 'fire-garland' punishment,
and they give him the 'flaming hand' punishment,
and they give him the 'hay-twist' punishment,
and they give him the 'bark-dress' punishment,
and they give him the 'antelope' punishment,
and they give him the 'flesh-hooking' punishment,
and they give him the 'disc-slice' punishment,
and they give him the 'pickling process' punishment,
and they give him the 'circling the pin' punishment,
and they give him the 'straw-mattress,'
and they spray him with burning oil,

give him as food to the dogs,
impale him alive on stakes,
and they decapitate him with a sword.

But these states do not exist in me and I do not engage in these states.'

This, monks, is the second (kind of) happiness and joy that the wise man experiences
here and now.

And again, monks,
while a wise man is on a chair
or bed
or lying on the ground, at such a time
those lovely deeds that he has formerly rightly done
by body,
speech
and thought
rest on him,
lie on him,
settle on him.

Monks, as at eventide the shadows of the great mountain peaks rest, lie
and settle
on the earth,
so, monks, do those lovely deeds that the wise man has formerly rightly done
by body,
[217] speech
and thought
rest,
lie
and settle on him

as he is on a chair
or bed
or lying on the ground.

Thereupon, monks, it occurs to the wise man:

'Indeed what is evil
has not been done by me, cruelty has not been done, violence has not been done, what is lovely has been done, what is skilled has been done, a refuge against fearful (consequences) has been found.

Insofar as there is a bourn for those who have not done evil, cruelty
or violence,
who have done what is lovely,
what is skilled,
and who have found a refuge against fearful (consequences),
to that bourn I am going hereafter.'

He does not grieve,
mourn,
lament,
beat his breast,
wail
or fall into disillusionment.

This, monks, is the third (kind of) happiness and joy that the wise man experiences
here and now.

He, monks, who is a wise man, having fared rightly in body,

speech
and thought,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

Anyone, monks, speaking rightly of him
would say:

'Thoroughly desirable,
thoroughly agreeable,
thoroughly pleasant,'
as in speaking rightly of heaven he would say:

'Thoroughly desirable,
thoroughly agreeable,
thoroughly pleasant.'

As to this, monks,
even a simile is not easy,
so many are the happinesses of heaven."

When this had been said,
a certain monk spoke thus to the Lord:

"But is it possible, revered sir, to make a simile?"<sup>27</sup>

"It is possible, monk,"
the Lord said.

"It is as though, monk,
a wheel-rolling king,<sup>28</sup> endowed with seven Treasures and four efficacies,<sup>29</sup> should experience happiness and joy from that source.

From what seven?

As to this, monk,
when a noble anointed king has bathed his head on an Observance day,
the fifteenth,
and has gone for the Observance to an upper storey of his palace, there then appears the deva-like Treasure of the Wheel with its nave,
its tyres
and all its thousand spokes complete.

On seeing it,
this occurs to the noble anointed king:

'I have heard this,
that if a noble anointed king has bathed his head on an Observance day,
the fifteenth,
and has gone for the Observance
to an upper storey of his palace, and there then appears [218] the deva-like Treasure of the Wheel with its nave,
its tyres,
and all its thousand spokes complete,
he becomes a wheel-rolling king.

May I then be a wheel-rolling king.'

Then, monks,<sup>30</sup> the noble anointed king
rising from his seat,

taking a ceremonial water jar in his left hand, with his right sprinkles (water) over<sup>31</sup> the Treasure of the Wheel,
saying:

'May the honoured Treasure of the Wheel roll on, may the honoured Treasure of the Wheel be all-conquering.'

Then, monks, the Treasure of the Wheel rolls on towards the eastern quarter and after it (goes) the wheel-rolling king together with a fourfold army.

And wherever, monks, the Treasure of the Wheel stops,
there the wheel-rolling king settles down together with the fourfold army.

And, monks, rival kings in the eastern quarter, having approached the wheel-rolling king,
speak thus:

'Come, sire,
you are welcome, sire,
(all is) yours, sire,
instruct (us), sire.'

The wheel-rolling king speaks thus:

'Breathing things should not be killed,
what has not been given
should not be taken,
wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures
should not be indulged in,
lies should not be told,
strong drink should not be drunk,
and you should eat in moderation.'<sup>32</sup>

And, monks, those rival kings of the eastern quarter become vassals of the wheel-rolling king.

■

And then, monks, the Treasure of the Wheel, plunging into the eastern sea and rising out (of it again), rolls on to the southern quarter
and after it (goes) the wheel-rolling king
together with a fourfold army.

And wherever, monks, the Treasure of the Wheel stops,
there the wheel-rolling king settles down
together with the fourfold army.

And, monks, rival kings in the southern quarter, having approached the wheel-rolling king,
speak thus:

'Come, sire,
you are welcome, sire,
(all is) yours, sire,
instruct (us), sire.'

The wheel-rolling king speaks thus:

'Breathing things should not be killed,
what has not been given
should not be taken,
wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures
should not be indulged in,
lies should not be told,
strong drink should not be drunk,
and you should eat in moderation.'

And, monks, those rival kings of the southern quarter become vassals of the wheel-rolling king.

■

And then, monks, the Treasure of the Wheel, plunging into the southern sea
and rising out (of it again), rolls on to the western quarter
and after it (goes) the wheel-rolling king
together with a fourfold army.

And wherever, monks, the Treasure of the Wheel stops,
there the wheel-rolling king settles down
together with the fourfold army.

And, monks, rival kings in the western quarter, having approached the wheel-rolling king,
speak thus:

'Come, sire,
you are welcome, sire,
(all is) yours, sire,
instruct (us), sire.'

The wheel-rolling king speaks thus:

'Breathing things should not be killed,
what has not been given
should not be taken,
wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures
should not be indulged in,
lies should not be told,
strong drink should not be drunk,
and you should eat in moderation.'

And, monks, those rival kings of the western quarter become vassals of the wheel-rolling king.

■

And then, monks, the Treasure of the Wheel, plunging into the western sea
and rising out (of it again), rolls on to the northern quarter
and after it (goes) the wheel-rolling king
together with a fourfold army.

And wherever, monks, the Treasure of the Wheel stops,
there the wheel-rolling king settles down
together with the fourfold army.

And, monks, rival kings in the northern quarter, having approached the wheel-rolling king,
speak thus:

'Come, sire,
you are welcome, sire,
(all is) yours, sire,
instruct (us), sire.'

The wheel-rolling king speaks thus:

'Breathing things should not be killed,
what has not been given
should not be taken,
wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures
should not be indulged in,
lies should not be told,
strong drink should not be drunk,
and you should eat in moderation.'

And, monks, those rival kings of the northern quarter become vassals of the wheel-rolling king.

■

And then, monks, when the Treasure of the Wheel has conquered all the sea-girt earth, returning to that royal city itself, it stands as if fixed by the axle<sup>33</sup> to the gateway of the wheel-rolling king's palace, adorning the gateway
of the wheel- [219] rolling king's palace.

So, monks, does the Treasure of the Wheel appear to the wheel-rolling king.

And again, monks,
the Treasure of the Elephant appears to the wheel-rolling king;
it is all white,
seven-fold firm,
going through the sky by psychic potency,
an elephant-king named Uposatha.<sup>34</sup>

On seeing him
the wheel-rolling king is pleased at heart
and thinks:

'Glorious indeed is an elephant-vehicle,
if he will submit to taming.'

Then, monks, that Treasure of an Elephant, like a fine thoroughbred elephant long since well tamed,
submits to taming then and there.

Once upon a time, monks,
the wheel-rolling king,
while testing that very Treasure of an Elephant, mounted it early one morning
and it passed over the sea-girt earth
and returned to that royal city itself
in time for the morning meal.

So, monks, does the Treasure of the Elephant appear to the wheel-rolling king.

■

And again, monks,
the Treasure of the Horse appears to the wheel-rolling king;
it is all white,
with a head (as black as) a crow's,
a dark mane,
going through the sky by psychic potency,
a king of horses named Valaha.<sup>35</sup>

On seeing him
the wheel-rolling king is pleased at heart
and thinks:

'Glorious indeed is a horse-vehicle,
if he will submit to taming.'

Then, monks, that Treasure of a Horse, like a fine thoroughbred horse
long since well tamed,
submits to taming then and there.

Once upon a time, monks,
the wheel-rolling king,
while testing that very Treasure of a Horse,

mounted it early one morning
and it passed over the sea-girt earth
and returned to that royal city itself
in time for the morning meal.

So, monks, does the Treasure of the Horse appear to the wheel-rolling king.

■

And again, monks,
the Treasure of the Jewel<sup>36</sup>
appears to the wheel-rolling king.

It is an emerald jewel, of purest water,
well cut into eight facets.

And the light of that Treasure of the Jewel, monks, is shed all round for a yojana.

Once upon a time, monks,
the wheel-rolling king,
in order to test that very Treasure of the Jewel, arrayed the fourfold army, raised aloft the jewel on the top of a standard and went out into the dense darkness of the night.

And, monks, the villagers all around set about their daily work by its effulgence,
thinking it to be day.

So, monks, does the Treasure of the Jewel appear to the wheel-rolling king.

■

And again, monks, the Treasure of the Woman appears to the wheel-rolling king.

She is lovely,
good to look upon,
charming,
endowed with the greatest beauty of complexion;
not too tall,
not too short,
not too thin,
not too stout,
not too dark,
not too [220] fair;
surpassing human beauty, though she has not attained deva-like beauty.

And the touch of the body of this Treasure of the Woman is such, monks,
that it is like that of a tuft of cotton or a tuft of thistle-down.

And, monks, the limbs
of this Treasure of the Woman are warm when (the weather) is cool and cool when it is warm.

The perfume of sandal-wood is wafted from the body of this Treasure of the Woman, monks; from her mouth is wafted the perfume of lotuses.

And this Treasure of the Woman, monks, is one to get up earlier than the wheel-rolling king and retire later to rest, an obedient servant

carrying out his pleasure,
speaking affably.<sup>37</sup>

And, monks,
that Treasure of the Woman is never unfaithful to the wheel-rolling king even in thought,
how then could she be physically?

So, monks, does the Treasure of the Woman appear to the wheel-rolling king.

■

And again, monks, the Treasure of the Householder<sup>38</sup> appears to the wheel-rolling king.

As a result of kamma
he has deva-like vision by which he sees treasure whether it has an owner or not.

Approaching the wheel-rolling king,
he speaks thus:

'Be you untroubled, sire,
I will deal with your wealth as wealth should be dealt with.'

Once upon a time, monks,
the wheel-rolling king,
in order to test this Treasure of the Householder, embarked in a boat,
pushed out into the middle of the stream of the river Ganges, and spoke thus to the Treasure of the Householder:

'I have need, householder,
of gold coins and gold.'

'Well then, your majesty, let the boat come in to one of the banks.'

'It is just here, householder, that I have need of gold coins and gold.'

Then, monks,
that Treasure of the Householder, touching the water with both his hands, drew up a jar
full of gold coins and gold and spoke thus to the wheel-rolling king:

'Is this enough, your majesty, have I done enough, your majesty, is the service enough, your majesty?'

The wheel-rolling king spoke thus:

It is enough, householder, you have done enough, householder, the service is enough, householder.'

So, monks, does the Treasure of the Householder appear to the wheel-rolling king.

■

And again, monks, the Treasure of the Adviser<sup>39</sup> appears to the wheel-rolling king.

He is clever,
experienced,
wise;

he is pro- [221] ficient in procuring what should be procured for the wheel-rolling king, in removing what should be removed,
in retaining what should be retained.<sup>40</sup>

Having approached the wheel-rolling king,
he speaks thus:

'Be you untroubled, sire,
I will instruct (you).'

So, monks, does the Treasure of the Adviser
appear to the wheel-rolling king.

The wheel-rolling king, monks, is endowed with these seven Treasures.

---

And with what four efficacies?<sup>41</sup>

As to this, monks,
a wheel-rolling king is lovely,
good to look upon,
charming,
endowed with the greatest beauty of complexion surpassing other men's.

Monks, a wheel-rolling king is endowed with this first efficacy.

■

And again, monks, a wheel-rolling king is of long life,
living long,
surpassing other men.

Monks, a wheel-rolling king is endowed with this second efficacy.

■

And again, monks,
a wheel-rolling king
has little illness,
does not ail,
is possessed of a good digestion that is neither too cold nor too hot,<sup>42</sup> surpassing other men's.

Monks, a wheel-rolling king is endowed with this third efficacy.

■

And again, monks,
a wheel-rolling king
is dear to brahmans and householders and beloved by them.

As, monks, fathers
are dear to and beloved by their children, so, monks, is a wheel-rolling king dear to and beloved by brahmans and householders.

And, monks, brahmans and householders are dear to and beloved by the wheel-rolling king.

As, monks, children are dear to and beloved by their father, so, monks, are brahmans and householders dear to and beloved by the wheel-rolling king.

Once upon a time, monks,
a wheel-rolling king
went out to a pleasure ground with a fourfold army.

Then, monks, brahmans and householders,
approaching the wheel-rolling king,
spoke thus:

'Go on slowly, sire,
that we may look on you for longer.'

And, monks, the wheel-rolling king addressed the charioteer,
saying:

'Drive on slowly, charioteer, that I may look on the brahmans and householders for longer.'

Monks, a wheel-rolling king is endowed with this fourth efficacy.

[222] Monks, a wheel-rolling king is endowed with these four efficacies.

What do you think about this, monks?

Does not a wheel-rolling king, endowed with these seven Treasures and these four efficacies, experience happiness and joy from that source?"

"A wheel-rolling king, revered sir, if possessed of only one Treasure would experience happiness and joy from that source.

How much more then from seven Treasures and four efficacies?"

Then the Lord,
having picked up a small stone
the size of his hand,
addressed the monks,
saying:

"What do you think about this, monks?"

Now which is the greater,
this small stone,
the size of my hand,
that I have picked up,
or the Himalaya,
lord of mountains?"

"This small stone, revered sir,
that the Lord has picked up,
the size of his hand,
is insignificant;
compared with the Himalaya,
lord of mountains,
it does not count,
it does not amount even to an infinitesimal fraction (of it),
it cannot even be compared (with it)."

"Even so, monks,
that happiness and joy that the wheel-rolling king experiences from the seven Treasures and the four efficacies, compared with deva-like happiness

does not count,
it does not amount to an infinitesimal fraction (of it),
it cannot even be compared (with it).

Monks, if sometime or other
once in a very long while that wise man came to human status, he would be born into one of those families that are high:
a family of rich nobles or a family of rich brahmans or a family of rich householders, in such a family as is well-to-do,
of great possessions,
of great resources,
with abundant gold and silver, abundant means,
abundant wealth in grains.

Moreover, he would be lovely,
good to look upon,
charming,
endowed with the greatest beauty of complexion;
he would be able to get food,
drink,
clothes,
vehicles,
garlands,
scents and perfumes,
bed,
dwelling
and lights;
he would fare rightly in body,
rightly in speech,
rightly in thought.

Because he had fared rightly in body,
speech
and thought,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he would arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

Monks, it is as though a gambler at the very first winning throw (at dice) were to win a great mass of possessions.

Insignificant, monks
is that winning throw
by which the gambler
at the very first winning throw
were to win a great mass of possessions.

Greater than this is the winning throw by which the wise man,
having fared rightly in body,
rightly in speech,
rightly in thought,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in a good bourn,
the [223] heaven world.

This, monks, is the wise man's condition completed in its entirety."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on Fools and the Wise:
The Ninth

---

<sup>1</sup> This description of a fool also occurs at A. i. 102.

<sup>2</sup> Thoughts connected with covetousness, malevolence and wrong views, MA. iv. 210.

<sup>3</sup> Lying words and so on.

<sup>4</sup> Making onslaught on creatures and so on.

<sup>5</sup> sandissāmi, or to agree to, live conformably with, connive at.

<sup>6</sup> As at M. i, 87. See M.L.S. i. 115 for further references.

<sup>7</sup> olambanti ajjholambanti abhippalambanti. The second of these words occurs at S. iii. 137 and is translated at K.S. iii. 110 by "overhangs" which suits the context there.

<sup>8</sup> With this passage cf. A. ii. 174, Iti. p. 25.

<sup>9</sup> bhīruttāṇa; cf. Iti. p. 25, Vin. iii. 72. See B.D. i. 124, n. 1; VinA. 436, AA. iii. 161.

<sup>10</sup> I think bhikkhu here should read bhikkhave as on text p. 171.

<sup>11</sup> hanatha cannot mean kill or destroy here, as in what follows, although they might stab or strike, haneyyūṃ, the thief, they do not manage to kill him at once. The idea of to stab or to thrust at is borne out at MA. iv. 211 which explains as "having pierced (where the spear) comes out, so that on each occasion two blows fall."

<sup>12</sup> ko pana vādo, who (can) say?

<sup>13</sup> Himavā.

<sup>14</sup> Cf. S. ii. 263, v. 467; Ud. 23.

<sup>15</sup> Mentioned at Jā. i. 174. The following description of Niraya is also found at M. iii. 183, A. i. 141-142.

<sup>16</sup> na ca tāva kālam karoti yāva na taṃ pāpaṃ kammaṃ byantihoti. The meaning is that he must do enough karmic time to work off the evil effects of evil deeds. So long as kālam karoti is translated as "dies" a wrong impression is created. One may die and die again and again (marati) before one finishes one's karmic time for the effects of a deed may still be active in the next or subsequent "births."

<sup>17</sup> At MA. iv. 234, AA. ii. 232 Mahāniraya is called Avīci.

<sup>18</sup> Cf. Vin. ii. 203: avīciniraya catudvāra.

<sup>19</sup> MA. iv. 234 says this Avīci is 100 yojanas in length and 100 in width. The ground and the roof are bronze, and each wall is 90 yojanas. Cf. Mhvu. i. 9. The last line is quoted at DhA. i. 127.

<sup>20</sup> Even if one talked for a hundred or a thousand years, MA. iv. 213.

<sup>21</sup> ekacchigaḷa yuga. This simile is referred to at Thīg. 500, where the device is called yugacchida. It is also to be found at S. v. 455 where the wording is not quite the same as above. Also referred to at Miln. 204, Asl. 60. Chiggaḷa is a perforated device for archers to shoot their arrows through. Cf. tāḷachiggaḷa at S. v. 453.

<sup>22</sup> yadi nūna.

<sup>23</sup> dubbalamārikā, with v.l. dubbalakhādikā.

<sup>24</sup> Cf. A. i. 107.

<sup>25</sup> These five kinds of low birth occur at M. ii. 152, 183, Vin. iv. 6, S. i. 93, A. i. 107, ii. 85, Pug. 51.

<sup>26</sup> MA. iv. 214: the fool, having completed the three wrong ways (of acting, speaking and thinking), is reborn in Niraya. Because of "maturing" there he comes to human status, being reborn in one of the five low families; then having again completed the three wrong ways of behaving he is reborn in Niraya. This is the whole complete bālabhūmi stage, level, condition, position or situation of a fool.

<sup>27</sup> me, for me, as on text p. 165 is omitted here.

<sup>28</sup> From here to the top of text p. 177 occurs also at D. ii. 174-178. See notes at Dial. ii. pp. 202 ff.

<sup>29</sup> iddhi. As will be seen in the context below "there is nothing supernatural about these Iddhis" (Dial. ii. 208, n. 2). They are attributes or endowments, capabilities, competences or prerogatives adding to the efficacy, potency or dignity of a king.

<sup>30</sup> Notice the change from bhikkhu to bhikkhave.

<sup>31</sup> abbhukkirati. See P.E.D. s.v.

<sup>32</sup> yathābhuttañ ca bhujjatha; see P.E.D. s.v. bhutta.

<sup>33</sup> Cf. A. i. 112.

<sup>34</sup> Cf. Jā. iv. 232. The Comys. name two tribes of elephants from which the Elephant Treasure comes to a wheel-rolling king; if from the Uposatha tribe he is the eldest of the tribe, if from the Chaddanta the youngest. See D.P.P.N.

<sup>35</sup> See Jā. iv. 232.

<sup>36</sup> This comes from Vepulla Mountain, Jā. iv. 232, etc.

<sup>37</sup> As at M. ii. 84.

<sup>38</sup> Dial. ii. 206, n. 3 gives interesting reasons for translating gahapati here as Treasurer but, while hoping I will not "convey a wrong impression" of his functions, I incline more to the usual rendering of "householder."

<sup>39</sup> He is as the king's eldest son, MA. iv. 229.

<sup>40</sup> The meaning of these three words in this passage: upaṭṭhapetuṃ (D. ii. 177 upayāpetuṃ), apayāpetuṃ and ṭhapetuṃ, is doubtful. In the absence of help from the Comys., they might also be rendered to appoint, dismiss and retain such a person as should be appointed to, dismissed from or retained in the king's service.

<sup>41</sup> There seems to be a sentence missing here, the equivalent of which occurs at D. ii. 177.

<sup>42</sup> Said of Ratṭhapāla at M. ii. 67.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
3. Suññata Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
3. The Division on Emptiness

130. Discourse on the Deva-Messengers<sup>1</sup>

Devadūta Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvathī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Monks, it is as if there were two houses with doors<sup>2</sup> and a man with vision standing there between them might see people entering a house and leaving it and going back and forth and walking across.

Even so do I, monks,
with the purified deva-vision
surpassing that of men
see beings as they are passing hence,
as they are coming to be,
and see<sup>3</sup> that beings are mean,
excellent,
comely,
ugly,
well-going,
ill-going
according to the consequences of deeds,
(and I think):

'Indeed these worthy beings,
who are endowed with right conduct in body,
speech
and thought,
who are not scoffers at the ariyans,
are of right view,
incurring kamma consequent on right view,
at the breaking up of the body after dying are arising in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

Or these worthy beings,
who are endowed with right conduct in body,
speech
and thought,
who are not scoffers at the ariyans,
are of right view,
incurring kamma consequent on right view,

at the breaking up of the body after dying are arising among men.

Indeed these worthy beings,
who are endowed with [224] wrong conduct in body,
speech
and thought,
who are scoffers at the ariyans,
are of false view,
incurring kamma consequent on wrong view,
at the breaking up of the body after dying are arising in the realm of the departed.

Or these worthy beings,
who are endowed with wrong conduct in body,
speech
and thought,
who are scoffers at the ariyans,
are of false view,
incurring kamma consequent on wrong view,
at the breaking up of the body after dying are arising in an animal womb.

Or these worthy beings, endowed with wrong in body,
speech
and thought,
who are scoffers at the ariyans,
are of false view,
incurring kamma consequent on wrong view,
at the breaking up of the body after dying are arising in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.'

Monks,<sup>4</sup> the guardians of Niraya Hell, having seized that person by both arms, present him to King Yama,
saying:

'This man, sire,
has no respect for his mother, no respect for his father,<sup>5</sup> he does not honour recluses, he does not honour brahmans, he does not pay due respect to the elders of the family.

Let your majesty decree a punishment for him.'

Then, monks, King Yama cross-questions him, questions him closely
and speaks to him
concerning the first deva-messenger,
saying:

'My good man,
did you not see the first deva-messenger who appeared among men?

He speaks thus:

'I did not see him, revered sir.'

So, monks, King Yama speaks to him thus:

'My good man,
did you not see among men
a young baby boy
lying on his back,
fallen prostrate among his own excrements?

He speaks thus:

'I saw him, revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks thus to him:

'My good man,
although you are sensible
and grown up,
did it not occur to you:

'I too am liable to birth, I have not outstripped birth;
come, I (shall) do what is lovely in body,
speech
and thought'?

He speaks thus:

'I was not able to, revered sir,
I was indolent,<sup>6</sup> revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks to him thus:

'If it was because of indolence,
my good man,
that you did not do what was lovely in body,
speech
and thought,
they will undoubtedly do unto you,
my good man,
in accordance with that indolence.

For this that is an evil deed is yours;
it was not done by mother,
it was not done by father,
it was not done by brother,

it was not done by sister,
it was not done by friends and acquaintances,
it was not done by kith and kin,
it was not done by recluses and brahmans,
it was not done by dvatās.

This evil deed was done by you;
it is you yourself
that will experience its ripening.'

■

[225] King Yama, monks,
having cross-questioned him,
questioned him closely
and spoken to him concerning the first deva-messenger, then cross-questions him,
questions him closely
and speaks to him concerning the second deva-messenger,
saying:

'My good man,
did you not see the second deva-messenger
who appeared among men?

He speaks thus:

'I did not see him, revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks thus to him:

'My good man, did you not see among men a woman or a man eighty or ninety
or a hundred years old, aged,

crooked as a rafter,
bent,
leaning on a stick,
going along palsied,
miserable,
youth gone,
teeth broken,
hair thinned,
skin wrinkled,
stumbling along,
the limbs discoloured?

He speaks thus:

'I saw this, revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks thus:

'My good man,
although you are sensible
and grown up,
did it not occur to you:

'I too am liable to old age,
I have not outstripped old age;
come, I (shall) do what is lovely in body,
speech
and thought'?

He speaks thus:

'I was not able to, revered sir,
I was indolent, revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks to him thus:

'If it was because of indolence,
my good man,
that you did not do what was lovely in body,
speech
and thought,
they will undoubtedly do unto you,
my good man,
in accordance with that indolence.

For this that is an evil deed is yours;
it was not done by mother,
it was not done by father,
it was not done by brother,
it was not done by sister,
it was not done by friends and acquaintances,
it was not done by kith and kin,
it was not done by recluses and brahmans,
it was not done by dvatās.

This evil deed was done by you;
it is you yourself
that will experience its ripening.'

■

King Yama, monks,
having cross-questioned him,
questioned him closely
and spoken to him concerning the second deva-messenger,
then cross-questions him,
questions him closely
and speaks to him concerning the third deva-messenger,
saying:

'My good man,
did you not see the third deva-messenger

who appeared among men?

He speaks thus:

'I did not see him, revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks to him thus:

'My good man, did you not see among men
a woman or a man
afflicted with illness,
suffering,
grievously ill,
fallen prostrate among his own excrements,
(only) rising with (the help of) others,
(only) getting to bed with (the help of) others?

He speaks thus:

'I saw this, revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks thus:

'My good man,
although you are sensible
and grown up,
did it not occur to you:

'I too am liable to sickness,
I have not outstripped sickness;
come, I (shall) do what is lovely in body,
speech
and thought'?

He speaks thus:

'I was not able to, revered sir,
I was indolent, revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks to him thus:

'If it was because of indolence,
my good man,
that you did not do what was lovely in body,
speech
and thought,
they will undoubtedly do unto you,
my good man,
in accordance with that indolence.

For this that is an evil deed is yours;
it was not done by mother,
it was not done by father,
it was not done by brother,
it was not done by sister,
it was not done by friends and acquaintances,
it was not done by kith and kin,
it was not done by recluses and brahmans,
it was not done by dvatās.

This evil deed was done by you;
it is you yourself
that will experience its ripening.'

■

King Yama, monks,
having cross-questioned him,
questioned him [226] closely and spoken to him concerning the third deva-messenger,
then cross-questions him,
questions him closely

and speaks to him concerning the fourth deva-messenger,
saying:

'My good man,
did you not see the fourth deva-messenger
who appeared among men?

He speaks thus:

'I did not see him, revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks to him thus:

'My good man,
did you not see among men
kings who, having arrested a thief,
an evil-doer,
were subjecting him to various punishments:
they lash him with whips,
and they lash him with canes,
and they lash him with (birch) rods,
and they cut off his hand,
and they cut off his foot,
and they cut off his hand and foot,
and they cut off his his ear,
and they cut off his his nose,
and they cut off his his ear and nose,
and they give him the 'gruel-pot' punishment,
and they give him the 'shell-tonsure' punishment,
and they give him the 'Rāhu's mouth' punishment,
and they give him the 'fire-garland' punishment,
and they give him the 'flaming hand' punishment,
and they give him the 'hay-twist' punishment,
and they give him the 'bark-dress' punishment,
and they give him the 'antelope' punishment,
and they give him the 'flesh-hooking' punishment,

and they give him the 'disc-slice' punishment,
and they give him the 'pickling process' punishment,
and they give him the 'circling the pin' punishment,
and they give him the 'straw-mattress,'
and they spray him with burning oil,
give him as food to the dogs,
impale him alive on stakes,
and they decapitate him with a sword?

He speaks thus:

'I saw this, revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks to him thus:

'My good man,
although you are sensible
and grown up,
did it not occur to you:

'Indeed those who do evil deeds are subjected to various punishments like these
here and now,
and what about hereafter?

Come, I (shall) do what is lovely in body, speech and thought'?

He speaks thus:

'I was not able to, revered sir,
I was indolent, revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks to him thus:

'If it was because of indolence, my good man,
that you did not do what was lovely in body,
speech

and thought,
they will undoubtedly do unto you,
my good man,
in accordance with that indolence.

For this that is an evil deed is yours;
it was not done by mother,
it was not done by father,
it was not done by brother,
it was not done by sister,
it was not done by friends and acquaintances,
it was not done by kith and kin,
it was not done by recluses and brahmans,
it was not done by dvatās.

This evil deed was done by you;
it is you yourself
that will experience its ripening.'

King Yama, monks,
having cross-questioned him,
questioned him closely
and spoken to him concerning the fourth deva-messenger,
then cross-questions him,
questions him closely
and speaks to him concerning the fifth deva-messenger,
saying:

'My good man,
did you not see the fifth deva-messenger
who appeared among men?'

He speaks thus:

'I did not see him, revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks to him thus:

'My good man,
did you not see among men
a woman or a man
dead for one,
two or three days,
swollen,
discoloured,
decomposing?

He speaks thus:

'I saw this, revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks to him thus:

'My good man, although you are sensible
and grown up,
did it not occur to you:

'I too am liable to death,
I have not outstripped death;
come, I (shall) do what is lovely in body,
speech
and thought'?:

'I was not able to, revered sir,
I was indolent, revered sir.'

King Yama, monks, speaks to him thus:

'If it was because of indolence, my good man,
that you did not do what was lovely in body,
speech
and thought,
they will undoubtedly do unto you,

my good man,
in accordance with that indolence.

For this that is an evil deed is yours;
it was not done by mother,
it was not done by father,
it was not done by brother,
it was not done by sister,
it was not done by friends and acquaintances,
it was not done by kith and kin,
it was not done by [227] recluses and brahmans,
it was not done by dvatās.

This evil deed was done by you;
it is you yourself
that will experience its ripening.'

King Yama, monks,
having cross-questioned him,
questioned him closely
and spoken to him concerning the fifth deva-messenger,
was silent.

Monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell
subject him to what is called the fivefold pinion.<sup>7</sup>

They drive a red-hot iron stake
through each hand
and each foot
and a red-hot iron stake
through the middle of his breast.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then the guardians of Niraya Hell
lay him down
and plane him with adzes.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then, monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell
place him feet up
and head down
and plane him with razors.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then, monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell
bind him to a chariot
and drive him up and down
over ground that is burning,
aflake,
ablaze.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then, monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell
push him up and down
a great mountain slope
of glowing cinders,
burning,
aflame,
ablaze.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then, monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell
take him,
feet up and head down,
and plunge him into a glowing brazen cauldron,
burning,
aflame,
ablaze.

There he is boiled
and rises to the surface with the scum.

Boiling there
and rising to the surface with the scum,
he comes up once
and goes down once
and once he goes across.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,

severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then, monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell
toss him into the Great Niraya Hell.

Now, monks, this Great Niraya Hell
(is so described):

Four-cornered and with four gates,
It is divided into equal portions,
Encircled by an iron wall, with a roof of iron above;
Its incandescent floor is made of glowing iron;
All round it stands a hundred yojanas square.

The flames that leap up by the eastern wall of this Great Niraya Hell,
monks,
are hurled against the western wall;
the flames that leap up by the western wall are hurled against the eastern wall; the flames that leap up by the northern wall are hurled against the southern wall; the flames that leap up by the southern wall are hurled against the northern wall; the flames that leap up from below are hurled above;
the flames that leap up from above are hurled below.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time until he makes an end of that evil deed.<sup>8</sup>

Monks, there comes a time
once in a very long while
when the eastern gateway of this Great Niraya Hell is opened.

He rushes there swiftly and speedily;
while he is rushing swiftly and speedily
his skin burns
and his hide burns
and his flesh burns
and his tendons burn
and his eyes<sup>9</sup> are filled with smoke - such is his plight.<sup>10</sup>

And though he has attained much,<sup>11</sup>
the gateway is nevertheless closed [228] against him.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

■

Monks, there comes a time
once in a very long while when the western gateway of this Great Niraya Hell is opened.

He rushes there swiftly and speedily;
while he is rushing swiftly and speedily
his skin burns
and his hide burns
and his flesh burns
and his tendons burn

and his eyes are filled with smoke -
such is his plight.

And though he has attained much,
the gateway is nevertheless closed against him.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

■

Monks, there comes a time
once in a very long while when the northern gateway of this Great Niraya Hell is opened.

He rushes there swiftly and speedily;
while he is rushing swiftly and speedily
his skin burns
and his hide burns
and his flesh burns
and his tendons burn
and his eyes are filled with smoke -
such is his plight.

And though he has attained much,
the gateway is nevertheless closed against him.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

■

Monks, there comes a time
once in a very long while when the southern gateway of this Great Niraya Hell is opened.

He rushes there swiftly and speedily;
while he is rushing swiftly and speedily
his skin burns
and his hide burns
and his flesh burns
and his tendons burn
and his eyes are filled with smoke -
such is his plight.

And though he has attained much,
the gateway is nevertheless closed against him.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Monks, there comes a time
once in a very long while
when the eastern gateway of this Great Niraya Hell is opened.

He rushes there swiftly and speedily;
while he is rushing swiftly and speedily
his skin burns
and his hide burns
and his flesh burns
and his tendons burn
and his eyes are filled with smoke -
such is his plight.

He issues forth by this gateway.

But, monks, adjacent to this Great Niraya Hell is the Great Filth Hell.<sup>12</sup>

He falls into it.

And, monks, in that Filth Hell needle-mouthed creatures cut away his skin; having cut away his skin they cut away his hide; having cut away his hide they cut away his flesh;
having cut away his flesh they cut away his tendons; having cut away his tendons they cut away his bones; having cut away his bones they devour the marrow of the bones.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

And, monks, adjacent to this Filth Hell is the great Ember Hell.<sup>13</sup>

He falls into it.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

And, monks, adjacent to that Ember Hell is the great Forest of Silk-Cotton Trees<sup>14</sup> towering a yojana high with prickles a finger-breadth long,
burning,
aflake,
ablaze.

They make him climb up and they make him climb down.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

And, monks, adjacent to that Forest of Silk-Cotton Trees is the great Sword-leaved Forest.<sup>15</sup>

He enters it.

Its leaves,
stirred by the wind,
cut off his hands
and cut off his feet and cut off his hands and feet and cut off his his ear, and cut off his his nose,
and cut off his his ears and nose.

Thereat [229] he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

And, monks, adjacent to that Sword-leafed Forest is the great River of Caustic Water.<sup>16</sup>

He falls into it.

There he is carried with the steam and he is carried against the stream and he is carried with and against the stream.<sup>17</sup>

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell haul him out<sup>18</sup> with a fish-hook, set him on dry ground
and speak thus to him:

'My good man,
what do you want?'

He speaks thus:

'I am hungry, revered sirs.'

Monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell, opening his mouth with a glowing iron spike,
burning,
aflake,
ablaze,
then push into his mouth
a glowing copper pellet,

burning,
aflame,
ablaze.

It burns his lips
and it burns his mouth
and it burns his throat
and it burns his chest
and it passes out below
taking with it his bowels and intestines.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then, monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell
speak thus to him:

'My good man, what do you want?

He speaks thus:

'I am thirsty, revered sirs.'

Monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell, opening his mouth with a glowing iron spike,
burning,
aflame,
ablaze,
sprinkle glowing copper and bronze into his mouth, burning,
aflame,
ablaze.

It burns his lips
and it burns his mouth
and it burns his throat
and it burns his chest
and it passes out below
taking with it his bowels and intestines.

Thereat he feels feelings that are painful,
sharp,
severe.

But he does not do his time
until he makes an end of that evil deed.

Then, monks, the guardians of Niraya Hell push him back again into the Great Niraya Hell.

Once upon a time, monks,
it occurred to King Yama:

'Those that do evil deeds in the world are subjected to a variety of punishments like these.

O that I might acquire human status and that a [230] Tathāgata might arise in the world, a perfected one,
a fully Self-Awakened One,
and that I might wait on that Lord, and that that Lord might teach me dhamma, and that I might understand that Lord's dhamma'

What I am talking about, monks, I have heard from no other recluse or brahman;
and moreover
what I am talking about is known only by me myself, seen by myself,

discerned by myself."

Thus spoke the Lord.

When the Well-farer had said this,
the Teacher further spoke thus:

"If young men, warned by deva-messengers, are indolent,
For a long time they grieve - men going to lowly assemblies.
But those who here are truly men, when warned by deva-messengers
Are never indolent in the ariyan dhamma;
Seeing peril in grasping, in the origin of birth and dying,
They are freed without grasping through the destruction of birth and dying.
These, attaining security, happy, here and now perfectly allayed,<sup>19</sup> Outstripping all hatred and fear, pass beyond all anguish."

Discourse on the Deva-Messengers:
The Tenth

Division on Emptiness:
The Third

---

<sup>1</sup> Referred to at MA. ii. 422 with special reference to the explanation of Niraya.

<sup>2</sup> Simile as at M. i. 279, ii. 21.

<sup>3</sup> Again passāmi, but other contexts mostly read pajānāmi.

<sup>4</sup> From here onwards cf. A. i. 138 ff., where however there are only three deva-messengers.

<sup>5</sup> Omitted in Chalmers' M. text, but found at A. i. 138, D. iii. 72.

<sup>6</sup> Or heedless.

<sup>7</sup> This description of Niraya Hell, down to the end of the verse, occurs also at M. iii. 100-167.

<sup>8</sup> See above, p. 212, n. [16].

<sup>9</sup> I propose reading akkhīni instead of text's aṭṭhīni; cf. DhA. i. 425, akkhīni me dhūmāyanti.

<sup>10</sup> ubbhataṃ tādisaṃ eva hoti, such is his pulling out (or pulling back). But as yet he is unable to pull out quickly enough. The next time the eastern gateway is opened he goes out by it.

<sup>11</sup> bahusampatta. MA. iv. 235, after saying that he has attained many hundred thousand years in Avīci but that it takes him all this time to work off the ripening of his evil deed, then describes the crucifixion of Devadatta in the midst of the six fires of Avīci, a name that appears to mean there is no interval in (or suspension of) anguish.

<sup>12</sup> Gūthaniraya, mentioned also at VvA. 226. See D.P.P.N. for all these Hells.

<sup>13</sup> Kukkuḷaniraya. At Mhvu. i. 6 it is said that the people here run about in flames.

<sup>14</sup> Simbalavana.

<sup>15</sup> Asipattavana.

<sup>16</sup> Khārodakā nadī. Called at MA. iv. 237 the river Vetaraṇī. Mhvu. i. 7 also implies that this river, Vetaraṇī, is near the Sword-leafed Forest, Asipatravana, which there is apparently a "secondary hell" (the meaning of which may more properly be Kumbha). For utsada-niraya as meaning "secondary hell" (sixteen attached to each of the eight hells), see Mhvu. Trans., vol. i, p. 6, n. 1.

<sup>17</sup> He does not get across-to the safety of the Further Shore.

<sup>18</sup> Cf. Mhvu. i. 7-8.

<sup>19</sup> abhinibbutā. This verse also occurs at A. i. 142, and the last four lines at A. iii. 311.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
4. Vibhaṅga Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
4. The Division on Analysis

131. Discourse on the Auspicious<sup>1</sup>

Bhadd'Eka-Ratta Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvathī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"I will teach you, monks, the exposition and the analysis of the Auspicious. Listen to it, pay careful attention and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"The past<sup>2</sup> should not be followed after,<sup>3</sup> the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has vision<sup>4</sup> now here, now there, of a present thing,<sup>5</sup>
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable,<sup>6</sup> let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task<sup>7</sup> this very day. Who knows whether he will die tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

[4][nana][ntbb][than][188] And how, monks, does one follow after the past?

[234] He thinks: 'Such was my material shape in the distant past' and finds<sup>8</sup> delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such was my feeling in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such was my my perception in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such were my habitual tendencies in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such was my consciousness in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.

Even so, monks, does one follow after the past.

And how, monks, does one not follow after the past?

He thinks: 'Such was my material shape in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such was my feeling in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such was my perception in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such were my habitual tendencies in the distant past'

but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such was my consciousness in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.

Even so, monks, does one not follow after the past.

And how, monks, does one desire the future?

He thinks: 'May my material shape be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my feeling be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my perception be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my habitual tendencies be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my consciousness be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

Even so, monks, does one desire the future.

And how, monks, does one not desire the future?

He thinks: 'May my material shape be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my feeling be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my perception be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my habitual tendencies be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my consciousness be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

Even so, monks, does one not desire the future.

And how, monks, is one drawn away among present things?<sup>2</sup>

As to this, monks, an uninstructed ordinary person,
taking no count of the pure ones,
unskilled in the dhamma of the pure ones,
untrained in the dhamma of the pure ones,
taking no count of the true men,
unskilled in the dhamma of the true men,
untrained in the dhamma of the true men,
regards material shape as self
or self as having material shape
or material shape as in self
or self as in material shape;

or he regards feeling as self
or self as having feeling
or feeling as in self
or self as in feeling;

or he regards perception as self
or self as having perception
or perception as in self
or self as in perception;

or he regards the habitual tendencies as self
or self as having habitual tendencies
or habitual tendencies as in self
or self as in habitual tendencies;

or he regards consciousness [189] as self
or self as having consciousness
or consciousness as in self
or self as in consciousness.

Even so, monks, is one drawn away among present things.

And how, monks, is one not drawn away among present things?

As to this, monks, an instructed disciple of the pure ones,
taking count of the pure ones,
skilled in the dhamma of the pure ones,
trained in the dhamma of the pure ones,
taking count of the true men,
skilled in the dhamma of the true men,
trained in the dhamma [235] of the true men,
does not regard material shape as self
or self as having material shape
or material shape as in self
or self as in material shape;

and he does not regard feeling as self
or self as having feeling
or feeling as in self
or self as in feeling;

and he does not regard perception as self
or self as having perception
or perception as in self
or self as in perception;

and he does not regard the habitual tendencies as self
or self as having the habitual tendencies
or the habitual tendencies as in self
or self as in the habitual tendencies;

and he does not regard consciousness as self
or self as having consciousness
or consciousness as in self
or self as in consciousness.

Even so, monks, is one not drawn away among present things.

The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has vision now here, now there, of a present thing,

Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?

There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

When I said:
'I will teach you, monks,
the exposition and the analysis of the Auspicious,'
it was said in reference to this."

Thus spoke the Lord. Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on the Auspicious:

The First

---

<sup>1</sup> This title is hard to translate. MA. v. 1 connects the word bhaddekaratta with being endowed with intentness on vipassanā, insight gained in meditation. See Intr., p. xxvi. This is the Vagga that has 12 Discourses. If it were thought desirable to reduce them to the normal 10, this Discourse, spoken by the Lord, would rank as one, and the next three, spoken by disciples, would have to be counted together as another single Discourse.

<sup>2</sup> The five khandhas in the past, MA. v. 1. These verses are also at Netti. 149, Ap. p. 506.

<sup>3</sup> nānvāgameyya, which MA. v. 1. explains as nānugaccheyya, to follow after.

The meaning of anvāgameti appears to be to cause to come back, i.e. to recall, because of craving and wrong view.

<sup>4</sup> vipassati, that is, in meditation.

<sup>5</sup> Realising that it is impermanent and so on.

<sup>6</sup> By attachment and so on.

<sup>7</sup> ajj'eva kiccaṃ ātappaṃ; cf. Dhp. 276. This line and the next are quoted at UdA. 89, DhA. iii. 430.

<sup>8</sup> samanvāneti, continues to take, explained by anupavatteti, to keep moving on after, at MA. v. 3.

<sup>9</sup> paccuppannesu dhammesu saṅhīrati. Saṅhīrati is to be drawn into or to be caught; also to be drawn away by craving and false view from developing insight or vision. vipassanā. MA. v. 2.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
4. Vibhaṅga Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
4. The Division on Analysis

132. Ānanda's Discourse on the Auspicious

Ānanda-Bhadd'Eka-Ratta Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Now at that time the venerable Ānanda gladdened,
roused,
incited
and delighted the monks
with talk on dhamma
in an assembly hall;
and he spoke the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious.

Then the Lord, emerging from solitary meditation towards evening, approached that assembly hall;

having approached,
he sat down on the seat made ready.

As he was sitting down,
the Lord addressed the monks,
saying:

"Now, who, monks, gladdened,
roused,
incited,
and delighted the monks
with talk on dhamma
in the assembly hall?

And did he speak the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious?"

"The venerable Ānanda, revered sir, gladdened,
roused,
incited,
and delighted the monks
with talk on dhamma
in the assembly hall;
and he spoke the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious."

[236] Then the Lord addressed the venerable Ānanda, saying:

"But how is it that you, Ānanda, gladdened,
roused,
incited,

and delighted the monks
with talk on dhamma?<sup>1</sup>

Did you speak the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious?"

"I, revered sir, gladdened,
roused,
incited,
and delighted the monks
with talk on dhamma thus.

I spoke the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has vision now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

And how, monks, does one follow after the past?

He thinks: 'Such was my material shape in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such was my feeling in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such was my my perception in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such were my habitual tendencies in the distant past'

and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such was my consciousness in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.

Even so, monks, does one follow after the past.

And how, monks, does one not follow after the past?

He thinks: 'Such was my material shape in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such was my feeling in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such was my perception in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such were my habitual tendencies in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such was my consciousness in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.

Even so, monks, does one not follow after the past.

And how, monks, does one desire the future?

He thinks: 'May my material shape be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my feeling be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my perception be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my habitual tendencies be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my consciousness be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

Even so, monks, does one desire the future.

And how, monks, does one not desire the future?

He thinks: 'May my material shape be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my feeling be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my perception be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my habitual tendencies be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my consciousness be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

Even so, monks, does one not desire the future.

And how, monks, is one drawn away among present things?

As to this, monks, an uninstructed ordinary person,
taking no count of the pure ones,
unskilled in the dhamma of the pure ones,
untrained in the dhamma of the pure ones,
taking no count of the true men,
unskilled in the dhamma of the true men,
untrained in the dhamma of the true men,
regards material shape as self
or self as having material shape
or material shape as in self
or self as in material shape;

or he regards feeling as self
or self as having feeling
or feeling as in self
or self as in feeling;

or he regards perception as self
or self as having perception
or perception as in self
or self as in perception;

or he regards the habitual tendencies as self
or self as having habitual tendencies
or habitual tendencies as in self
or self as in habitual tendencies;

or he regards consciousness [189] as self
or self as having consciousness
or consciousness as in self
or self as in consciousness.

Even so, monks, is one drawn away among present things.

And how, monks, is one not drawn away among present things?

As to this, monks, an instructed disciple of the pure ones,
taking count of the pure ones,
skilled in the dhamma of the pure ones,
trained in the dhamma of the pure ones,
taking count of the true men,
skilled in the dhamma of the true men,
trained in the dhamma of the true men,
does not regard material shape as self
or self as having material shape
or material shape as in self
or self as in material shape;

and he does not regard feeling as self
or self as having feeling
or feeling as in self
or self as in feeling;

and he does not regard perception as self
or self as having perception
or perception as in self
or self as in perception;

and he does not regard the habitual tendencies as self
or self as having the habitual tendencies
or the habitual tendencies as in self
or self as in the habitual tendencies;

and he does not regard consciousness as self
or self as having consciousness
or consciousness as in self
or self as in consciousness.

Even so, monks, is one not drawn away among present things.

The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has vision now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

It was thus, revered sir, that I gladdened,
roused,
incited,
delighted the monks
with talk on dhamma
and spoke the exposition
and analysis
of the Auspicious."

"It is good, Ānanda,
it is good;
it is good that you, Ānanda, gladdened,
roused,

incited,
delighted the monks
with talk on dhamma
and spoke the exposition
and analysis
of the Auspicious:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.<sup>2</sup>
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has vision now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

And how, Ānanda, does one follow after the past?

He thinks: 'Such was my material shape in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such was my feeling in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such was my my perception in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such were my habitual tendencies in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such was my consciousness in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.

Even so, Ānanda, does one follow after the past.

And how, Ānanda, does one not follow after the past?

He thinks: 'Such was my material shape in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such was my feeling in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such was my perception in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such were my habitual tendencies in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such was my consciousness in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.

Even so, Ānanda, does one not follow after the past.

And how, Ānanda, does one desire the future?

He thinks: 'May my material shape be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my feeling be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my perception be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my habitual tendencies be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my consciousness be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

Even so, Ānanda, does one desire the future.

And how, Ānanda, does one not desire the future?

He thinks: 'May my material shape be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my feeling be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my perception be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my habitual tendencies be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my consciousness be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

Even so, Ānanda, does one not desire the future.

And how, Ānanda, is one drawn [237]away among present things?

As to this, Ānanda, an uninstructed ordinary person,
taking no count of the pure ones,
unskilled in the dhamma of the pure ones,
untrained in the dhamma of the pure ones,
taking no count of the true men,
unskilled in the dhamma of the true men,
untrained in the dhamma of the true men,
regards material shape as self
or self as having material shape
or material shape as in self
or self as in material shape;

or he regards feeling as self
or self as having feeling
or feeling as in self
or self as in feeling;

or he regards perception as self
or self as having perception
or perception as in self
or self as in perception;

or he regards the habitual tendencies as self
or self as having habitual tendencies
or habitual tendencies as in self
or self as in habitual tendencies;

or he regards consciousness [189] as self
or self as having consciousness

or consciousness as in self
or self as in consciousness.

Even so, Ānanda, is one drawn away among present things.

And how, Ānanda, is one not drawn away among present things?

As to this, Ānanda, an instructed disciple of the pure ones,
taking count of the pure ones,
skilled in the dhamma of the pure ones,
trained in the dhamma of the pure ones,
taking count of the true men,
skilled in the dhamma of the true men,
trained in the dhamma of the true men,
does not regard material shape as self
or self as having material shape
or material shape as in self
or self as in material shape;

and he does not regard feeling as self
or self as having feeling
or feeling as in self
or self as in feeling;

and he does not regard perception as self
or self as having perception
or perception as in self
or self as in perception;

and he does not regard the habitual tendencies as self
or self as having the habitual tendencies
or the habitual tendencies as in self
or self as in the habitual tendencies;

and he does not regard consciousness as self
or self as having consciousness

or consciousness as in self
or self as in consciousness.

Even so, Ānanda, is one not drawn away among present things.

The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has vision now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the venerable Ānanda rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Ānanda's Discourse on the Auspicious:
The Second

---

<sup>1</sup> See p. 245, n. 3 below.

<sup>2</sup> The whole of Discourse No. 131 from the first line of the verse to the last line of its second occurrence is here supposed to be repeated. [Ed.: Included in this version.]

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
4. Vibhaṅga Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
4. The Division on Analysis

133. Mahā Kaccāna's Discourse on the Auspicious

Mahā Kaccāna-Bhadd'Eka-Ratta Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Rājagaha in the Tapoda monastery.<sup>1</sup>

Then the venerable Samiddhi,<sup>2</sup> getting up when the night was waning, went to the Tapoda (lake) to bathe his limbs.

When he had bathed his limbs in the Tapoda (lake) and had come out (of the water), he stood in one robe drying his limbs.

Then, when the night was far spent,<sup>3</sup> a certain deva
illumining with his radiant beauty the whole of the Tapoda,<sup>4</sup> approached the venerable Samiddhi
and, having approached,
stood at one side.

While he was standing at one side,
this deva spoke thus to the venerable Samiddhi:

[238] "Do you, monk, remember
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious?"

"I, friend,<sup>5</sup> do not remember
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious.

But do you, friend, remember
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious?"

"I too, monk, do not remember either the exposition
or the analysis
of the Auspicious.

But do you, monk, remember
the verses of the Auspicious?"

"I, friend, do not remember
the verses of the Auspicious.

But do you, friend, remember
the verses of the Auspicious?"

"I too, monk, do not remember
the verses of the Auspicious.

But do you, monk, learn
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious;
do you, monk, master
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious;
do you, monk, remember
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious.

For the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious, monk,
are connected with the goal,
they are fundamental to the Brahma-faring."

Thus spoke this deva;
having said this,
he disappeared then and there.

Then the venerable Samiddhi
towards the end of that night
approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the venerable Samiddhi

spoke thus to the Lord:

"Now I, revered sir,
when the night was waning went to the Tapoda (lake) to bathe my limbs.

When I had bathed my limbs in the Tapoda (lake)
and had come out (of the water), I stood in one robe
while drying my limbs.

Then, revered sir, when the night was far spent a certain deva
illuminating with his radiant beauty the whole of the Tapoda, approached me
and, having approached,
stood at one side.

While he was standing at one side,
this deva spoke thus to me:

"Do you, monk, remember
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious?"

"I, friend, do not remember
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious.

But do you, friend, remember
the exposition

and the analysis
of the Auspicious?"

"I too, monk, do not remember either the exposition
or the analysis
of the Auspicious.

But do you, monk, remember
the verses of the Auspicious?"

"I, friend, do not remember
the verses of the Auspicious.

But do you, friend, remember
the verses of the Auspicious?"

"I too, monk, do not remember
the verses of the Auspicious.

But do you, monk, learn
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious;
do you, monk, master
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious;
do you, monk, remember
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious.

For the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious, monk,

are connected with the goal,
they are fundamental to the Brahma-faring."

Thus spoke this deva;
having said this,
he disappeared then and there.

It were good, revered sir,
if the Lord would teach me
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious."

"Well then, monk, listen and attend carefully
and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
the venerable Samiddhi answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has eye now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

Thus spoke the Lord.

When he had said this,<sup>6</sup> the Well-farer rose [239] from his seat
and entered a dwelling-place.

Soon after the Lord had gone, it occurred to those monks:

"Your reverences, the Lord,
having recited this exposition to us in brief, but not having explained the meaning in full,
rose from his seat
and entered a dwelling-place:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has eye now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?

There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

Now, who can explain the meaning in full of this exposition that was recited in brief by the Lord
but the meaning of which was not explained in full?"

Then it occurred to these monks:

"Now the venerable Kaccāna the Great
is both praised by the Teacher
and revered by intelligent fellow-Brahma-farers;
and the venerable Kaccāna the Great
is able to explain in full
the meaning of this exposition
that was recited in brief by the Lord
but the meaning of which was not explained in full.

Suppose we were to approach the venerable Kaccāna the Great,
and having approached,
were to question him on this meaning?"

Then these monks approached the venerable Kaccāna the Great;
having approached,
they exchanged greetings with him,
and when they had conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
they sat down at a respectful distance.

As they were sitting down at a respectful distance, these monks spoke thus to the venerable Kaccāna the Great:

"Reverend Kaccāna,
the Lord, having recited this exposition to us in brief but not having explained its meaning in full,
rose from his seat and entered a dwelling-place:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has eye now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

Soon after the Lord had departed, it occurred to us,
reverend Kaccāna:

"Your reverences, the Lord,
having recited this exposition to us in brief,
but not having explained the meaning in full,
rose from his seat
and entered a dwelling-place:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has eye now here, now there, of a present thing,

Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?

There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

Now, who can explain the meaning in full
of this exposition that was recited in brief by the Lord
but the meaning of which was not ex- [240] plained in full?"

Then it occurred to us:

"Now the venerable Kaccāna the Great
is both praised by the Teacher
and revered by intelligent fellow-Brahma-farers;
and the venerable Kaccāna the Great
is able to explain in full
the meaning of this exposition
that was recited in brief by the Lord
but the meaning of which was not explained in full.

Suppose we were to approach the venerable Kaccāna the Great,
and having approached,
were to question him on this meaning?"

May the venerable Kaccāna the Great explain it."

"Your reverences,
as a man walking about aiming at the pith, searching for the pith,
looking about for the pith
of a great,
stable
and pithy tree,
might pass by the root,
pass by the trunk,

thinking that the pith was to be looked for in the branches and foliage -
even so is this performance of the venerable ones,
for (although) you had the Teacher face to face, yet you have ignored that Lord and judge that it is I who should be questioned on this meaning.

But, your reverences,
the Lord knows what should be known,
sees what should be seen,
he has become eye,
become knowledge,
become dhamma,
become Brahma,
he is the propounder,
the expounder,
the bringer of the goal,
the giver of the Deathless,
dhamma-lord,
Tathāgata.

This was the time
when you should have questioned the Lord on this meaning so that you might have understood what the Lord explained to you."

"Undoubtedly, reverend Kaccāna,
the Lord knows what should be known,
sees what should be seen,
he has become eye,
become knowledge,
become dhamma,
become Brahma,
he is the propounder,

the expounder,
the bringer of the goal,
the giver of the Deathless,
dhamma-lord,
Tathāgata.

This was the time
when we should have questioned the Lord on this meaning so that we might have understood what the Lord explained to us.

But the venerable Kaccāna the Great
is both praised by the Teacher
and revered by intelligent fellow Brahma-farers;
and the venerable Kaccāna the Great is able to explain in full the meaning of this exposition that was recited in brief by the Lord
but the meaning of which was not explained in full.

May the venerable Kaccana explain it, without finding it troublesome."

"Well then, your reverences,
listen,
pay careful attention
and I will speak."

"Yes, your reverence,"
these monks answered the venerable Kaccāna the Great in assent.

The venerable Kaccāna the Great spoke thus:

"In regard to that exposition, your reverences,
that the Lord recited in brief but the meaning of which he had not explained in full when he rose from his seat
and entered a dwelling-place:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has eye now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?

There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

Of this exposition that was recited by the Lord in brief but the [241] meaning of which he did not explain in full,
I, your reverences, understand the meaning in full thus:

And how, your reverences, does one follow after the past?

He thinks:

'Such was my eye<sup>7ed1</sup> in the distant past,
such were material shapes,' and his consciousness<sup>8</sup> is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment, he delights in it;<sup>9</sup>
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my ear in the distant past,
such were sounds,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there

by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my nose in the distant past,
such were smells,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my tongue in the distant past,
such were flavours,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my body in the distant past,
such were tactile objects,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my mind in the distant past,
such were mental states,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one follows after the past.

---

And how, your reverences, does one not follow after the past?

He thinks:

'Such was my eye in the distant past,
such were material shapes,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my ear in the distant past,
such were sounds,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my nose in the distant past,
such were smells,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;

not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my tongue in the distant past,
such were flavours,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my body in the distant past,
such were tactile objects,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my mind in the distant past,
such were mental states,'

but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one does not follow after the past.

---

And how, your reverences, does one desire the future?

He thinks:

'May my eye be such
in the distant future,
material [242] shapes such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my ear be such
in the distant future,

sounds such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my nose be such
in the distant future,
smells such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my tongue be such
in the distant future,
flavours such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my body be such
in the distant future,
tactile objects such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my mind be such
in the distant future,
mental objects such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one desires the future.

---

And how, your reverences, does one not desire the future?

He thinks:

'May my eye be such
in the distant future,
material shapes such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my ear be such
in the distant future,
sounds such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my nose be such
in the distant future,
smells such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;

not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my tongue be such
in the distant future,
flavours such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my body be such
in the distant future,
tactile objects such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my mind be such
in the distant future,

mental states such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one does not desire the future.

---

And how, your reverences,
is one drawn away among present things?

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time<sup>10</sup> both eye and material shapes<sup>11</sup>
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment at this same present time,<sup>12</sup> (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment, he delights in them;<sup>13</sup>
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both ear and sounds

to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both nose and smells
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both tongue and flavours
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both body and tactile objects
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both mind and mental states
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one is drawn away among present things.

---

[243] And how, your reverences, is one not drawn away among present things?

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both eye and material shapes
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both ear and sounds
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both nose and smells
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment

at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both tongue and flavours
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both body and tactile objects
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time both mind and mental states<sup>14</sup>
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one is not drawn away among present things.

In regard to that exposition, your reverences,
that the Lord recited in brief
but the meaning of which he had not explained in full when he rose from his seat
and entered a dwelling-place:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has eye now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

Of this exposition
that was recited by the Lord in brief but the meaning of which he did not explain in full,
I, your reverences, understand the meaning in full thus.

But if you, venerable ones, so desire,
having approached the Lord, you can question him as to the meaning,
so that as the Lord explains it to you so you may understand it."

Then these monks, delighting and rejoicing in what the venerable Kaccāna the Great had said,
rising from their seats,
approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
they sat down at a respectful distance.

As they were sitting down at a respectful distance,
these monks spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, the Lord,
having recited this exposition to us in brief,
rose from his seat
and entered a dwelling-place before he had explained the meaning in full:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has eye now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

[244] And, revered sir, not long after the Lord had departed, it occurred to us:

"Your reverences, the Lord,
having recited this exposition to us in brief,

but not having explained the meaning in full,
rose from his seat
and entered a dwelling-place:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has eye now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

Now, who can explain the meaning in full
of this exposition that was recited in brief by the Lord
but the meaning of which was not explained in full?"

Then it occurred to us:

"Now the venerable Kaccāna the Great
is both praised by the Teacher
and revered by intelligent fellow-Brahma-farers;
and the venerable Kaccāna the Great
is able to explain in full
the meaning of this exposition
that was recited in brief by the Lord
but the meaning of which was not explained in full.

Suppose we were to approach the venerable Kaccāna the Great,
and having approached,
were to question him on this meaning?"

Then we, revered sir, approached the venerable Kaccāna the Great,
and having approached
we questioned the venerable Kaccāna the Great on this meaning.

The meaning of these (words), revered sir, was explained to us by the venerable Kaccāna the Great by these methods,
by these sentences,
by these words:"ed2

"In regard to that exposition, your reverences,
that the Lord recited in brief
but the meaning of which he had not explained in full when he rose from his seat
and entered a dwelling-place:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has eye now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

Of this exposition that was recited by the Lord in brief
but the meaning of which
he did not explain in full,
I, your reverences, understand the meaning in full thus:

And how, your reverences, does one follow after the past?

He thinks:

'Such was my eye in the distant past,
such were material shapes,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast

by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my ear in the distant past,
such were sounds,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my nose in the distant past,
such were smells,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my tongue in the distant past,
such were flavours,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my body in the distant past,
such were tactile objects,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my mind in the distant past,
such were mental states,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one follows after the past.

---

And how, your reverences,
does one not follow after the past?

He thinks:

'Such was my eye in the distant past,
such were material shapes,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my ear in the distant past,
such were sounds,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my nose in the distant past,
such were smells,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my tongue in the distant past,
such were flavours,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my body in the distant past,
such were tactile objects,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast

by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my mind in the distant past,
such were mental states,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one does not follow after the past.

---

And how, your reverences,
does one desire the future?

He thinks:

'May my eye be such
in the distant future,
material shapes such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;

because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my ear be such
in the distant future,
sounds such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my nose be such
in the distant future,
smells such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my tongue be such
in the distant future,
flavours such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my body be such
in the distant future,
tactile objects such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my mind be such
in the distant future,
mental objects such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one desires the future.

---

And how, your reverences,
does one not desire the future?

He thinks:

'May my eye be such
in the distant future,
material shapes such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my ear be such
in the distant future,
sounds such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my nose be such
in the distant future,
smells such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my tongue be such
in the distant future,
flavours such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my body be such
in the distant future,
tactile objects such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;

because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my mind be such
in the distant future,
mental states such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one does not desire the future.

---

And how, your reverences,
is one drawn away among present things?

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both eye and material shapes
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast

by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both ear and sounds
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both nose and smells
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time

both tongue and flavours
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both body and tactile objects
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both mind and mental states
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;

delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one is drawn away among present things.

---

And how, your reverences, is one not drawn away among present things?

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both eye and material shapes
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both ear and sounds
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;

not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both nose and smells
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both tongue and flavours
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both body and tactile objects
to which his consciousness is not bound fast

by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both mind and mental states
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one is not drawn away among present things.

In regard to that exposition, your reverences,
that the Lord recited in brief
but the meaning of which he had not explained in full when he rose from his seat
and entered a dwelling-place:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has eye now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die

tomorrow?

There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

Of this exposition
that was recited by the Lord in brief
but the meaning of which he did not explain in full,
I, your reverences, understand the meaning in full thus.

"Learned, monks, is Kaccāna the Great,
of great wisdom, monks, is Kaccāna the Great.

For if you, monks, had questioned me as to this meaning,
I too would have explained it precisely as it was explained by Kaccāna the Great.

Indeed, this is the exact meaning of that,
and thus should you remember it:"ed3

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has eye now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?

There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

And how, your reverences, does one follow after the past?

He thinks:

'Such was my eye in the distant past,
such were material shapes,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there

by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my ear in the distant past,
such were sounds,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my nose in the distant past,
such were smells,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my tongue in the distant past,
such were flavours,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my body in the distant past,
such were tactile objects,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;
delighting in it
he follows after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my mind in the distant past,
such were mental states,'
and his consciousness is bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in it;

delighting in it
he follows after the past.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one follows after the past.

---

And how, your reverences,
does one not follow after the past?

He thinks:

'Such was my eye in the distant past,
such were material shapes,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my ear in the distant past,
such were sounds,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;

not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my nose in the distant past,
such were smells,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my tongue in the distant past,
such were flavours,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my body in the distant past,
such were tactile objects,'

but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

■

He thinks:

'Such was my mind in the distant past,
such were mental states,'
but without his consciousness being bound fast there
by desire and attachment;
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in it;
not delighting in it
he does not follow after the past.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one does not follow after the past.

---

And how, your reverences,
does one desire the future?

He thinks:

'May my eye be such
in the distant future,

material shapes such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my ear be such
in the distant future,
sounds such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my nose be such
in the distant future,
smells such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my tongue be such
in the distant future,
flavours such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my body be such
in the distant future,
tactile objects such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;
delighting in that,
he desires the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my mind be such
in the distant future,
mental objects such'
and bends his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he so bends his thought,
he delights in that;

delighting in that,
he desires the future.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one desires the future.

---

And how, your reverences,
does one not desire the future?

He thinks:

'May my eye be such
in the distant future,
material shapes such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my ear be such
in the distant future,
sounds such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;

not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my nose be such
in the distant future,
smells such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my tongue be such
in the distant future,
flavours such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my body be such
in the distant future,

tactile objects such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

■

He thinks:

'May my mind be such
in the distant future,
mental states such'
but does not bend his thought
to the acquisition of what is not (yet) acquired;
because he does not so bend his thought,
he does not delight in that;
not delighting in that,
he does not desire the future.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one does not desire the future.

---

And how, your reverences,
is one drawn away among present things?

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both eye and material shapes
to which his consciousness is bound fast

by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both ear and sounds
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both nose and smells
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both tongue and flavours
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both body and tactile objects
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both mind and mental states
to which his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)

because his consciousness is bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he delights in them;
delighting in them,
he is drawn away among present things.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one is drawn away among present things.

---

And how, your reverences, is one not drawn away among present things?

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both eye and material shapes
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both ear and sounds
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast

by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both nose and smells
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both tongue and flavours
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time

both body and tactile objects
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

■

If, your reverences,
there are at this present time
both mind and mental states
to which his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment
at this same present time, (then)
because his consciousness is not bound fast
by desire and attachment,
he does not delight in them;
not delighting in them,
he is not drawn away among present things.

It is thus, your reverences,
that one is not drawn away among present things.

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Mahā Kaccāna's Discourse on the Auspicious:
The Third

---

<sup>1</sup> So called because it faced the Tapoda lake. At MA. v. 4 this is called "hot," tatta. Cf. SA.i. 38, VinA. ii. 512 and see B.D. i. 188, n. 1, 274, n. 6, K.S. i. 14, n. 6. See also S. i. 8 where likewise a devatā spoke to Samiddhi at this place.

<sup>2</sup> See M. Sta. 136. At Thag. 46 a verse is ascribed to him. See Pas. Breath., p. 61, n. 3.

<sup>3</sup> For notes on words in this passage see M.L.S. i. 183.

<sup>4</sup> Probably both the lake and the monastery.

<sup>5</sup> āvuso.

<sup>6</sup> Cf. M. i. 110 ff.

<sup>7</sup> MA. v. 5-6 explains that in the two preceding Discourses and in the following one the headings (mātikā) and the analysis were made in respect of the five khandhā; but here the headings refer to the 12 (sense-)fields (āyatanā), i.e. the six sensory organs and their six (appropriate) sense-data.

<sup>8</sup> MA. v. 6 reads with a Burmese edn. nikanti viññāṇa, consciousness that is desire, craving, longing for.

<sup>9</sup> I.e. in "eye," etc. Cf. S. iv. 13 f., where one rejoices in the six sense-fields.

<sup>10</sup> etaṃ paccuppanaṃ.

<sup>11</sup> It would appear that "eye and material shapes" form a pair, expressed by the word ubhayaṃ. Attachment, etc., is to this (pair), tasmim. So with the ear and sounds, etc.

<sup>12</sup> yeva paccuppanne.

<sup>13</sup> I.e. desire and attachment, but expressed by taṃ, again referring to the pair = both.

14 Quoted at Asl. 420.

---

ed1 Ms. Horner has 'vision' here, but it should be the organ as she has it in the following sections.

ed2 This is left as is as the abridgement in Ms. Horners translation.

ed3 This is not repeated in either the Pali or Ms. Horner's translation, but I have repeated it as that is the more usual way such conversations ended. It gives the bhikkhus one more opportunity to clarify their memory.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
4. Vibhaṅga Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
4. The Division on Analysis

134. Lomasakaṅgiya's Discourse on the Auspicious

Lomasakaṅgiya-Bhadd'Eka-Ratta Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

Now at that time the venerable Lomasakaṅgiyai<sup>1</sup> was staying among the Sakyans near Kapilavatthu
in Nigrodha's park.

Then, when the night was far spent, the deva<sup>2</sup> Candana, illumining with his radiant beauty
the whole of Nigrodha's park, approached the venerable Lomasakaṅgiyai;
and having approached,
he stood at one side.

As he was standing at one side the deva Candana spoke thus to the venerable Lomasakaṅgiyai:

"Do you, monk, remember
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious?"

"I, friend, do not remember
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious.

But do you, friend, remember
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious?"

"I too, monk, do not remember either the exposition
or the analysis
of the Auspicious.

But do you, monk, remember
the verses of the Auspicious?"

"I, friend, do not remember
the verses of the Auspicious.

But do you, friend, remember
the verses of the Auspicious?"

"I, monk, remember the verses of the Auspicious."

"But how is it<sup>3</sup> that you, friend, remember
the verses of the Auspicious?"

[246] "At this one time, monk,
the Lord was staying among the devas of the Thirty-Three at the root of the Coral Tree on the ornamental stone.<sup>4</sup>

While he was there
the Lord spoke the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious
to the devas of the Thirty-Three:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has eye now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

Thus it is that I, monk, remember
the verses of the Auspicious.

Do you, monk, learn<sup>5</sup> the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious;
do you, monk, master<sup>6</sup>
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious;
do you, monk, remember<sup>7</sup>
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious.

The exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious, monk,
are connected with the goal,
they are fundamental to the Brahma-faring."

Thus spoke the deva Candana;
having said this,
he disappeared then and there.

Then the venerable Lomasakaṅgiyai
towards the end of that night,
having packed away his lodging,
set out on tour for Sāvattḥī,
taking his bowl and robe.

Walking on tour,
he gradually approached Sāvattḥī, the Jeta Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery and the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a [247] respectful distance the venerable Lomasakaṅgiyai spoke thus to the Lord:

"At this one time, revered sir, I was staying among the Sakyans near Kapilavatthu
in Nigrodha's park.

Then, revered sir,
when the night was far spent
a certain deva,
illumining with his radiant beauty
the whole of Nigrodha's park,

approached me
and having approached,
he stood at one side.

As he was standing at one side bespoke thus:

"Do you, monk, remember
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious?"

"I, friend, do not remember
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious.

But do you, friend, remember
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious?"

"I too, monk, do not remember either the exposition
or the analysis
of the Auspicious.

But do you, monk, remember
the verses of the Auspicious?"

"I, friend, do not remember
the verses of the Auspicious.

But do you, friend, remember
the verses of the Auspicious?"

"I, monk, remember the verses of the Auspicious."

"But how is it that you, friend, remember
the verses of the Auspicious?"

"At this one time, monk,
the Lord was staying among the devas of the Thirty-Three at the root of the Coral Tree on the ornamental stone.

While he was there
the Lord spoke the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious
to the devas of the Thirty-Three:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has eye now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

Thus it is that I, monk, remember
the verses of the Auspicious.

Do you, monk, learn the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious;
do you, monk, master
the exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious;
do you, monk, remember
the exposition

and the analysis
of the Auspicious.

The exposition
and the analysis
of the Auspicious, monk,
are connected with the goal,
they are fundamental to the Brahma-faring."

Thus spoke the deva;
having said this,
he disappeared then and there.

It were good, revered sir,
if the Lord were to teach me
the exposition
and the analysis of the Auspicious."

"But do you, monk, know this deva?"

"I, revered sir, do not know that deva."

"This deva, monk, is called Candana.

The deva Candana, monk, having applied himself,
having attended,
and having concentrated all his mind, listened to dhamma with ready ears.<sup>8</sup>

Well then, do you, monk,
listen,
attend carefully
and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
the venerable Lomasakaṅgiyai answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has vision now here, now there, of a present thing,
Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?
There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

And how, monk, does one follow after the past?

He thinks: 'Such was my material shape in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such was my feeling in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such was my my perception in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such were my habitual tendencies in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such was my consciousness in the distant past'
and finds delight therein.

Even so, monk, does one follow after the past.

And how, monk, does one not follow after the past?

He thinks: 'Such was my material shape in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such was my feeling in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such was my perception in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.
He thinks: 'Such were my habitual tendencies in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'Such was my consciousness in the distant past'
but does not find delight therein.

Even so, monk, does one not follow after the past.

And how, monk, does one desire the future?

He thinks: 'May my material shape be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my feeling be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my perception be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my habitual tendencies be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my consciousness be thus in the distant future'
and finds delight therein.

Even so, monk, does one desire the future.

And how, monk, does one not desire the future?

He thinks: 'May my material shape be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my feeling be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my perception be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my habitual tendencies be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

He thinks: 'May my consciousness be thus in the distant future'
but does not find delight therein.

Even so, monk, does one not desire the future.

And how, monk, is one drawn away among present things?

As to this, monks, an uninstructed ordinary person,
taking no count of the pure ones,
unskilled in the dhamma of the pure ones,
untrained in the dhamma of the pure ones,
taking no count of the true men,
unskilled in the dhamma of the true men,
untrained in the dhamma of the true men,
regards material shape as self
or self as having material shape
or material shape as in self
or self as in material shape;

or he regards feeling as self
or self as having feeling
or feeling as in self
or self as in feeling;

or he regards perception as self
or self as having perception
or perception as in self
or self as in perception;

or he regards the habitual tendencies as self
or self as having habitual tendencies
or habitual tendencies as in self
or self as in habitual tendencies;

or he regards consciousness [189] as self
or self as having consciousness
or consciousness as in self
or self as in consciousness.

Even so, monk, is one drawn away among present things.

And how, monk, is one not drawn away among present things?

As to this, monk, an instructed disciple of the pure ones,
taking count of the pure ones,
skilled in the dhamma of the pure ones,
trained in the dhamma of the pure ones,
taking count of the true men,
skilled in the dhamma of the true men,
trained in the dhamma of the true men,
does not regard material shape as self
or self as having material shape
or material shape as in self
or self as in material shape;

and he does not regard feeling as self
or self as having feeling
or feeling as in self
or self as in feeling;

and he does not regard perception as self
or self as having perception
or perception as in self
or self as in perception;

and he does not regard the habitual tendencies as self
or self as having the habitual tendencies
or the habitual tendencies as in self
or self as in the habitual tendencies;

and he does not regard consciousness as self
or self as having consciousness
or consciousness as in self
or self as in consciousness.

Even so, monk, is one not drawn away among present things.

[248] "The past should not be followed after, the future not desired.
What is past is got rid of and the future has not come.
But whoever has vision now here, now there, of a present thing,

Knowing that it is immovable, unshakable, let him cultivate it.
Swelter at the task this very day. Who knows whether he will die
tomorrow?

There is no bargaining with the great hosts of Death.
Thus abiding ardently, unwearied day and night,
He indeed is 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted the venerable Lomasakaṅgiyai rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Lomasakaṅgiyai's Discourse on the Auspicious:
The Fourth

---

<sup>1</sup> MA. v. 6 says this Elder's name was Aṅga, but as he had only a little down on his body he was known as Lomasakaṅgiyai. His verse is at Thag. 27, and the story of how in a former life he wanted to recite the Bhadd'Eka-Ratta occurs at ThagA. i. 89 f. See Ap. ii. 504 f., where the story, both of the past and the present, differs in various details.

<sup>2</sup> devaputta. As such he was known by the same name, Candana, as he had had as a rich upasaka in the time of the Buddha Kassapa, MA. v. 7. See M.L.S. i. 183.

<sup>3</sup> yathākatham dhāresi. This might also be translated as "do you remember according to what had been said," i.e. do you remember the verses on the Auspicious according to how they were spoken? It would, indeed, be important to know the verses exactly as they had been spoken for, as the sequel states, they are connected with the goal. The above rendering may be justified however since the following sentences appear to be an answer to a question in such a form. Cf. yathākatham sandassesi, etc., at M. iii. 190 above.

<sup>4</sup> paṇḍukambalasīla, usually the name of Sakka's throne. Paṇḍukambala is a light red woollen blanket, in this case the colour of a heap of jayasumara (Victory's joy) flowers. According to MA. v. 7 the Buddha went to the abode of the Thirty-Three seven years after the Enlightenment and after he had performed the twin miracle, and stayed there for a year.

<sup>5</sup> Sitting down in silence while hearing it means "he learns," MA. v. 8.

<sup>6</sup> Rehearsing it out loud means "he masters it."

<sup>7</sup> Speaking it to others means "he remembers it."

<sup>8</sup> As at M. 1. 326, which see for further references.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
4. Vibhaṅga Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
4. The Division on Analysis

135. Discourse on the Lesser Analysis of Deeds

Cūḷa Kamma-Vibhaṅga Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Then the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son,<sup>2</sup> approached the Lord;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the Lord;
having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance
the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son,
spoke thus to the Lord:

"Now, good Gotama, what is the cause,
what the reason

that [249] lowness and excellence
are to be seen among human beings while they are in human form?<sup>3</sup>

For, good Gotama, human beings of short life-span are to be seen and those of long life-span; those of many
and those of few illnesses;
those who are ugly,
those who are beautiful;
those who are of little account, those of great account;
those who are poor,
those who are wealthy;
those who are of lowly families, those of high families;<sup>4</sup> those who are weak in wisdom, those who are full of wisdom.

Now what, good Gotama, is the cause,
what the reason
that lowness and excellence
are to be seen among human beings while they are in human form?"

"Deeds<sup>5</sup> are one's own, brahman youth, beings are heirs to deeds,<sup>6</sup> deeds are matrix,
deeds are kin,
deeds are arbiters.<sup>7</sup>

Deed divides beings,
that is to say
by lowness and excellence."

"I do not understand the meaning in full of that which was spoken by the good Gotama in brief and the meaning of which was not explained in full.

It were well if the good Gotama were so to teach me dhamma that I should understand the meaning in full of that which was spoken by the good Gotama in brief
but the meaning of which was not explained in full."

"Well then, brahman youth,
listen,
attend carefully
and I will speak."

"Yes, sir,"
the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son,
answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Brahman youth, here some woman or man is one that makes onslaught on creatures, is cruel,
bloody-handed,
intent on injuring and killing,
and without mercy to living creatures.<sup>8</sup>

Because of that [250] deed,
accomplished thus,
firmly held<sup>9</sup> thus,
he, at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell,
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
he is of a short life-span.

This course is conducive to shortness of life-span, brahman youth,
that is to say
making onslaught on creatures, being cruel,
bloody-handed,
intent on injuring and killing,
and without mercy to living creatures.

■

But, brahman youth,
here some woman or man,
by getting rid of onslaught on creatures
is one who abstains from onslaught on creatures;
the stick laid aside,
the sword laid aside,
he lives scrupulous,
merciful,
kindly and compassionate to all living creatures.

Because of that deed,
accomplished thus,
firmly held thus,
at the breaking up of the body after dying

he arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world,
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
he is of a long life-span.

This course is conducive to length of life-span, brahman youth,
that is to say,
if one, by getting rid of onslaught on creatures,
abstains from onslaught on creatures,
(and with) the stick laid aside,
the sword laid aside,
lives scrupulous,
merciful,
kindly and compassionate to all living creatures.

■

Brahman youth, here some woman or man is by nature harmful to creatures
with his hand
or with a clod of earth
or with a stick
or with a sword.

Because of that deed,
accomplished thus,
firmly held thus,
he, at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,

the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
he has many illnesses.

This course is conducive to many illnesses, brahman youth,
that is to say
being by nature harmful to creatures
with his hand
or with a clod of earth
or with a stick
or with a sword.

■

But, brahman youth,
here some woman or man
is not by nature harmful to creatures
with his hand
or with a clod of earth
or with a stick
or with a sword.

Because of that deed
accomplished thus,
firmly held thus,

at the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world,
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
he has few illnesses.

This [251] course is conducive to few illnesses, brahman youth,
that is to say
not being by nature harmful to creatures
with his hand
or with a clod of earth
or with a stick
or with a sword.

■

Brahman youth, here some woman or man is wrathful;
turbulent on being spoken to
even about a trifle,
he takes offence,
gets angry,
disagrees,
resists,
and evinces anger,
hatred
and resentment. 10

Because of that deed,
accomplished thus,

firmly held thus,
he, at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
he is ugly.

This course is conducive to ugliness, brahman youth,
that is to say
being wrathful;
turbulent on being spoken to
even about a trifle,
taking offence,
getting angry,
disagreeing,
resisting,
evincing anger,
hatred
and resentment.

■

But, brahman youth, here some woman or man is not wrathful;
not turbulent on being spoken to even about a large matter,

he takes no offence,
does not get angry,
does not disagree,
resist
or evince anger,
hatred
and resentment.

Because of that deed,
accomplished thus,
firmly held thus,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world,
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
he is lovely.<sup>11</sup>

This course is conducive to loveliness, brahman youth, that is to say not being wrathful; not being turbulent on being spoken to
even about a large matter, he taking no offence,
not getting angry,
not disagreeing,
resisting
or evincing anger,
hatred
and resentment.

■

Brahman youth, here some woman or man is jealous-minded;
he is jealous,
revengeful<sup>12</sup> and harbours jealousy
on account of others' gains, honour,
fame
and the marks of respect and reverence paid to them.

Because of that deed,
accomplished thus,
firmly held thus,
he, at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
he is of little account.

This course is conducive to being of little account, brahman youth,
that is to say
being jealous-minded;
jealous,
revengeful

harbouring jealousy
on account of others' gains,
honour,
fame
and the marks of respect and reverence paid to them.

■

But, brahman youth,
here some woman or man
is not jealous-minded;
he is not jealous
or revengeful
nor does he harbour jealousy on account of others' gains,
honour,
fame
and the marks of respect and reverence
paid to them.

Because of that deed,
accomplished thus,
firmly held thus,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world,
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
he is of great account.

This course is conducive to being of great account, brahman youth,
that is to say
not being jealous-minded;
not being jealous
or revengeful
nor harbouring jealousy
on account of others' gains,
honour,
fame
and the marks of respect and reverence paid to them.

■

Brahman youth, here some woman or man is not a giver<sup>13</sup> to recluse or brahman of drink,
food,
clothing,
vehicle,
garlands,
scents,
unguents,
bed,
lodging,
light.

Because of that deed,
accomplished thus,
firmly held thus,
he, at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
he is poor.

This course is conducive to poverty, [252] brahman youth, that is to say not being a giver to recluse or brahman of drink,
food,
clothing,
vehicle,
garlands,
scents,
unguents,
bed,
lodging,
light.

■

But, brahman youth, here some woman or man is a giver to recluse or brahman of drink,
food,
clothing,
vehicle,
garlands,
scents,
unguents,
bed,

lodging,
light.

Because of that deed,
accomplished thus,
firmly held thus,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world,
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
he is wealthy.

This course is conducive to wealth, brahman youth, that is to say being a giver to recluse or brahman of drink,
food,
clothing,
vehicle,
garlands,
scents,
unguents,
bed,
lodging,
light.

■

Brahman youth, here some woman or man is callous
and proud;

he does not greet one
who should be greeted,
does not stand up for one who should be stood up for,
he does not give a seat to one
meriting a seat,
he does not make room<sup>14</sup>
for one meriting room,
he does not respect,
revere,
reverence,
honour one
who should be respected,
revered,
reverenced,
honoured.

Because of that deed,
accomplished thus,
firmly held thus,
he, at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
he is of a lowly family.

This course is conducive to being in a lowly family, brahman youth, that is to say being one who is callous
and proud;
he does not greet one
who should be greeted,
does not stand up for one
who should be stood up for,
he does not give a seat to one
meriting a seat,
he does not make room
for one meriting room,
he does not respect,
revere,
reverence,
honour one
who should be respected,
revered,
reverenced,
honoured.

■

But, brahman youth, here some woman or man is not callous
or proud;
he greets one who should be greeted,
stands up for one
who should be stood up for,
he gives a seat to one
meriting a seat,
he makes room
for one meriting room,
he respects,
reveres,
reverences,

honours one who should be revered,
reverenced,
honoured.

Because of that deed,
accomplished thus,
firmly held thus,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world,
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
it is in a high family.

This course is conducive to being in a high family, brahman youth, that is to say being one who is not callous
or proud;
one who greets one who should be greeted,
stands up for one
who should be stood up for,
one who gives a seat to one meriting a seat,
one who makes room
for one meriting room,
one who respects,
reveres,
reverences,
honours one who should be
revered,

reverenced,
honoured.

■

Brahman youth, here some woman or a man, having approached a recluse or a brahman,
is not one that asks:

'What, revered sir, is skill?

What is unskill?

What is blameable?

What un-blameable?

What should be practised?

What not practised?

What, being done by me, is for long for my woe and anguish?

Or what, being done by me, is for long for my welfare and happiness?

Because of this deed,
accomplished thus,
firmly held thus,
he, at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in the sorrowful ways,
the bad bourn,
the Downfall,

Niraya Hell
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
is weak in wisdom.

This course is conducive to being weak in wisdom, brahman youth,
that is to say
having approached a recluse or a brahman, being one that that does not ask:

'What, revered sir, is skill?

What is unskill?

What is blameable?

What un-blameable?

What should be practised?

What not practised?

What, being done by me, is for long for my woe and anguish?

Or what, being done by me, is for long for my welfare and happiness?

■

But, brahman youth, here some woman or man, having approached a recluse or brahman, is one that asks:

'What, revered sir, is skill?

What is unskill?

What is blameable?

What un-blameable?

What should be practised?

What not practised?

What, being done by me, is for long for my woe and anguish?

Or what, being done by me, is for long for my welfare and happiness?

Because of that deed,
accomplished thus,
firmly held thus,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

But if, at the breaking up of the body after dying
he does not arise in a good bourn,
a heaven world,
but comes to human status,
then wherever he is born
(in a new existence)
he is of great wisdom.

This course is conducive to great wisdom, [253] brahman youth, that is to say, having approached a recluse or brahman, being one that asks:

'What, revered sir, is skill?

What is unskill?

What is blameable?

What un-blameable?

What should be practised?

What not practised?

What, being done by me, is for long for my woe and anguish?

Or what, being done by me, is for long for my welfare and happiness?

So, brahman youth,
the course conducive to a short life-span leads to shortness of life-span; the course conducive to a long lifespan leads to length of life-span; the course conducive to many illnesses leads to having many illnesses; the course conducive to few illnesses leads to having few illnesses; the course conducive to being ugly leads to ugliness;
the course conducive to being lovely leads to loveliness;
the course conducive to being of small account leads to smallness of account; the course conducive to being of great account leads to greatness of account; the course conducive to being poor, leads to poverty;
the course conducive to being wealthy leads to wealth;
the course conducive to being of lowly family leads to being in a lowly family; the course conducive to being of high family leads to being in a high family; the course conducive to being weak in wisdom leads to weakness of wisdom; the course conducive to being of great wisdom leads to greatness in wisdom.

Deeds are one's own, brahman youth, beings are heirs to deeds, deeds are the matrix,
deeds the kin,
deeds the arbiters.

Deed divides beings,
that is to say
by lowness and excellence."

When this had been said,
the brahman youth Subha, Todeyya's son,
spoke thus to the Lord:

"It is excellent, good Gotama,
excellent, good Gotama.

It is as if, good Gotama,
one might set upright what had been upset,
or might disclose what was covered,
or point out the way
to one who had gone astray,
or might bring an oil-lamp into the darkness
so that those with vision might see material shapes -
even so is dhamma made clear
in many a figure by the good Gotama.

I am going to the revered Gotama for refuge,
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the revered Gotama accept me
as a lay-follower,
one gone for refuge from today forth
for as long as life lasts."

Discourse on the Lesser Analysis of Deeds:
The Fifth

---

<sup>1</sup> Called at MA. v. 8, 15 Subhasutta, the latter passage saying that it is also called Culla-kamma-vibhaṅga sutta. There is a Subhasutta at M. Sta. 99 and D. Sta. 10. See S. Levi, Mahākarmavibhaṅga, etc., Paris, 1932, for an interesting dissertation on the Karmavibhaṅgas, and also Mrs. Rhys Davids, Wayfarer's Words, vol. iii, p. 1093 (reprinted from J.R.A.S., 1934). That the prefix Cūḷa here qualifies kammavibhaṅga (and not sutta) must be understood on the analogy of Mahā- in the next Discourse which, from internal evidence, is not a description of sutta but of kammavibhaṅga; see below, p. 264, n. 1.

<sup>2</sup> Todeyya was Pasenadi's brahman priest. He was very rich and very mean. Born as a dog in his own house, he barked at the Buddha when he was visiting Subha. The Buddha recognised him and identified him to the unwilling Subha by getting the dog to find some treasure he had hidden as a man.

<sup>3</sup> manmsānaṃ yeva sataṃ manussabhūtānaṃ. This of course assumes that human beings need not always be in human form, and this appears to have been the case with Todeyya. It seems clear that some distinction between the two words is to be made although in the sequel only human beings are dealt with. Pali is precise where we perhaps cannot be. Another word to be considered in this connection is manusaviggaha, taking up form as a human being, see Vin. iii. 73 where this word is defined, and Vin. iv. 214 = 269, where the compound tiracchānagata-manusaviggaha appears to be a man who has taken up animal form.

<sup>4</sup> Defined at Vin. iv. 6.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. A. iii. 72, 186, v. 288, Miln. 65. Kamma, here translated as deed or deeds, is equally the compelling force of kamma as inescapable recompense: one arises according to what one does, yam karoti tena upapajjati, M. i. 390.

<sup>6</sup> As at M. i. 390.

<sup>7</sup> kammapaṭisarāṇa; cf. dhamnapaṭisarāṇa at M. iii. 9.

<sup>8</sup> As at M. i. 286.

<sup>9</sup> samādiṇṇa, explained at MA. v. 11 by gahita and parāmaṭṭha, which may mean that the deed and its effect had been taken and acquired in a previous birth. The word, together with samatta, "accomplished," also occurs at M. iii. 214.

<sup>10</sup> As at A. i. 126-127. Cf. also A. ii. 203 ff.

<sup>11</sup> pāsādika here instead of vaṇṇavant as earlier.

<sup>12</sup> upadussati. So Childers. MA. v. 14 says that because of his jealousy, being censorious he does wrong (dussati, or is corrupted). It is possible that the three verbs dussati padussati upadussati denote a gradual intensification similar to, e.g., jhāyanti pajjhāyanti nijjhāyanti apajjhāyanti at M. i. 334.

<sup>13</sup> Because he is stingy.

<sup>14</sup> maggam deti, to make room or space for, to let pass, to give way; cf. Vin.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
4. Vibhaṅga Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
4. The Division on Analysis

136. Discourse on the Greater Analysis of Deeds<sup>1</sup>

Mahā Kamma-Vibhaṅga Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Rājagaha
in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels' feeding place.

Now at that time the venerable Samiddhi<sup>2</sup> was staying in a little forest hut.

Then the wanderer Potali's son, who was always pacing up and down, always roaming about on foot,
approached the venerable Samiddhi;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the venerable Samiddhi,

and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the wanderer Potali's son spoke thus to the venerable Samiddhi:

"Reverend Samiddhi,
from the recluse Gotama's own mouth have I heard, from his own mouth
have I learnt that deed of body is foolish,<sup>3</sup> deed of speech is foolish, only deed of mind is truth,<sup>4</sup> and that there is that attainment on attaining which one experiences nothing."<sup>5</sup>

"Do not, friend Potali's son,
speak thus;
do not, friend Potali's son,
speak thus.

Do not misrepresent the Lord; for neither is misrepresentation of the Lord good nor would the Lord speak thus:

'Deed of body is foolish,
deed of speech is foolish,
only deed of mind is truth;
and that there is that attainment
on attaining which one experiences nothing.'

"How long have you been gone forth, reverend Samiddhi?"

"Not long, friend, three years."

[255] "Now, why should we speak to monks who are Elders when even a newly ordained monk thinks that the Teacher should be defended thus?"

Reverend Samiddhi,
when one has intentionally done a deed
by body,
speech
or thought,
what does one experience?"

"When one has intentionally done a deed
by body,
speech
or thought,
friend Potali's son,
one experiences anguish."

Then the wanderer Potali's son, neither rejoicing in nor protesting against what the venerable Samiddhi had said, rose from his seat and departed without rejoicing,
without protesting.

Not long after the wanderer Potali's son had departed, the venerable Samiddhi approached the venerable Ānanda;
having approached,
he exchanged greetings with the venerable Ānanda,
and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the venerable Samiddhi told the venerable Ānanda the whole of the conversation he had had with the wanderer Potali's son as far as it had gone.

When this had been said,
the venerable Ānanda
spoke thus to the venerable Samiddhi:

"This, reverend Samiddhi, is a subject of conversation that should be told to the Lord.

Wait, reverend Samiddhi, until we can approach the Lord;
when we have approached the Lord we should tell him this matter;
as the Lord explains it to us, so should we remember it."

"Yes, your reverence,"
the venerable Samiddhi answered the venerable Ānanda in assent.

Then the venerable Ānanda and the venerable Samiddhi
approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
they sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance,
the venerable Ānanda
told the Lord
the whole of the conversation the venerable Samiddhi had had with the wanderer Potali's son as far as it had gone.

When this had been said
the Lord spoke thus to the venerable Ānanda:

"But I, Ānanda,
do not even recognise the wanderer Potali's son's premise, how then (can I recognise) a conversation like this?

The question of the wanderer Potali's son was given a one-sided answer by the foolish man Samiddhi (although) it needed a discriminating explanation."

When this had been said the venerable Udāyin<sup>6</sup>
spoke thus to the Lord:

"But if this, revered sir, were the meaning of what the [256] venerable Samiddhi said, (then) whatever one experiences is anguish."<sup>7</sup>

Then the Lord addressed the venerable Ānanda, saying:

"Now, do you, Ānanda, see this foolish man Udāyin's (wrong) approach?"<sup>8</sup>

I, Ānanda, knew that this foolish man Udāyin, opening up (this question) now, would open it up to no purpose.<sup>9</sup>

Ānanda, the wanderer Potali's son really asked about the three feelings.

If,<sup>10</sup> Ānanda, this foolish man Samiddhi had explained thus when he was questioned thus by the wanderer Potali's son:

'When, friend Potali's son,
one has intentionally done a deed
by body,

speech
or thought
for experiencing pleasure he experiences pleasure;

'When, friend Potali's son,
one has intentionally done a deed
by body,
speech
or thought
for experiencing pain
he experiences pain;

'When, friend Potali's son,
one has intentionally done a deed
by body,
speech
or thought
for experiencing neither pain nor pleasure he experiences neither pain nor pleasure;'

explaining thus, Ānanda, the foolish man Samiddhi would have explained properly to the wanderer Potali's son.

And moreover, Ānanda, there are foolish and inexperienced wanderers who are members of other sects who would find out about the Tathāgata's great analysis of deeds<sup>11</sup> if you, Ānanda, would listen while the Tathāgata is classifying<sup>12</sup> the great analysis of deeds."

"It is the time for this, Lord, it is the time for this, Well-farer, that the Lord should classify
the great analysis of deeds.

When the monks have heard the Lord,
they will remember."

"Well then, Ānanda,
listen,
attend carefully,
and I will speak."

[257] "Yes, revered sir,"
the venerable Ānanda answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

---

"There are these four (types of) persons, Ānanda, existing in the world.<sup>13</sup>

What four?

Some individual here, Ānanda,
is one who makes onslaught on creatures,
takes what has not been given,
wrongly enjoys pleasures of the senses,
is a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,

malevolent in mind,
and of false view.

At the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

■

Some individual here, Ānanda,
is one who makes onslaught on creatures,
takes what has not been given,
wrongly enjoys pleasures of the senses,
is a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and of false view.

At the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

■

But some individual here, Ānanda,
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
refrains from taking what has not been given,
refrains from wrong enjoyment of the sense-pleasures,
refrains from lying,
refrains from slanderous speech,
refrains from harsh speech,
refrains from gossip,

is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind,
and is of right view.

At the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

■

Some individual here, Ānanda,
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
refrains from taking what has not been given,
refrains from wrong enjoyment of the sense-pleasures,
refrains from lying,
refrains from slanderous speech,
refrains from harsh speech,
refrains from gossip,
is not covetous,
not malevolent in mind,
and is of right view.

At the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

---

This is a case,<sup>14</sup> Ānanda, where some recluse or brahman,
as a result of ardour,
as a result of striving,

as a result of application,
as a result of diligence, as a result of right mental work,<sup>15</sup> attains such concentration of mind
that while the mind is concentrated he sees with the purified deva-like vision
surpassing that of men
some individual here
who made onslaught on creatures,
took what had not been given,
wrongly enjoyed sense-pleasures,
was a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and of false view -
and he sees that
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he has arisen in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

He speaks thus:

'Indeed there are evil deeds,
there is [258] fruition of wrong faring.

And the individual I saw here
making onslaught on creatures,
taking what had not been given,
wrongly enjoying sense-pleasures,
a liar,
of slanderous speech,

of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and of false view -
I now see
at the breaking up of the body after dying arisen in the sorrowful way,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.'

He speaks thus:

'Indeed everyone who makes onslaught on creatures,
takes what has not been given,
wrongly enjoys sense-pleasures,
is a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and of false view,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.'

Those who know thus
know rightly.

False is the knowledge
of those that know otherwise.'

In this way
he obstinately holds to and adheres to<sup>16</sup> that which he has known by himself,
seen by himself,
discerned by himself as
'This alone is the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

■

But there is this case, Ānanda,
when some recluse or brahman,
as a result of ardour,
as a result of striving,
as a result of application,
as a result of diligence,
as a result of right mental work,
attains such concentration of mind
that while the mind is concentrated
he sees with the purified deva-like vision
surpassing that of men
some individual here
who made onslaught on creatures,
took what had not been given,
wrongly enjoyed sense-pleasures,
was a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and of false view -
and he sees that
at the breaking up of the body after dying

he has arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

He speaks thus:

'Indeed there are no evil deeds, no fruition of wrong faring.

And the individual I saw here
making onslaught on creatures,
taking what had not been given,
wrongly enjoying sense-pleasures,
a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and of false view -

I now see
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.'

He speaks thus:

'Indeed everyone who makes onslaught on creatures,
takes what has not been given,
wrongly enjoys sense-pleasures,
is a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and of false view,

at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

Those who know thus
know rightly.

False is the knowledge
of those that know otherwise.'

In this way he obstinately holds to
and adheres to
that which he has known,
seen and discerned by himself as
'This alone is the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

■

This is a case, Ānanda, where some recluse or brahman,
as a result of ardour,
as a result of striving,
as a result of application,
as a result of diligence,
as a result of right mental work,
attains such concentration of mind
that while the mind is concentrated
he sees with the purified deva-like vision
surpassing that of men
some individual here
who was restrained from making onslaught on creatures,
restrained from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,

gossiping,
who was not covetous,
who was benevolent in mind
and of right view,
and sees that at the breaking up of the body after dying
he has arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

He speaks thus:

'Indeed there are lovely deeds;
there is fruition of right faring.

And the individual that I saw here
who was restrained from making onslaught on creatures,
restrained from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
who was not covetous,
who was benevolent in mind
and of right view,
I now see at [259] the breaking up of the body after dying
arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.'

He speaks thus:

'Indeed everyone who is restrained from making onslaught on creatures,
restrained from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,

gossiping,
who was not covetous,
who was benevolent in mind
and of right view,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

Those who know thus
know rightly.

False is the knowledge
of those that know otherwise.'

In this way he obstinately holds to
and adheres to
that which he has known,
seen and discerned by himself as
'This alone is the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

■

But there is this case, Ānanda,
when some recluse or brahman,
as a result of ardour,
as a result of striving,
as a result of application,
as a result of diligence,
as a result of right mental work,
attains such concentration of mind
that while the mind is concentrated
he sees with the purified deva-like vision
surpassing that of men
some individual here
who was restrained from making onslaught on creatures,

restrained from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
who was not covetous,
who was benevolent in mind
and of right view,
and sees that at the breaking up of the body after dying
he has arisen in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

He speaks thus:

'Indeed there are no lovely deeds,
there is no fruition of right faring.

And the individual that I saw here restrained from making onslaught on creatures,
restrained from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
who was not covetous,
who was benevolent in mind
and of right view,
I now see at the breaking up of the body after dying arisen in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.'

He speaks thus:

'Indeed everyone who is restrained from making onslaught on creatures,
restrained from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
who was not covetous,
who was benevolent in mind
and of right view,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

Those who know thus
know rightly.

False is the knowledge
of those that know otherwise.'

In this way he obstinately holds to
and adheres to
that which he has known,
seen and discerned by himself as
'This alone is the truth,
all else is falsehood.'

---

As to this, Ānanda,
whatever recluse or brahman speaks thus:

'Indeed there are evil deeds,
there is fruition of wrong faring' -

this I allow to him.

And if he speaks thus:

'The individual that I saw here,
taking what had not been given,
wrongly enjoying sense-pleasures,
a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and of false view -

I now see
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.' -
this too I allow to him.

But if he speaks thus:

'Everyone who makes onslaught on creatures,
takes what has not been given,
wrongly enjoys sense-pleasures,
is a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,

and of false view,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell' -
this I do not allow to him.

And if he speaks thus:

'Those who know thus
know rightly.

False is the knowledge

of those that know otherwise' -
neither do I allow this to him.

And whoever obstinately holds to
and adheres to
that which he has known by himself,
seen by himself,
discerned by himself as
'This alone is the truth,
all else is falsehood' -
neither do I allow this to him.

What is the cause of this?

The [260] Tathāgata's knowledge of the great analysis of deeds
is otherwise, Ānanda.

As to this, Ānanda,
whatever recluse or brahman speaks thus:

'Indeed there are no evil deeds, there is no fruition of wrong faring' -
this I do not allow to him.

And if he speaks thus:

The individual I saw here making onslaught on creatures,
taking what had not been given,
wrongly enjoying sense-pleasures,
a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and of false view -
I now see
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world -
this I allow to him.

But if he speaks thus:

'Everyone who makes onslaught on creatures,
takes what has not been given,
wrongly enjoys sense-pleasures,
is a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and of false view,
at the breaking up of the body after dying

arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world -
this I do not allow to him.

Those who know thus
know rightly.

False is the knowledge
of those that know otherwise.' -

neither do I allow this to him.

And whoever obstinately holds to
and adheres to
that which he has known by himself,
seen by himself,
discerned by himself as
'This alone is the truth,
all else is falsehood ' -
neither do I allow this to him.

What is the cause of this?

The Tathāgata's knowledge
of the great analysis of deeds
is otherwise, Ānanda.

As to this, Ānanda,
whatever recluse or brahman speaks thus:

'Indeed there are lovely deeds,
there is fruition of right faring' -
I allow this to him.

And if he speaks thus:

And the individual that I saw here
who was restrained from making onslaught on creatures,
restrained from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
who was not covetous,
who was benevolent in mind
and of right view,
I now see at the breaking up of the body after dying
arisen in a good bourn,
a heaven world.' -
this too I allow to him.

But if he speaks thus:

'Everyone who is restrained from making onslaught on creatures,
restrained from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
who was not covetous,
who was benevolent in mind
and of right view,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.' -
this I do not allow to him.

And if he speaks thus:

Those who know thus
know rightly.

False is the knowledge
of those that know otherwise.'

-neither do I allow this to him.

And whoever obstinately holds to
and adheres to
that which he has known by himself,
seen by himself,
discerned by himself as
'This alone is the truth,
all else is falsehood ' -
neither do I allow this to him.

What is the cause of this?

The Tathāgata's knowledge
of the great analysis of deeds
is otherwise, Ānanda.

As to this, Ānanda,
whatever recluse or brahman speaks thus:

'Indeed there are no lovely deeds,
there is no fruition of right faring' -
this I do not allow to him.

But if he speaks thus:

'The individual that I saw here
restrained from making onslaught on creatures,
restrained from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,

from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
who was not covetous,
who was benevolent in mind
and of right view,
I now see at the breaking up of the body after dying
arisen in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.'

-this I allow to him.

But if he speaks thus:

'Everyone who is restrained from making onslaught on creatures,
restrained from taking what had not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
who was not covetous,
who was benevolent in mind
and of right view,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell. -

this I do not allow to him.

And if he speaks thus:

Those who know thus
know rightly.

False is the knowledge
of those that know otherwise.'

-neither do I allow this to him.

And whoever obstinately holds to
and adheres to
that which he has known by himself,
seen by himself,
discerned by himself as
'This alone is the truth,
all else is falsehood ' -
neither do I allow this to him.

What is the cause of this?

The Tathāgata's knowledge
of the great analysis of deeds
is otherwise, Ānanda.

As to this, Ānanda,
whatever individual there is who makes onslaught on creatures,
takes what has not been given,
wrongly enjoys sense-pleasures,
is a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and of false view
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in the sorrowful ways,

a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell -
either an evil deed to be experienced as anguish
was done by him earlier,
or an evil deed to be experienced as anguish
was done by him later,
or at the time of dying
a false view was adopted
and firmly held by him;
because of this,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

And he who made onslaught on creatures here,
took what had not been given,
wrongly enjoyed sense-pleasures,
was a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and was of false view
undergoes its fruition
which arises here and now
or in another mode.

As to this, Ānanda, whatever individual there is who makes onslaught on
creatures,
takes what has not been given,
wrongly enjoys sense-pleasures,
is a liar,

of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and of false view
at the breaking up of the body after dying
arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world -
either a lovely deed to be experienced as happiness
was done by him earlier,
or a lovely deed to be experienced as happiness
was done by him later,
or at the time of dying
a right view was adopted
and firmly held by him;
because of this,
at the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

If he<sup>17</sup> made onslaught on creatures here,
took what had not been given,
wrongly enjoyed sense-pleasures,
was a liar,
of slanderous speech,
of harsh speech,
a gossip,
covetous,
malevolent in mind,
and was of false view
he undergoes its fruition
which arises here and now
or in another mode.

As to this, Ānanda, whatever individual there is who is restrained [262] from making onslaught on creatures, is restrained from taking what has not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
who was not covetous,
who was benevolent in mind
and of right view
and who, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world -
either a lovely deed to be experienced as happiness
was done by him earlier,
or a lovely deed to be experienced as happiness
was done by him later,
or at the time of dying
a right view was adopted
and firmly held by him;
because of this,
on the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in a good bourn,
a heaven world.

And he who was restrained from making onslaught on creatures here,
is restrained from taking what has not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
who is not covetous,
who is benevolent in mind
and of right view

undergoes its fruition
which arises either here and now
or in another mode.

As to this, Ānanda, whatever individual there is who is restrained from making onslaught on creatures,
is restrained from taking what has not been given,
from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
who was not covetous,
who was benevolent in mind
and of right view
and who, at the breaking up of the body after dying,
arises in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell -
either an evil deed to be experienced as anguish
was done by him earlier,
or an evil deed to be experienced as anguish
was done by him later,
or at the time of dying
a false view was adopted
and firmly held by him;
because of this,
on the breaking up of the body after dying
he arises in the sorrowful ways,
a bad bourn,
the Downfall,
Niraya Hell.

And he who was restrained from making onslaught on creatures here,
is restrained from taking what has not been given,

from wrong enjoyment of sense-pleasures,
from lying,
from slanderous speech,
harsh speech,
gossiping,
who is not covetous,
who is benevolent in mind
and of right view
undergoes its fruition
which arises either here and now
or in another mode.

So, Ānanda,
there is the deed that is inoperative,<sup>18</sup> apparently inoperative;<sup>19</sup> there is the deed that is inoperative, apparently operative;
there is the deed that is both operative and apparently operative;
there is the deed that is operative, apparently inoperative."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the venerable Ānanda rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on the Greater Analysis of Deeds:
The Sixth

---

<sup>1</sup> Because the word mahākammavibhaṅga occurs in this Discourse the prefix mahā must be taken to qualify kammavibhaṅga and not sutta; see M.L.S., vol. i, Intr. p. xiii.

<sup>2</sup> Mentioned in M. Sta. 133.

<sup>3</sup> mogha, empty, vain, useless; called at MA. v. 15 tuccha aphala, empty, fruitless; also opposed to sacca at D. i. 187, M. ii. 169, etc.

<sup>4</sup> sacca, explained at MA. v. 15 as tatha bhūta, real, fact; the Comy also refers to the Upāli-sutta (M. Sta. 56) where it is said that deed of mind is the more blameable ... deed of body and deed of speech are not like it.

<sup>5</sup> Referred by MA. v. 16 to the Poṭṭhapāda-sutta (D. Sta. 9): kathan nu kho abhisaññā-nirodho hoti, D. i. 180.

<sup>6</sup> Lāl-Udāyin. MA. v. 16. See D.P.P.N., "an elder who possessed the knack of saying the wrong thing."

<sup>7</sup> dukkasmim, explained at MA. v. 10 as sabbaṃ dukkham, i.e. the anguish of rolling on, of the defilements and of the saṃkhārā.

<sup>8</sup> ummagga, with v.l. ummaṅga is explained at MA. v. 16 as paññā ummaggaṃ; cf. SnA. 60 ummaggo paññā pavuccati. In the context it would seem that ummaṅga, emergence "of a desire for knowledge leading to questioning" is the better reading. See G.S. ii. 184, n. 6.

<sup>9</sup> ummujjamāno ayoniso ummujjissati, wanting to speak he stretches out his neck, moves his jaws and twitches his face, he is not able to sit still. The Lord saw all this and did not come to know about it either through deva-vision or reasoning of mind or omniscience, MA. v. 16-17. Again, see G.S. ii. 184, n. 6 and the connection noted there that has been made between ummujja and Skrt. unmiñjita; and for unmiñja, unmiñjita one may now consult B.H.S.D.: "opening, as of the mouth."

<sup>10</sup> This sentence is quoted at Asl. 88 as belonging to a Discourse in which kamma is thought of as volition, or intentional. The wanderer's name is given as Pātaliputta.

<sup>11</sup> mahākammavibhaṅga, the term which appears to give this Discourse its name.

<sup>12</sup> bhajantassa, apparently from bhajati, to follow, associate with. Vibhajati is to dissect, divide, classify, and is the word Ānanda uses (immediately below) in his response.

<sup>13</sup> MA. v. 18 says that these four are matikā (headings, summaries) set out so as to detail the knowledge of the great analysis of deeds, but they are not themselves the classification of such knowledge.

<sup>14</sup> As at D. i. 13.

<sup>15</sup> MA. v. 18 says that these five (ardour to right mental work) are names for energy.

<sup>16</sup> As at M. i. 130, 257, 498.

<sup>17</sup> sace kho so here; yañ ca kho so in the other paragraphs.

<sup>18</sup> atthi kammaṃ abhabbāṃ (one version reading n'atthi).

<sup>19</sup> abhabbābhāsa.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
4. Vibhaṅga Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
4. The Division on Analysis

137. Discourse on the Analysis of the Sixfold (Sense-) Field

Salāyatana-Vibhaṅga Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"I will teach you, monks,
the analysis of the sixfold (sense-) field.

Listen to it,
attend carefully
and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Six internal sense-fields are to be known.

Six external sense-fields are to be known.

Six classes of consciousness are to be known.

Six classes of (sense-)impingement are to be known.

Eighteen mental ranges<sup>1</sup> are to be known.

Thirty-six modes for creatures<sup>2</sup> are to be known.

Wherefore, because of this get rid of this.<sup>3</sup>

There are three arousings of mindfulness<sup>4</sup> each of which [264] an ariyan practises
and, practising which, is an ariyan who is a teacher fit to instruct a group.<sup>5</sup>

Of trainers<sup>6</sup> he is called the incomparable charioteer of men to be tamed.

§

This is the exposition<sup>7</sup> of the analysis of the sixfold sense-field:

When it is said,

'Six internal sense-fields<sup>8</sup> are to be known,'

in reference to what is it said?

To the sense-field of eye,
the sense-field of ear,
the sense-field of nose,
the sense-field of tongue,
the sense-field of body,
the sense-field of mind.

When it is said,

'Six internal sense-fields are to be known,'

it is said in reference to this.

§

When it is said,

'Six external sense-fields are to be known,'

in reference to what is it said?

To the sense-field of material shape, the sense-field of sound,

the sense-field of smell,
the sense-field of taste,
the sense-field of touch,
the sense-field of mental states.

When it is said,

'Six external sense-fields are to be known,'

it is said in reference to this.

§

When it is said,

'Six classes of consciousness are to be known,'

in reference to what is it said?

To visual consciousness,
auditory consciousness,
olfactory consciousness,
gustatory consciousness,
tactile consciousness,
mental consciousness.

When it is said,

'Six classes of consciousness are to be known,'

it is said in reference to this.

§

When it is said,

'Six classes of (sense-)impingement<sup>9</sup> are to be known,'

in reference to what is it said?

To visual impact,
auditory impact,
olfactory impact,
gustatory impact,
tactile impact,
mental impact.

When it is said,

'Six classes of (sense-)impingement are to be known,'

it is said in reference to this.

§

[265] When it is said,

'Eighteen mental ranges<sup>10</sup> are to be known,'

in reference to what is it said?

Having seen a material shape with the eye<sup>11</sup> one ranges over<sup>12</sup> the material shape
that gives rise to joy,

ranges over the material shape
that gives rise to sorrow,
ranges over the material shape
that gives rise to equanimity.

■

Having heard a sound with the ear one ranges over the sound
that gives rise to joy, ranges over the sound
that gives rise to sorrow,
ranges over the sound
that gives rise to equanimity.

■

Having smelt a smell with the nose one ranges over the smell
that gives rise to joy, ranges over the smell
that gives rise to sorrow,
ranges over the smell
that gives rise to equanimity.

■

Having tasted a flavour with the tongue one ranges over the flavour
that gives rise to joy,
ranges over the flavour
that gives rise to sorrow,
ranges over the flavour
that gives rise to equanimity.

■

Having felt a touch with the body one ranges over the touch
that gives rise to joy, ranges over the touch
that gives rise to sorrow,
ranges over the touch
that gives rise to equanimity.

■

Having cognised a mental state with the mind one ranges over the mental state
that gives rise to joy,
ranges over the mental state
that gives rise to sorrow,
ranges over the mental state
that gives rise to equanimity.

In this way there are six ranges for joy, six ranges for sorrow,
six ranges for equanimity.

When it is said,

'Eighteen mental ranges are to be known,'

it is said in reference to this.

§

When it is said,

'Thirty-six modes for creatures<sup>13</sup> are to be known,'

in reference to what is it said?

The six joys connected with worldly life, the six joys connected with renunciation;
the six sorrows connected with worldly life, the six sorrows connected with renunciation;
the six equanimities connected with worldly life, the six equanimities connected with renunciation.

---

Herein what are the six joys connected with worldly life?

There is the joy that arises
either from attaining
and from beholding the attainment of material shapes cognisable through the eye,
pleasant,
agreeable,
liked,
delightful,
connected with the material things of the world;
or from remembering
that what was formerly attained is past, arrested,
altered.

Joy such as this is called joy connected with worldly life.

■

There is the joy that arises
either from attaining

and from beholding the attainment of sounds cognisable through the ear,
pleasant,
agreeable,
liked,
delightful,
connected with the material things of the world;
or from remembering
that what was formerly attained is past,
arrested,
altered.

Joy such as this is called
joy connected with worldly life.

■

There is the joy that arises
either from attaining
and from beholding the attainment of smells cognisable through the nose,
pleasant,
agreeable,
liked,
delightful,
connected with the material things of the world;
or from remembering
that what was formerly attained is past,
arrested,
altered.

Joy such as this is called
joy connected with worldly life.

■

There is the joy that arises
either from attaining
and from beholding the attainment of flavours cognisable through the tongue,
pleasant,
agreeable,
liked,
delightful,
connected with the material things of the world;
or from remembering
that what was formerly attained is past,
arrested,
altered.

Joy such as this is called
joy connected with worldly life.

■

There is the joy that arises
either from attaining
and from beholding the attainment of touches cognisable through the body,
pleasant,
agreeable,
liked,
delightful,
connected with the material things of the world;
or from remembering
that what was formerly attained is past,
arrested,
altered.

Joy such as this is called
joy connected with worldly life.

■

There is the joy that arises
either from attaining
and from beholding the attainment of mental states cognisable through the mind,
pleasant,
agreeable,
liked,
delightful,
connected with the material things of the world;
or from remembering
that what was formerly attained is past,
arrested,
altered.

Joy such as this is called joy connected with worldly life.<sup>14</sup>

These are the six joys connected with worldly life.

---

Herein what are the six joys connected with renunciation?

When [266] one has known the impermanency of material shapes themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance<sup>15</sup>
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now
all these material shapes are impermanent,

painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
joy arises.

Joy such as this is called joy connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency of sounds themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now all these sounds are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
joy arises.

Joy such as this is called
joy connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency of smells themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance

and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now all these smells are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
joy arises.

Joy such as this is called
joy connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency of flavours themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now all these flavours are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
joy arises.

Joy such as this is called
joy connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency of touches themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now all these touches are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
joy arises.

Joy such as this is called
joy connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency of mental states themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now
all these mental states are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is

by means of perfect wisdom,
joy arises.

Joy such as this is called
joy connected with renunciation.

---

Herein what are the six sorrows connected with worldly life?

There is the sorrow that arises
either from not attaining
and from beholding the non-attainment
of material shapes cognisable through the eye,
pleasant,
agreeable,
liked,
delightful,
connected with the material things of the world;
or from remembering
that what was formerly not attained
is past,
arrested,
altered.

Sorrow such as this is called sorrow connected with worldly life.

■

There is the sorrow that arises
either from not attaining
and from beholding the non-attainment

of sounds cognisable through the ear,
pleasant,
agreeable,
liked,
delightful,
connected with the material things of the world;
or from remembering
that what was formerly not attained
is past,
arrested,
altered.

Sorrow such as this is called sorrow connected with worldly life.

■

There is the sorrow that arises
either from not attaining
and from beholding the non-attainment
of smells cognisable through the nose,
pleasant,
agreeable,
liked,
delightful,
connected with the material things of the world;
or from remembering
that what was formerly not attained
is past,
arrested,
altered.

Sorrow such as this is called sorrow connected with worldly life.

■

There is the sorrow that arises
either from not attaining
and from beholding the non-attainment
of flavours cognisable through the tongue,
pleasant,
agreeable,
liked,
delightful,
connected with the material things of the world;
or from remembering
that what was formerly not attained
is past,
arrested,
altered.

Sorrow such as this is called sorrow connected with worldly life.

■

There is the sorrow that arises
either from not attaining
and from beholding the non-attainment
of touches cognisable through the body,
pleasant,
agreeable,
liked,
delightful,
connected with the material things of the world;
or from remembering
that what was formerly not attained
is past,
arrested,
altered.

Sorrow such as this is called sorrow connected with worldly life.

■

There is the sorrow that arises
either from not attaining
and from beholding the non-attainment
of mental states cognisable through the mind,
pleasant,
agreeable,
liked,
delightful,
connected with the material things of the world;
or from remembering
that what was formerly not attained
is past,
arrested,
altered.

Sorrow such as this is called sorrow connected with worldly life.<sup>16</sup>

---

Herein what are the six sorrows connected with renunciation?

When one has known the impermanency of material shapes themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now all these material shapes are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
he evinces a desire for the incomparable Deliverances,<sup>17</sup> thinking,'

When can I,
entering on
abide in that plane
which the ariyans, now entering on,
are abiding in?

Thus, from evincing [267] a desire for the incomparable Deliverances
sorrow arises
as a result of the desire.

Sorrow such as this is called sorrow connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency
of sounds themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now all these sounds

are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
he evinces a desire
for the incomparable Deliverances, thinking,'

When can I,
entering on
abide in that plane
which the ariyans, now entering on,
are abiding in?

Thus, from evincing a desire
for the incomparable Deliverances
sorrow arises
as a result of the desire.

Sorrow such as this is called
sorrow connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency
of smells themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now all these smells
are impermanent,

painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
he evinces a desire
for the incomparable Deliverances, thinking,'

When can I,
entering on
abide in that plane
which the ariyans, now entering on,
are abiding in?

Thus, from evincing a desire
for the incomparable Deliverances
sorrow arises
as a result of the desire.

Sorrow such as this is called
sorrow connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency
of flavours themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now all these flavours
are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
he evinces a desire
for the incomparable Deliverances, thinking,'

When can I,
entering on
abide in that plane
which the ariyans, now entering on,
are abiding in?

Thus, from evincing a desire
for the incomparable Deliverances
sorrow arises
as a result of the desire.

Sorrow such as this is called
sorrow connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency
of touches themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now all these touches
are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is

by means of perfect wisdom,
he evinces a desire
for the incomparable Deliverances, thinking,'

When can I,
entering on
abide in that plane
which the ariyans, now entering on,
are abiding in?

Thus, from evincing a desire
for the incomparable Deliverances
sorrow arises
as a result of the desire.

Sorrow such as this is called
sorrow connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency
of mental states themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now all these mental states
are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,

he evinces a desire
for the incomparable Deliverances, thinking,'

When can I,
entering on
abide in that plane
which the ariyans, now entering on,
are abiding in?

Thus, from evincing a desire
for the incomparable Deliverances
sorrow arises
as a result of the desire.

Sorrow such as this is called
sorrow connected with renunciation.

These are the six sorrows connected with renunciation.

---

Herein what are the six equanimities connected with worldly life?

When a foolish,
errant,
average person
has seen a material shape with the eye, there arises the equanimity
of an uninstructed average person who has not conquered (his defilements),<sup>18</sup> who has not conquered fruition,<sup>19</sup> who does not see the peril<sup>20</sup> -

equanimity such as this does not go further than material shape.

Therefore this is called equanimity connected with worldly life.<sup>21</sup>

■

When a foolish,
errant,
average person
has heard a sound with the ear,
there arises the equanimity
of an uninstructed average person who has not conquered (his defilements),
who has not conquered fruition,
who does not see the peril -
equanimity such as this does not go further than sound.

Therefore this is called
equanimity connected with worldly life.

■

When a foolish,
errant,
average person
has smelt a smell with the nose,
there arises the equanimity
of an uninstructed average person
who has not conquered (his defilements),
who has not conquered fruition,
who does not see the peril -
equanimity such as this does not go further than smell.

Therefore this is called
equanimity connected with worldly life.

■

When a foolish,
errant,
average person
has tasted a flavour with the tongue,
there arises the equanimity
of an uninstructed average person
who has not conquered (his defilements),
who has not conquered fruition,
who does not see the peril -
equanimity such as this does not go further than flavour.

Therefore this is called
equanimity connected with worldly life.

■

When a foolish,
errant,
average person
has felt a touch with the body,
there arises the equanimity
of an uninstructed average person
who has not conquered (his defilements),
who has not conquered fruition,
who does not see the peril -
equanimity such as this does not go further than touch.

Therefore this is called
equanimity connected with worldly life.

■

When a foolish,
errant,
average person
has cognised a mental state with the mind,
there arises the equanimity
of an uninstructed average person
who has not conquered (his defilements),
who has not conquered fruition,
who does not see the peril -
equanimity such as this does not go further than mental state.

Therefore this is called
equanimity connected with worldly life.

These are the six equanimities connected with worldly life.

---

Herein what are the six equanimities connected with renunciation?

When one has known the impermanency
of material shapes themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now
all these material shapes are impermanent,

painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
equanimity arises.

Equanimity such as this goes further than material shape.

Therefore it is called
equanimity connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency
of sounds themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now
all these sounds are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
equanimity arises.

Equanimity such as this goes further than sounds.

Therefore it is called
equanimity connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency
of smells themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now
all these smells are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
equanimity arises.

Equanimity such as this goes further than smells.

Therefore it is called
equanimity connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency
of [268] flavours themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now
all these flavours are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
equanimity arises.

Equanimity such as this goes further than flavours.

Therefore it is called
equanimity connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency
of touches themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now
all these touches are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
equanimity arises.

Equanimity such as this goes further than touches.

Therefore it is called
equanimity connected with renunciation.

■

When one has known the impermanency
of mental states themselves,
their alteration,
disappearance
and arrest,
and thinks,

'Formerly as well as now
all these mental states are impermanent,
painful,
liable to alteration,'

from seeing this thus
as it really is
by means of perfect wisdom,
equanimity arises.

Equanimity such as this goes further than mental states.

Therefore it is called
equanimity connected with renunciation.

These are the six equanimities connected with renunciation.

When it is said,

'Thirty-six modes for creatures are to be known,'

it is said in reference to this.

§

Herein when it is said,

'Wherefore, because of this
get rid of this'

in reference to what is it said?

Herein, monks, because of<sup>22</sup> and by means of<sup>22</sup> these six joys connected with renunciation, get rid of
and transcend
those six joys connected with worldly life.

Thus is the getting rid of these,
thus is their transcending.<sup>23</sup>

■

Herein, monks, because of
and by means of these six sorrows connected with renunciation,
get rid of
and transcend
those six sorrows connected with worldly life.

Thus is the getting rid of these,
thus is their transcending.

■

Herein, monks, because of
and by means of these six equanimities connected with renunciation,

get rid of
and transcend
those six equanimities connected with worldly life.

Thus is the getting rid of these,
thus is their transcending.

■

Herein, monks, because of
and by means of these six joys connected with renunciation,
get rid of
and transcend
those six sorrows connected with renunciation.

Thus is the getting rid of these,
thus is their transcending.

■

Herein, monks, because of
and by means of these six equanimities connected with renunciation,
get rid of
and transcend
those six joys connected with renunciation.

Thus is the getting rid of these,
thus is their transcending.

---

There is, monks, equanimity in face of multiformity, connected with multiformity;
there is equanimity in face of uniformity, connected with uniformity.<sup>24</sup>

And what, monks, is equanimity in face of multiformity, connected with multiformity?

It is, monks, equanimity among material shapes, equanimity among sounds, equanimity among smells, equanimity among flavours, equanimity among touches.

This, monks, is equanimity in face of multiformity,
connected with multiformity.

And what, monks, is equanimity in face of uniformity, connected with uniformity?

It is, monks, equanimity connected with the plane of infinite ether, connected with the plane of infinite consciousness, connected with the plane [269] of no-thing, connected with the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.

This, monks, is equanimity in face of uniformity,
connected with uniformity.

Herein, monks, because of
and by means of this equanimity in face of uniformity, connected with uniformity,
get rid of
and transcend
that equanimity in face of multiformity, connected with multiformity.

Thus is the getting rid of it,
thus is its transcending.

Because of lack of desire,<sup>25</sup> monks, by means of lack of desire,
get rid of
and transcend
that equanimity in face of uniformity, connected with uniformity.

Thus is the getting rid of it,
thus is its transcending.

When it is said,

'Wherefore because of this
get rid of this,'

it is said in reference to this.

§

When it is said,

'There are three arousings of mindfulness
each of which an ariyan practises
and, practising which,
is an ariyan who is a teacher
fit to instruct a group,'

in reference to what is it said?

As to this,<sup>26</sup> monks, a teacher teaches dhamma to disciples,
compassionate,
seeking their welfare,
out of compassion,
saying:

'This is for your welfare,
this is for your happiness.'

But his disciples do not listen,
do not lend ear,
do not prepare their minds for profound knowledge
and, turning aside,
move away from the teacher's instruction.

Herein, monks, the Tathāgata is neither delighted nor does he experience delight, but dwells untroubled,<sup>27</sup> mindful
and clearly conscious.

This, monks, is the first arousing of mindfulness that the ariyan practises
and, practising it,
is an ariyan who is a teacher
fit to instruct a group.

■

And again, monks, a teacher teaches dhamma to disciples, compassionate,
seeking their welfare,
out of compassion,
saying:

'This is for your welfare,
this is for your happiness.'

Some of his disciples do not listen,
do not lend ear,
do not prepare their minds for profound knowledge
and, turning aside,
move away from the teacher's instruction.

But some disciples listen,
lend ear,
prepare their minds for profound knowledge
and, not turning aside,
do not move away from the teacher's instruction.

Herein, monks, the Tathāgata is neither delighted nor does he experience delight and neither is he depressed nor does he experience depression.

Having ousted both delight and depression,
he dwells with equanimity,
mindful and clearly conscious.

This, monks, is the second arousing of mindfulness
that the ariyan practises
and, practising it,
is an ariyan who is a teacher
fit to instruct a group.

[270] And again, monks, a teacher teaches dhamma to disciples,
compassionate,
seeking their welfare,
out of compassion,
saying:

'This is for your welfare,
this is for your happiness.'

His disciples listen,
lend ear,
prepare their minds for profound knowledge
and, not turning aside,
do not move from the teacher's instruction.

Herein, monks, the Tathāgata is delighted and he experiences delight but he dwells untroubled, 28
mindful and clearly conscious.

This, monks, is the third arousing of mindfulness
that the ariyan practises
and, practising it,
is an ariyan who is a teacher
fit to instruct a group.

When it is said:

'There are three arousings of mindfulness
each of which an ariyan practises
and, practising which,
is an ariyan who is a teacher
fit to instruct a group,'

it is said in reference to this.

§

When it is said,

'Of trainers

he is called the incomparable charioteer of men to be tamed,'

in reference to what is it said?

When, monks, an elephant to be tamed is driven<sup>29</sup> by the elephant-tamer it runs in one direction only - to the east

or west

or north

or south.

When, monks, a horse to be tamed is driven by the horse-tamer

it runs in one direction only -

to the east

or west

or north

or south.

When, monks, a bull to be tamed is driven by the bull-tamer

it runs in one direction only -

to the east

or west

or north

or south.

When, monks, a man to be tamed

is driven by the Tathāgata,

perfected one,

fully Self-Awakened One

he courses<sup>30</sup> to eight quarters:<sup>31</sup>

Being in the fine-material sphere,
he sees material shapes;
this is the first quarter.

Not perceiving material shape internally
he sees external material shapes;
this is the second quarter.

By thinking of the Fair, he is intent on it;
this is the third quarter.

By passing quite beyond perceptions of material shape, by sinking perceptions of sensory reactions,
by not attending to perceptions of variety,
and thinking,
'Ether is unending,'
entering on the plane of infinite ether
he abides in it;
this is the fourth quarter.

By passing quite beyond the plane [271] of infinite ether,
thinking,
'Consciousness is unending,' entering on the plane of infinite consciousness,
he abides in it;
this is the fifth quarter.

By passing quite beyond the plane of infinite consciousness,
thinking,
'There is not anything,' entering on the plane of no-thing,
he abides in it;
this is the sixth quarter.

By passing quite beyond the plane of no-thing,
entering on the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception,

he abides in it;
this is the seventh quarter.

By passing quite beyond the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-
perception,
entering on the stopping of perception and feeling,
he abides in it;
this is the eighth quarter.

When, monks, a man to be tamed
is driven by the Tathāgata,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
he courses to these eight quarters.

When it is said,

' Of trainers
he is called the incomparable charioteer of men to be tamed,'

it is said in reference to this."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on the Analysis of the Sixfold (Sense-)Field: The Seventh

---

<sup>1</sup> manopavicārā. MA. v. 21 says manassa upavicārā, discriminations or applications, ranges or spheres of the mind or mental activity. See B.H.S.D.

<sup>2</sup> sattapadā. MA. v. 21 calls this the tracks, ways, lots, padā, of creatures rooted in vatta, the whirligig of becoming (eighteen modes) and vivatta (eighteen modes).

<sup>3</sup> tatr'idaṃ nissāya idaṃ pajahatha. All these brief expositions, statements or headings (mātikā) are explained during the course of this Sutta.

<sup>4</sup> These three satipaṭṭhāna have nothing to do with the four usual ones, as is clear from the analysis below, p. 269. They are, more precisely, āveṇikā (special, exceptional) satipaṭṭhāna of a Buddha, his even-mindedness, sama-cittatā, when his audience listens, does not listen, or partly both. See B.H.S.D. under āveṇika and sm.rty-upasthāna. At Divy. 182, 268, we get: tribhir āveṇikaiḥ sm.rtyupasthānair; and at Divy. 126 tribhiḥ sm.rtyupasthānair Cf. the eighteen special, peculiar attributes of a Buddha, āveṇikā Buddha-dharmā, enumerated at Mhvu. i. 160. And cf. e.g.. śatasāhasrikā ix. 1449-1450 (translated at Buddhist Texts through the Ages, p. 146) where among the attributes is included "his mindfulness never fails" and "there is no falling off in mindfulness," nāsti sm.rtihāniḥ, although this, from the context, almost certainly refers not to the three, but to the four arousings of mindfulness. Pali has no such list, although eighteen Buddhadhammā are referred to at Miln. 105, 285, UdA. 87. Apart from the above Discourse, I know of no other passage in the Pali canon that expounds these three satipaṭṭhāna.

<sup>5</sup> tayo satipaṭṭhānā, yad ariyo sevati yad ariyo sevamāno satthā gaṇaṃ anusāsituṃ arahati. The two occurrences of yad in this sentence have the effect of referring not to these three satipaṭṭhānā as a whole or unit but to whichever one of them is called forth by the circumstances: of the disciples listening, not listening, or some listening and some not; see previous note. Also see the gloss of yad ariyo at MA. v. 27: yad ariyo ti ye satipaṭṭhāne ariyo sammāsambuddho sevati. Tattha tīsu ṭhānesu ṭhapento satipaṭṭhāne sevati ti veditabbo: "which an ariyan" means those arousings of mindfulness which an ariyan who is a fully self-awakened one practises. Here it is to be understood that, setting up mindfulness in the three (sets of) circumstances, he practises the arousings of mindfulness.

<sup>6</sup> yoggācariya, as at M. i. 124, iii. 97.

<sup>7</sup> uddesa, called at MA. v. 21 mātikāṭhapanam, the establishment or statement of the headings.

<sup>8</sup> For this and the next three headings cf. D. iii. 243, etc.

<sup>9</sup> Cf. the "six feelings" at S. iv. 232.

<sup>10</sup> Cf. M. iii. 239 f. for cha somanassūpavicārā cha domanasūpavicārā cha upekhūpavicārā, also recorded at D. iii. 244 f.m., Vbh. 381. Cf. the "eighteen feelings" at S. iv. 232.

<sup>11</sup> With visual consciousness, MA. v. 22; cf. VbhA. 508.

<sup>12</sup> upavicarati.

<sup>13</sup> Cf. the "thirty-six feelings" at S. iv. 232.

<sup>14</sup> Cf. Vism. 319.

<sup>15</sup> virāga, explained at MA. v. 22 by vigacchanena virāgam.

<sup>16</sup> Cf. Vism. 319.

<sup>17</sup> MA. v. 23 says incomparable deliverance is called arahantship.

<sup>18</sup> anodhijina, one who has not conquered the whole extent (odhi, or, to the limit) of the kilesas, therefore one whose cankers are not destroyed, MA. v. 24. Cf. Vbh. 246.

<sup>19</sup> avipākajina. MA. v. 24 says, similarly one whose cankers are not destroyed. For a conqueror of fruition is called one whose cankers are destroyed because he has conquered āyatim vipākam, the fruition (of deeds done here or in former births) to their (full) stretch.

<sup>20</sup> ādīnava, which, often connected with sense pleasures, is at MA. v. 24 connected with misfortune or distress, upaddava.

<sup>21</sup> It is the equanimity of not knowing, MA. v. 24.

<sup>22</sup> tāni nissāya tāni āgamma. Cf. KhA. 229 āgamma ti nissāya.

<sup>23</sup> Cf. M. i. 445.

<sup>24</sup> Cf. M. i. 364-367.

<sup>25</sup> atammayatā as at M. iii. 42.

<sup>26</sup> Cf. M. iii. 117.

<sup>27</sup> anavassuta; here, not overflowing with repulsion, paṭigha, MA. v. 27.

<sup>28</sup> Here, not overflowing with rāga, attachment.

<sup>29</sup> sārita, past participle both of sāreti, causative of sarati, to go, to run, to move along, to flow; and of sarati, to call to mind, to remember. Cf. sāreyya at M. i. 124, explained by MA. ii. 98 as ujukum peseyya, should send (him) forth straight; but MA. v. 27 explains sūrita by damita, tamed.

<sup>30</sup> vidhāvati, to run about, to roam, to rove; dhāvati being to run, to run quickly. Here vidhāvati, is used of the mind only; for the man sits down cross-legged, does not twist his body round for no matter which quarter he is facing (in the physical sense, E, W, N, S), he attains these eight attainments: the Deliverances at the same time as the "quarters," MA. v. 28; and naturally, since they appear to be the same as one another.

<sup>31</sup> These quarters or directions are the same as the eight Deliverances as given, e.g.. at M. ii. 12, and which are to be (mentally) developed.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
4. Vibhaṅga Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
4. The Division on Analysis

138. Discourse on an Exposition and Analysis

Uddesa Vibhaṅga Sutta

---

[223] THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattthī in the Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"I will teach you, monks, an exposition and (its) analysis. ed.1

Listen to it,
attend carefully,
and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

[272] "Monks, a monk should so investigate<sup>2</sup> (things) that,
as he investigates,
his consciousness of what is external
be undistracted, not diffused,
and of what is internal
be unslackened
so that it<sup>3</sup> may not be disturbed by grasping;
monks, if consciousness of what is external
be undistracted, not diffused,
of what is internal
be unslackened,
then, for him who is (thus) undisturbed by grasping
there is in the future
no origin or rise
of birth, old age and dying
or of anguish."

Thus spoke the Lord.

When he had said this,
the Well-farer rose from his seat and entered a dwelling-place.

Soon after the Lord had gone, it occurred to these monks:
"Your reverences, the Lord, recited this exposition to us in brief:

"Monks, a monk should so investigate (things) that,
as he investigates,
his consciousness of what is external
be undistracted, not diffused,
and of what is internal
be unslackened

so that it may not be disturbed by grasping;
monks, if consciousness of what is external
be undistracted, not diffused,
of what is internal
be unslackened,
then, for him who is (thus) undisturbed by grasping
there is in the future
no origin or rise
of birth, old age and dying
or of anguish."

But without having explained the meaning in full he rose from his seat and entered a dwelling-place.

Now, who can explain the meaning in full of this exposition which was recited in brief by the Lord but the meaning of which he did not explain in full?"

Then it occurred to these monks:

"Now, the venerable Kaccāna the Great
is both praised by the Teacher and revered by intelligent Brahma-farers;<sup>4</sup> [224, 225] and the venerable Kaccāna the Great is able to explain in full
the meaning of this exposition
that was recited in brief by the Lord
but the meaning of which was not explained in full.
Suppose we were to approach the venerable Kaccāna the Great,
and having approached,
were to question him on this meaning?"

Then these monks approached the venerable Kaccāna the Great;
having approached,
they exchanged greetings with him,
and when they had conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
they sat down at a respectful distance.

As they were sitting down at a respectful distance,
these monks spoke thus to the venerable Kaccāna the Great:

Reverend Kaccāna, the Lord,
having recited this exposition to us in brief
but not having explained its meaning in full,
rose from his seat and entered a dwelling-place:

"Monks, a monk should so investigate (things) that,
as he investigates,
his consciousness of what is external
be undistracted, not diffused,
and of what is internal
be unslackened
so that it may not be disturbed by grasping;
monks, if consciousness of what is external
be undistracted, not diffused,
of what is internal
be unslackened,
then, for him who is (thus) undisturbed by grasping
there is in the future
no origin or rise
of birth, old age and dying
or of anguish."

Soon after the Lord had departed, it occurred to us, reverend Kaccāna:
'Your reverences, the Lord, having recited this exposition to us in brief,
but not having explained the meaning in full,
rose from his seat and entered a dwelling-place:

"Monks, a monk should so investigate (things) that,
as he investigates,
his consciousness of what is external
be undistracted, not diffused,
and of what is internal

be unslackened
so that it may not be disturbed by grasping;
monks, if consciousness of what is external
be undistracted, not diffused,
of what is internal
be unslackened,
then, for him who is (thus) undisturbed by grasping
there is in the future
no origin or rise
of birth, old age and dying
or of anguish."

Now, who can explain the meaning in full
of this exposition that was recited in brief by the Lord but the meaning of which he did not explaining full?"

Then, reverend Kaccāna, it occurred to us:
'Now the venerable Kaccāna the Great
is both praised by the Teacher
and revered by intelligent fellow-Brahma-farers;
and the venerable Kaccāna the Great
is able to explain in full
the meaning of this exposition
that was recited in brief by the Lord
but the meaning of which was not explained in full.

Suppose we were to approach the venerable Kaccāna the Great,
and having approached,
were to question him on this meaning?

May the venerable Kaccāna the Great explain it."

"Your reverences, as a man walking about aiming at the pith, searching for the pith,
looking about for the pith
of a great, stable and pithy tree,

might pass by the root,
pass by the trunk,
thinking that the pith was to be looked for
in the branches and foliage
— even so is this performance of the venerable ones,
for (although) you had the Teacher face-to-face,
yet you have ignored that Lord and judge that it is I who should be questioned on this meaning.

But, your reverences,
the Lord knows what should be known,
sees what should be seen,
he has become vision,
become knowledge,
become dhamma,
become Brahma,
he is the propounder,
the expounder,
the bringer of the goal,
the giver of the Deathless,
dhamma-lord,
Tathāgata.

This was the time
when you should have questioned the Lord on this meaning so that you might have understood what the Lord explained to you."

Undoubtedly, reverend Kaccāna,
the Lord knows what should be known,
sees what should be seen,
he has become vision,
become knowledge,
become dhamma,
become Brahma,
he is the propounder,
the expounder,

the bringer of the goal,
the giver of the Deathless,
dhamma-lord,
Tathāgata.

This was the time
when we should have questioned the Lord on this meaning so that we might have understood what the Lord explained to us.

But the venerable Kaccāna the Great
is both praised by the Teacher
and revered by intelligent fellow Brahma-farers;
and the venerable Kaccāna the Great
is able to explain in full
the meaning of this exposition
that was recited in brief by the Lord
but the meaning of which was not explained in full.

May the venerable Kaccāna explain it without finding it troublesome."

"Well then, your reverences,
listen,
pay careful attention
and I will speak."

"Yes, your reverence,"
these monks answered the venerable Kaccāna the Great in assent.

The venerable Kaccāna the Great spoke thus:

"In regard to that exposition, your reverences, which was recited in brief by the Lord but the meaning of which he had not explained in full when he rose from his seat and entered a dwelling-place:

"Monks, a monk should so investigate (things) that,
as he investigates,

his consciousness of what is external
be undistracted, not diffused,
and of what is internal
be unslackened
so that it may not be disturbed by grasping;
monks, if consciousness of what is external
be undistracted, not diffused,
of what is internal
be unslackened,
then, for him who is (thus) undisturbed by grasping
there is in the future
no origin or rise
of birth, old age and dying
or of anguish."

— of this exposition which was recited in brief by the Lord
but the meaning of which he did not explain in full,
I, your reverences, understand the meaning in full thus:

And what, your reverences, is called distracted, diffused consciousness of what is external?

If, your reverences,
after a monk has seen a material shape with the eye,
his consciousness runs after signs of material shape, is tied by satisfaction in signs of material [273] shapes, is bound to satisfaction in signs of material shapes, is fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of material shapes, then the consciousness of what is external
is said to be distracted and diffused.

If, having heard a sound with the ear, his consciousness runs after signs of sounds, is tied by satisfaction in signs of sounds, is bound to satisfaction in signs of sounds, is fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of sounds,

then the consciousness of what is external
is said to be distracted and diffused.

If, having smelled a smell with the nose,
his consciousness runs after signs of smells, is tied by satisfaction in signs of smells, is bound to satisfaction in signs of smells, is fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of smells,
then the consciousness of what is external
is said to be distracted and diffused.

If, having tasted a flavour with the tongue, his consciousness runs after signs of flavours, is tied by satisfaction in signs of flavours, is bound to satisfaction in signs of flavours, is fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of flavours,
then the consciousness of what is external
is said to be distracted and diffused.

If, having felt a touch with the body,
his consciousness runs after signs of touches, is tied by satisfaction in signs of touches, is bound to satisfaction in signs of touches, is fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of touches,
then the consciousness of what is external
is said to be distracted and diffused.

If, having cognised a mental state with the mind,
his consciousness runs after signs of mental states, is tied by satisfaction in signs of mental states, is bound to satisfaction in signs of mental states, is fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of mental states,
then the consciousness of what is external
is said to be distracted and diffused.

It is thus, your reverences,
that consciousness of what is external is called distracted and diffused.

And what, your reverences, is called undistracted, undiffused consciousness
of what is external?

If, your reverences,
after a monk has seen a material shape with the eye,
his consciousness does not run after signs of material shape, is not tied by satisfaction in signs of material shape, is not bound to satisfaction in signs of material shapes, is not fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of material shapes,
then the consciousness of what is external
is said to be undistracted and undiffused.

[226]If, having heard a sound with the ear, his consciousness does not run after signs of sounds, is not tied by satisfaction in signs of sounds, is not bound to satisfaction in signs of sounds, is not fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of sounds,
then the consciousness of what is external
is said to be undistracted and undiffused.

If, having smelled a smell with the nose,
his consciousness does not run after signs of smells, is not tied by satisfaction in signs of smells, is not bound to satisfaction in signs of smells, is not fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of smells,
then the consciousness of what is external
is said to be undistracted and undiffused.

If, having tasted a flavour with the tongue,
his consciousness does not run after signs of flavours, is not tied by satisfaction in signs of flavours, is not bound to satisfaction in signs of flavours, is not fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of flavours,

then the consciousness of what is external
is said to be undistracted and undiffused.

If, having felt a touch with the body,
his consciousness does not run after signs of touches, is not tied by satisfaction in signs of touches, is not bound to satisfaction in signs of touches, is not fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of touches,
then the consciousness of what is external
is said to be undistracted and undiffused.

If, having cognised a mental state with the mind,
his consciousness does not run after signs of mental states, is not tied by satisfaction in signs of mental states, is not bound to satisfaction in signs of mental states, is not fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of mental states,
then the consciousness of what is external
is said to be undistracted and undiffused.

It is thus, your reverences,
that consciousness of what is external is called undistracted and undiffused.

And what, your reverences, is called slackened thought in regard to what is internal?

As to this, your reverences, a monk,
aloof from pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
entering into
abides in the first meditation
which is accompanied by initial thought and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness,
and is rapturous and joyful.

If his consciousness runs after the rapture and joy
that are born of aloofness, if it is tied by satisfaction in signs of the rapture and joy
that are born of aloofness, if it is bound to satisfaction in signs of the rapture and joy
that are born of aloofness, if it is fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of the rapture and joy
that are born of aloofness,
then his thought is called slackened
in regard to what is internal.

And again, your reverences, a monk,
by allaying initial thought and discursive thought,
with the mind subjectively tranquillised
and fixed on one point,
enters into and abides in
the second meditation
which is devoid of initial thought and discursive thought,
is 274 born of concentration,
and is rapturous and joyful.

If his consciousness runs after the rapture and joy
that are born of concentration,
if it is tied by satisfaction in signs of the rapture and joy
that are born of concentration,
if it is bound to satisfaction in signs of the rapture and joy
that are born of concentration,
if it is fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of the rapture and joy
that are born of concentration,
then his thought is called slackened
in regard to what is internal.

And again, your reverences, a monk,
by the fading out of rapture
abides with equanimity,
mindful and clearly conscious

and experiences in his person
that joy of which the Ariyans say:
'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,' entering into the third meditation,
he abides in it.

If his consciousness runs after the joy of equanimity,<sup>5</sup> if it is tied by satisfaction in signs of the joy of equanimity if it is bound to satisfaction in signs of the the joy of equanimity if it is fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of the joy of equanimity
then his thought is called slackened
in regard to what is internal.

And again, your reverences, a monk,
by getting rid of joy,
by getting rid of anguish,
by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows,
entering into
abides in the fourth meditation
which has neither anguish nor joy,
and which is entirely purified
by equanimity and mindfulness.

If his consciousness runs after equanimity and mindfulness, if it is tied by satisfaction in signs of equanimity and mindfulness if it is bound to satisfaction in signs of equanimity and mindfulness if it is fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of equanimity and mindfulness
then his thought is called slackened
in regard to what is internal.

It is thus, your reverences,
that thought is called slackened
in regard to what is internal.

[227] And what, your reverences, is called unslackened thought in regard to what is internal?

As to this, your reverences, a monk,
aloof from pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
entering into
abides in the first meditation
which is accompanied by initial thought and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness,
and is rapturous and joyful.

If his consciousness does not run after the rapture and joy
that are born of aloofness, if it is not tied by satisfaction in signs of the rapture and joy
that are born of aloofness, if it is not bound to satisfaction in signs of the rapture and joy
that are born of aloofness, if it is not fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of the rapture and
joy
that are born of aloofness,
then his thought is called unslackened
in regard to what is internal.

And again, your reverences, a monk,
by allaying initial thought and discursive thought,
with the mind subjectively tranquillised
and fixed on one point,
enters into and abides in
the second meditation
which is devoid of initial thought and discursive thought,
is 274 born of concentration,
and is rapturous and joyful.

If his consciousness does not run after the rapture and joy
that are born of concentration,

if it is not tied by satisfaction in signs of the rapture and joy
that are born of concentration,
if it is not bound to satisfaction in signs of the rapture and joy
that are born of concentration, if it is not fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of the rapture and
joy
that are born of concentration,
then his thought is called unslackened
in regard to what is internal.

And again, your reverences, a monk,
by the fading out of rapture
abides with equanimity,
mindful and clearly conscious
and experiences in his person
that joy of which the Ariyans say:
'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,' entering into the third meditation,
he abides in it.

If his consciousness does not run after the joy of equanimity, if it is not tied by satisfaction in signs of the joy of equanimity if it is not bound to satisfaction in signs of the the joy of equanimity if it is not fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of the joy of equanimity
then his thought is called unslackened
in regard to what is internal.

And again, your reverences, a monk,
by getting rid of joy,
by getting rid of anguish,
by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows,
entering into
abides in the fourth meditation
which has neither anguish nor joy,

and which is entirely purified
by equanimity and mindfulness.

If his consciousness does not run after equanimity and mindfulness, if it is not tied by satisfaction in signs of equanimity and mindfulness if it is not bound to satisfaction in signs of equanimity and mindfulness if it is not fettered by the fetter of satisfaction in the signs of equanimity and mindfulness
then his thought is called unslackened
in regard to what is internal.

It is thus, your reverences, that thought is called unslackened in regard to what is internal.

And what, your reverences, is being disturbed by grasping?<sup>6</sup>

As to this, your reverences, an uninstructed average person,
taking no count of the pure ones,
unskilled in the dhamma of the pure ones,
untrained in the dhamma of the pure ones,
taking no count of the true men,
unskilled in the dhamma of the true men,
untrained in the dhamma of the true men,
regards material shape as self
or self as having material shape
or material shape as in self
or self as in material shape.

His material shape alters and becomes otherwise;
with the alteration and otherwiseness in his material shape, his consciousness is occupied with the alteration in the material shape;<sup>7</sup> there is disturbance for him
born of his occupation
with the alteration in the material shape;
mental objects, arising,

persist in obsessing his thought;
because of this obsession of his thought he is afraid and annoyed and full of longing<sup>8</sup> and he is disturbed by grasping.<sup>9</sup> [228]

He regards feeling as self
or self as having feeling
or feeling as in self
or self as in feeling.

His feeling alters and becomes otherwise;
with the alteration and otherwiseness in his feeling, his consciousness is occupied with the alteration in the feeling;
there is disturbance for him
born of his occupation
with the alteration in the feeling;
mental objects, arising,
persist in obsessing his thought;
because of this obsession of his thought he is afraid and annoyed and full of longing and he is disturbed by grasping.

He regards perception as self
or self as having perception
or perception as in self
or self as in perception.

His perception alters and becomes otherwise;
with the alteration and otherwiseness in his perception, his consciousness is occupied with the alteration in the perception;
there is disturbance for him
born of his occupation
with the alteration in the perception;
mental objects, arising,
persist in obsessing his thought;
because of this obsession of his thought

he is afraid and annoyed and full of longing
and he is disturbed by grasping.

He regards the habitual tendencies as self
or self as having the habitual tendencies
or the habitual tendencies as in self
or self as in the habitual tendencies.

His habitual tendencies alter and become otherwise;
with the alteration and otherwiseness in his habitual tendencies, his consciousness is occupied with the alteration in the habitual tendencies;
there is disturbance for him
born of his occupation
with the alteration in the habitual tendencies;
mental objects, arising,
persist in obsessing his thought;
because of this obsession of his thought
he is afraid and annoyed and full of longing
and he is disturbed by grasping.

He regards consciousness as self
or self as having consciousness
or consciousness as in self
or self as in consciousness.

His consciousness alters and becomes otherwise;
with the alteration and otherwiseness in his consciousness, his consciousness is occupied with the alteration in his consciousness;
mental objects, arising,
persist in obsessing his thought;
because of this obsession of his thought
he is afraid and annoyed and full of longing
and he is disturbed by grasping.

This, your reverences, is what is being disturbed by grasping.

And what, your reverences, is not being disturbed by grasping?

As to this, your reverences,
an instructed disciple of the Ariyans,
taking count of the pure ones,
skilled in the dhamma of the pure ones,
well trained in the dhamma of the pure ones,
taking count of the true men,
skilled in the dhamma of the true men,
well trained in the dhamma of the true men,
does not regard material shape as self
or self as having material shape
or material shape as in self
or self as in material shape.

His material shape alters and becomes otherwise;
but with the alteration and otherwiseness in his material shape, his consciousness is not occupied with the alteration in his material shape;
no disturbance for him is born
of his occupation
with the alteration in the material shape;
mental objects, arising,
do not persist in obsessing his thought;
because of this non-obsession of his thought he is neither afraid nor annoyed or full of longing and he is not disturbed by grasping.

He does not regard feeling as self
or self as having feeling
or feeling as in self
or self as in feeling.

His feeling alters and becomes otherwise;
but with the alteration and otherwiseness in his feeling, his consciousness is not occupied with the alteration in the feeling;
no disturbance for him is born
of his occupation
with the alteration in the feeling;

mental objects, arising,
do not persist in obsessing his thought;
because of this non-obsession of his thought
he is neither afraid nor annoyed or full of longing
and he is not disturbed by grasping.

He does not regard perception as self
or self as having perception
or perception as in self
or self as in perception.

His perception alters and becomes otherwise;
but with the alteration and otherwiseness in his perception,
his consciousness is occupied with the alteration in the perception;
no disturbance for him is born
of his occupation
with the alteration in the perception;
mental objects, arising,
do not persist in obsessing his thought;
because of this non-obsession of his thought
he is neither afraid nor annoyed or full of longing
and he is not disturbed by grasping.

He does not regard the habitual tendencies as self
or self as having the habitual tendencies
or the habitual tendencies as in self
or self as in the habitual tendencies.

His habitual tendencies alter and become otherwise;
but with the alteration and otherwiseness in his habitual tendencies,
his consciousness is occupied with the alteration in the habitual tendencies;
no disturbance for him is born
of his occupation
with the alteration in the habitual tendencies;
mental objects, arising,
do not persist in obsessing his thought;

because of this non-obsession of his thought
he is neither afraid nor annoyed or full of longing
and he is not disturbed by grasping.

He does not regard regard consciousness as self
or self as having consciousness
or consciousness as in self
or self as in consciousness.

His consciousness alters and becomes otherwise;
but with the alteration and otherwiseness in his consciousness,
his consciousness is occupied with the alteration in his consciousness;
no disturbance for him is born
of his occupation
with the alteration in his consciousness
mental objects, arising,
do not persist in obsessing his thought;
because of this non-obsession of his thought
he is neither afraid nor annoyed or full of longing
and he is not disturbed by grasping.

This, your reverences, is what is not being disturbed by grasping.

In regard to that exposition, your reverences, which the Lord recited in brief but the meaning of which he had not explained in full
when he rose from his seat and entered a dwelling-place:

"Monks, a monk should so investigate (things) that,
as he investigates,
his consciousness of what is external
be undistracted, not diffused,
and of what is internal
be unslackened
so that it may not be disturbed by grasping;
monks, if consciousness of what is external

be undistracted, not diffused,
of what is internal
be unslackened,
then, for him who is (thus) undisturbed by grasping
there is in the future
no origin or rise
of birth, old age and dying
or of anguish."

— Of this exposition which was recited by the Lord in brief but the meaning of which he did not explain in full,
I, your reverences [229] understand the meaning in full thus.

But if you, venerable ones, so desire,
you can approach the Lord and question him as to the meaning
so that as the Lord explains it to you so may you understand it."

[277] Then these monks ... (as at M. iii. 198-199, above, p. 243, reading Monks, a monk should so investigate (things) that ... there is in the future no origin or rise of birth, old age and dying and of anguish instead of The past should not be followed after, the future not desired ... He is indeed, 'Auspicious' called, described as a sage at peace) ...

"Learned, monks, is Kaccāna the Great,
of great wisdom, monks, is Kaccana the Great.
For if you, monks, had questioned me as to this meaning,
I too would have explained it precisely as it was explained by Kaccāna the Great.
Indeed, this is the exact meaning of that,
and thus should you remember it."

Thus spoke the Lord. Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on an Exposition and Analysis: The Eighth

---

Ed.1 Evidence of later [erroneous] editing in that what the Buddha actually does here is to teach the exposition, not both the exposition and analysis.

<sup>1</sup> MA. v. 28 says uddesañ ca vibhaṅgañ ca mātikañ ca vibhajanañ cā ti. So uddesa is the statement of the headings (mātikā) which will be analysed in this Discourse.

<sup>2</sup> upaparikkheyya. should weigh, measure, explore, mark out. MA. v. 28. Cf. Iti., p. 94. where this "heading" also occurs.

<sup>3</sup> Consciousness, MA. v. 28.

<sup>4</sup> As at M. iii. 194-195. [re-inserted by ed.]

<sup>5</sup> Text here reads upekhānsārī; but I think it necessary to insert sukha into this compound as in the negative clause below: upekhāsukhānsārī.

<sup>6</sup> For the rest of Maha-Kaccāna's explanation, cf. S. iii. 15 ff.

<sup>7</sup> In Chalmers' text a sentence is here inserted, presumably in error as it has no counterpart in the repetitions below or in the S. version: tassa rūpam vipariṇāmānuparivatti viññāṇam hoti should therefore be deleted.

<sup>8</sup> upekhavā of Chalmers' text should probably read, with S. apekhavā. MA. v. 30, reading apekkhavā, explains by sālayo sapiho, with pleasure and affection.

<sup>9</sup> anupādāya. The reading at S. iii. 16, which I follow, is upādāya.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
4. Vibhaṅga Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
4. The Division on Analysis

139. Discourse on the Analysis of the Undefined<sup>1</sup>

The Arana-vibhaṅga Sutta

---

[230]

Thus have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvatti in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:
"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"I will teach you, monks, the analysis of the undefined.
Listen carefully to it, pay attention and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

[278] "You should not be intent on the happiness of sense-pleasures which is low,
of the villager,
of the average person,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal;
nor should you be intent on the practice of self-mortification which is sorrowful,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal.

Not approaching either of these two dead-ends, there is the Middle Course awakened to by the Tathāgata, making for vision,
making for knowledge,
and conducing to calm,
superknowledge,
self-awakening and Nibbāna.

One should know approval and one should know disapproval,
and having known approval,
having known disapproval,
one should neither approve nor disapprove
— one should simply teach dhamma.

One should know how to judge what happiness is;
having known how to judge what happiness is,
one should be intent on inward happiness.

One should not utter a secret speech;<sup>2</sup> face-to-face (with a man) one should not tell (him) a vexatious thing.<sup>3</sup>

One should speak quite slowly,
not hurriedly.

One should not affect the dialect of the countryside,
one should not deviate from recognised parlance.

This is the exposition of the analysis of the undefiled.

When it is said,
'You should not be intent on the happiness of sense-pleasures
which is low,
of the villager,
of the average person,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal;
nor should you be intent on the practice of self-mortification
which is sorrowful,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal
nor should you be intent on the practice of self-mortification
which is sorrowful,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal,
in reference to what is it said?

Whatever is happiness in association with sense-pleasures
and intentness on a joy that is low,
of the villager,
of the average man,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal
— this is a thing that has anguish,<sup>4</sup>
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a wrong course.

But whatever is happiness in association with sense-pleasures but not intentness on a joy [231] that is low,
of the villager,
of the average man,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal
— this is a thing without anguish,
annoyance, trouble or fret;
it is the right course.

Whatever is intentness on self-mortification which is sorrowful,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal
— this is a thing that has anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a wrong course.

But whatever is non-intentness on self-mortification which is sorrowful,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal
— this is a thing without anguish,
annoyance, trouble or fret;
it is the right course.

When it is said,
'You should not be intent on the happiness of sense-pleasures
which is low,
of the villager,
of the average person,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal;
[279] nor should you be intent on the practice of self-mortification
which is sorrowful,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal
nor should you be intent on the practice of self-mortification

which is sorrowful,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal,
it is said in reference to this.

When it is said, 'Not approaching either of these two dead-ends, there is the Middle Course awakened to by the Tathigata,
making for vision,
making for knowledge,
that conduces to calm,
superknowledge,
self-awakening and nibbana,'
in reference to what is it said?

It is the Ariyan Eightfold Way itself,
that is to say:
right view,
right aspiration,
right speech,
right action,
right mode of livelihood,
right endeavour,
right mindfulness,
right concentration.

When it is said,
'Not approaching either of these two dead-ends, there is the Middle Course
making for vision,
making for knowledge,
and conducing to calm,
superknowledge,
self-awakening and Nibbāna.'
it is said in reference to this.

When it is said,
'One should know approval and one should know disapproval,
and having known approval,
having known disapproval,
one should neither approve nor disapprove
— one should simply teach dhamma,'
in reference to what is it said?

And what, monks, is approval and what is disapproval
but not the teaching of dhamma?

He disapproves of some (people) here, saying:
'All those who find happiness in association with sense pleasures and are intent on a joy that is low,
of the villager,
of the average man,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal,
have anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
they are faring along wrongly.'

He approves of some (people) here, saying:
'All those who find happiness in association with sense-pleasures but are not intent on a joy that is low
of the villager,
of the average man,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal,
are without anguish,
annoyance, trouble or fret;
they are faring along rightly.'

He disapproves of some (people) here, saying:
'All those who are intent on the practice of self-mortification,

which is sorrowful,
unariyan,
not connected with the goal, [232] have anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
they are faring along wrongly.'

He approves of some (people) here, saying:
'All those who are not intent on the practice of self-mortification,
which is sorrowful,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal,
are without anguish,
annoyance, trouble or fret;
they are faring along rightly.'

He disapproves of some (people) here, saying:
'All those in whom the fetter of becoming<sup>5</sup> is not got rid of have anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
they are faring along wrongly.'

He approves of some (people) here, saying:
'All those in whom the fetter [280] of becoming<sup>6</sup> is got rid of are without
anguish,
annoyance, trouble or fret;
they are faring along rightly.'

This, monks, is what is approval and disapproval
but not the teaching of dhamma.

And what, monks, is neither approval nor disapproval, but the teaching of dhamma?

He does not speak thus:

'All those who find happiness in association with sense-pleasures
and are intent on a joy that is low,
of the villager,

of the average man,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal,
have anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
they are faring along wrongly.'

He simply teaches dhamma, saying:

'Intentness is a thing that has anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a wrong course.'

He does not speak thus:

'All those who find happiness in association with sense-pleasures but are not intent on a joy that is low,
of the villager,
of the average man,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal,
are without anguish,
annoyance, trouble or fret;
they are faring along rightly.'

He simply teaches dhamma, saying:

'Non-intentness is a thing that is without anguish,
annoyance, trouble or fret;
it is the right course.'

He does not speak thus:

'All those who are intent on the practice of self-mortification
which is sorrowful,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal,

have anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
they are faring along wrongly.'

He simply teaches dhamma, saying:

'Intentness is a thing that has anguish
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a wrong course.'

He does not speak thus:

'All those who are not intent on the practice of self-mortification,
which is sorrowful,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal,
are without anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
they are faring along rightly.'

He simply teaches dhamma, saying:

'Non-intentness is a thing that is without anguish
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is the right course.'

He does not speak thus:

'All those in whom the fetter of becoming is not got rid of
have anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
they are faring along wrongly.'

[233] He simply teaches dhamma, saying:

'While the fetter of becoming is not got rid of, becoming is not got rid of.'

He does not speak thus:

'All those in whom the fetter of becoming is got rid of are without anguish
annoyance, trouble and fret;
they are faring along rightly.'

He simply teaches dhamma, saying:

'If the fetter of becoming is got rid of,
becoming is got rid of.'

This, monks, is what is neither approval nor disapproval, but the teaching of
dhamma.

When it is said:

'One should know approval and one should know disapproval,
and having known approval,
having known disapproval,
one should neither approve nor disapprove
one should simply teach dhamma,'
it is said in reference to this.

[281]When it is said:

'One should know how to judge what happiness is;
having known how to judge what happiness is,
one should be intent on inward happiness,'
in reference to what is it said?

These five, monks, are the strands of sense-pleasures.
What five?

Material shapes cognisable by the eye agreeable, pleasant, liked, enticing, connected with, sensual pleasure,
alluring.

Sounds cognisable by the ear agreeable, pleasant, liked, enticing, connected with, sensual pleasure,

alluring

Smells cognisable by the nose

agreeable, pleasant, liked, enticing, connected with, sensual pleasure,
alluring

Tastes cognisable by the tongue

agreeable, pleasant, liked, enticing, connected with, sensual pleasure,
alluring

Touches cognisable by the body,

agreeable, pleasant, liked, enticing, connected with, sensual pleasure,
alluring.

These, monks, are the five strands of sense-pleasures.

Whatever happiness or joy, monks, arises in consequence of these five strands of sense-pleasures is said to be a happiness of sense-pleasures,

a vile happiness,

the happiness of an average person,

an unAriyan happiness.

I say of this happiness

that it is not to be pursued, developed or made much of — it is to be feared.

As to this, monks, a monk,

aloof from pleasures of the senses,

aloof from unskilled states of mind,

enters on and abides in the first meditation

which is accompanied by initial thought and discursive thought,

is born of aloofness,

and is rapturous and joyful.

And again, your reverences, a monk,
by allaying initial thought and discursive thought,
with the mind subjectively tranquillised
and fixed on one point,
enters into and abides in
the second meditation
which is devoid of initial thought and discursive thought,
is 274 born of concentration,
and is rapturous and joyful.

And again, your reverences, a monk,
by the fading out of rapture
abides with equanimity,
mindful and clearly conscious
and experiences in his person
that joy of which the Ariyans say:
'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,' entering into the third meditation,
he abides in it.

And again, your reverences, a monk,
by getting rid of joy,
by getting rid of anguish,
by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows,
entering into
abides in the fourth meditation
which has neither anguish nor joy,
and which is entirely purified
by equanimity and mindfulness.

This is said to be the happiness of renunciation,
the happiness of aloofness,
the happiness of tranquillity,
the happiness of self-awakening.

I say of this happiness
that it is to be pursued, developed and made much of — it is not to be feared.

[234] When it is said:

'One should know how to judge what happiness is;
having known how to judge what happiness is,
one should be intent on inward happiness,'
it is said in reference to this.

When it is said:

'One should not utter a secret speech;
face-to-face (with a man)
one should not tell (him) a vexatious thing,'
in reference to what is it said?

As to this, monks,
knowing a secret speech is not fact, untrue,
not connected with the goal,
one should not, if possible,
utter that secret speech;
and if, knowing that secret speech is fact,
true,
but not connected with the goal,
he should train himself not to speak it.

But if one knows that secret speech is fact, true,
and connected with the goal,
then he will know the right time to speak that secret speech to that (other person).

As to this, monks,
knowing a vexatious speech (made) face-to-face (with a man) is not fact, untrue,

not connected with the goal,
one should not, if possible,
utter that vexatious speech face-to-face (with a man);
and if, knowing that vexatious speech (made) face-to-face (with a man)
is fact, true,
but not connected with the goal,
he should train himself not to speak it.

But if one knows that vexatious speech (made) face-to-face (with a man)
is fact, true,
and connected with the goal,
then he will know the right time to speak
that vexatious speech
face-to-face with that (other person).

'When it is said:
'One should not [282] utter a secret speech;
face-to-face (with a man)
one should not tell (him) a vexatious thing,'
it is said in reference to this.

When it is said:
'One should speak quite slowly, not hurriedly,'
in reference to what is it said?

As to this, monks,
if one speak hurriedly
the body tires
and thought suffers
and the sound suffers
and the throat is affected; the speech of one in a hurry is not clear or comprehensible.

As to this, monks,
if one speak slowly
the body does not tire and thought does not suffer and the sound does not suffer and the throat is not affected; the speech of one not in a hurry is clear and comprehensible.

When it is said:
'One should speak quite slowly,
not hurriedly,'
it is said in reference to this.

When it is said:
'One should not affect the dialect of the countryside,
one should not deviate from recognised parlance,'
in reference to what is it said?

And what, monks,
is affectation of the dialect of the countryside and what is departure from recognised parlance?

In this case, monks,
in different districts they know (the different words):
Pāṭi<sup>7</sup> [235] ... Patta ... Vittha ... Sarāva ... Dhāropa ... Poṇa ... Pisīla.

Thus as they know the word as this or that in these various districts so does a person, obstinately clinging to it and adhering to it, explain:
'This indeed is the truth, all else is falsehood.'<sup>8</sup>

Thus, monks, is affectation of the dialect of the countryside and departure from recognised parlance.

And what, monks, is non-affectation of the dialect of the countryside and nondeparture from recognised parlance?

In this case, monks,
in different districts they know (the different words): Pāti ... Patta ... Vittha ... Sarāva ... Dhāropa ... Poṇa ... Pisīla, yet although they know the word as this or that
in these various districts
a person does not cling to it but explains:
'These venerable ones definitely express it thus.'

Thus, monks, is non-affectation of the dialect of the countryside and non-departure from recognised parlance.

When it is said:
'One should not affect the dialect of the countryside,
one should not deviate from recognised parlance,'
it is said in reference to this.

Wherefore, monks,
whatever is happiness in association with sense-pleasures
and intentness on a joy that is low,
of the villager,
of the average man,
not connected with the goal,
this is a thing that has anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a wrong course.

Therefore this thing is defiled.

Wherefore, monks,
whatever is [283] happiness in association with sense-pleasures but non-intentness on a joy that is low,

of the villager,
of the average man,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal,
this is a thing without anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
fret; it is a right course.

Therefore this thing is undefiled.

Wherefore, monks,
whatever is intentness on self-mortification
which is sorrowful,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal,
this is a thing that has anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a wrong course.

Therefore this thing is defiled.

Wherefore, monks,
whatever is non-intentness on the practice of self-mortification which is sorrowful,
unAriyan,
not connected with the goal,
this is a thing without anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
fret; it is the right course.

[236] Therefore this thing is undefiled.

Wherefore, monks,
that Middle Course awakened to by the Tathāgata,
making for vision,
making for knowledge,
and conducive to calm,

super-knowledge,
self-awakening
and nibbana,
this is a thing without anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is the right course.

Therefore this thing is undefiled.

Wherefore, monks,
whatever is approval and disapproval and not the teaching of dhamma,
this is a thing that has anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a wrong course.

Therefore this thing is defiled.

Wherefore, monks,
whatever is neither approval nor disapproval but is the teaching of dhamma,
this is a thing without anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is the right course.

Therefore this thing is undefiled.

Wherefore, monks,
that happiness in sense-pleasures,
a vile happiness,
the happiness of an average person,
an unAriyan happiness,
this is a thing that has anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a wrong course.

Therefore this thing is defiled.

Wherefore, monks,
that happiness in renunciation,
the happiness of aloofness,
the happiness of tranquillity,
the happiness of self-awakening,
this is a thing without anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is the right course.

Therefore this thing is undefiled.

Wherefore, monks,
that secret speech that is not fact, untrue,
not connected with the goal,
this is a thing that has anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a wrong course.

Therefore this thing is defiled.

Wherefore, monks,
that secret speech that is fact, true,
but not connected with the goal,
this is a thing that has anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a wrong course.

Therefore this thing is defiled.

Wherefore, monks,
that secret speech that is fact, true,
and connected with the goal,
this is a thing without anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is the right course.

Therefore this thing is undefiled.

Wherefore, monks,
that vexatious speech
(made) face-to-face (with a man) that is not fact, untrue,
not connected with the goal,
this is a thing that has anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a wrong course.

Therefore this thing is defiled.

Wherefore, monks,
that vexatious speech
(made) face-to-face (with a man)
that is fact, true,
but not connected with the goal,
this too is a thing that has anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a [284] wrong course.

Therefore this thing is defiled.

Wherefore, monks,
that [237] vexatious speech (made) face-to-face (with a man)
that is fact, true,
and connected with the goal,
this is a thing without anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is the right course.

Therefore this thing is undefiled.

Wherefore, monks,
that which is spoken by one in a hurry,
this is a thing that has anguish,

annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a wrong course.

Therefore this thing is defiled.

Wherefore, monks,
that which is spoken by one not in a hurry,
this is a thing without anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is the right course.

Therefore this thing is undefiled.

Wheretore, monks,
affectation of the dialect of the countryside and departure from recognised parlance,
this is a thing that has anguish,
annoyance, trouble and fret;
it is a wrong course.

Therefore this thing is defiled.

Wherefore, monks,
non-affectation of the dialect of the countryside and non-departure from recognised parlance,
this is a thing without anguish,
annoyance, trouble or fret;
it is the right course.

Therefore this thing is undefiled.

Wherefore, monks,
this is how you must train yourselves:

I will know the defiled thing and I will know the undefiled thing, and knowing the defiled thing and knowing the undefiled thing, I will fare along the undefiled course.'

Thus, monks, must you train yourselves.

But Subhūti,<sup>2</sup> monks,
the young man of family,
is (already?) faring along the undefiled course."

Thus spoke the Lord. Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on the Analysis of the Undefiled:
The Ninth

---

<sup>1</sup> Araṇa might also be translated as peace and saraṇa as disturbance: the peace that comes from absence of the defilements and the disturbance due to their presence. At MA. v. 32 it is said that Araṇa means free from passion or the defilements, kilesa; cf. AA. i. 220, SA. i. 101, nikkilesa. At Vbh. 19 f. the khandha of feeling is twofold, saraṇa and Araṇa. Saraṇ = sa + raṇa, concomitant with war, stain or defilement. See B.H.S.D. under Araṇa and raṇa. At A. i. 24 Subhūti is chief of abiders in non-defilement or peace, referred to at MA. v. 31 f.

<sup>2</sup> One should not defame, i.e. carry tales to another person.

<sup>3</sup> khīṇa, explained at MA. v. 30 as ākiṇṇa, confused, troubled, and as kiliṭṭha, soiled. It means that one should not say what is detrimental, annoying or improper.

<sup>4</sup> That is, as to its ripening and as to the defilements, MA. v. 31.

<sup>5</sup> That is, thirst, taṇhā, MA. v. 31 which also says that when Subhūti was teaching dhamma he was not interested in the differences among individuals but simply laid down, "This is a wrong course, this the right one."

<sup>6</sup> vibhava here. It should perhaps read bhava as at the end of the next paragraph.

<sup>7</sup> This and the following six words are all words for bowl."

<sup>8</sup> As this phrase is of fairly frequent occurrence in M. and I have throughout translated it thus, I leave it thus here. Here however it clearly means: This is the true word, every other word is false.

<sup>9</sup> MA. v. 32 points out that he was among the Etad Aggas on two counts; and that when he went for alms with Sāriputta, Sāriputta stood at the doors of the houses attaining nirodha (the final meditative stage) while Subhūti attained mettājhāna, the meditation on friendliness. Cf. AA. i. 220, ThagA. i. 20, UdA. 348. See also B.H.S.D. under araṇa where Edgerton very tentatively puts the question of whether araṇa was not originally an adjective with a fem. noun: samāpatti or maitri, Pall mettā.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
4. Vibhaṅga Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
4. The Division on Analysis

140. Discourse on the Analysis of the Elements

Dhātu-Vibhaṅga Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord, walking on tour among the people of Magadha, arrived at Rājagaha and approached the potter, Bhaggava;<sup>1</sup> having approached, he spoke thus to Bhaggava the potter:

"If it is not inconvenient to you, Bhaggava, I would spend one night in your dwelling."

"It is not convenient to me, revered sir. For there is here one gone forth who came before you to stay. But if he allow it, do stay, revered sir, according to your pleasure."

[238] At that time there was a young man of family called Pukkusāti<sup>2</sup> who had gone forth from home into homelessness through faith in the Lord.

He it was that had arrived first at that potter's dwelling.

Then the Lord approached the venerable Pukkusāti having approached, he spoke thus to the venerable Pukkusāti:

"If it is not inconvenient to you, monk,
I will spend a night in the dwelling."

"Spacious,<sup>3</sup> friend,<sup>4</sup> is the potter's dwelling; let the venerable one stay according to his pleasure."

Then the Lord, having entered the potter's dwelling and laid down a spreading of grass to one side, sat down cross-legged, keeping his back erect
and arousing mindfulness in front of him.

And the Lord passed much of that night sitting down.

And the venerable Pukkusāti too spent much of that night sitting down.

Then it occurred to the Lord:

"This young man of respectable family certainly comports himself pleasantly.
Suppose I were to question him?"

And the Lord spoke thus to the venerable Pukkusāti:

"On account of whom have you, monk, gone forth?
Who is your teacher?
Whose dhamma do you profess?"

"There is, friend, the recluse Gotama,
son of the Sakyans,
gone [286] forth from the Sakyan clan;

concerning this Lord Gotama a lovely reputation has gone abroad thus:
He is indeed Lord, perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One, endowed with (right) conduct and knowledge,
well-farer,
knower of the world(s),
matchless charioteer of men to be tamed,
teacher of devas and mankind,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.

On account of this Lord have I gone forth, and this Lord is my teacher;
I profess this Lord's dhamma."

"But where, monk, is this Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
staying now?"

"There is a town called Sāvattthī, friend, in the northern districts;
this Lord, perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One is now staying there."

"Have you, monk, ever seen this Lord?
If you saw him would you know him?"

[239] "No, friend, I have never seen this Lord, so I would not know him if I saw him."

Then it occurred to the Lord:

"This young man of respectable family has gone forth on account of me.
Suppose I were to teach him dhamma?"

And the Lord addressed the venerable Pukkusāti, saying:

I will teach you dhamma, monk; listen carefully, pay attention and I will speak."

"Yes, friend,"
the venerable Pukkusāti answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Monk, this man has six elements, six fields of (sense-)impingement, eighteen mental ranges,<sup>5</sup> four resolves.<sup>6</sup>

Where there is stability,
conceit and boasting do not continue in existence,
and when they do not continue in existence
the sage is said to be at peace.

He<sup>7</sup> should not be slothful in wisdom,
he should guard the truth, cultivate relinquishment,<sup>8</sup> and train himself for peace itself.<sup>9</sup>

This is the exposition of the analysis of the six elements:

[287] Monk, when it is said:
'This man has six elements,'
in reference to what is it said?

To the element of extension,
the liquid element,
the element of radiation,
of motion,
of ākāsa,
of consciousness.

Monk, when it is said,
'This man has six elements,'
it is said in reference to this.

Monk, when it is said:
'This man has six fields of (sense-)impingement,'
in reference to what is it said?

To the field of visual impingement, of auditory impingement, of olfactory impingement, of gustatory impingement,
of tactile impingement, of mental impingement.

Monk, when it is said:
'This man has six fields of (sense-)impingement,'
it is said in reference to this.

Monk, when it is said:
'This man has eighteen mental ranges,'
in reference to what is it said?

Having seen a material shape with the eye, one ranges over the material shape that gives rise to joy, ranges over the material shape that gives rise to sorrow, ranges over the material shape that gives rise to equanimity.

[240] Having heard a sound with the ear,
one ranges over the sound that gives rise to joy, ranges over the sound that gives rise to sorrow, ranges over the sound that gives rise to equanimity.

Having smelt a smell with the nose,
one ranges over the smell that gives rise to joy, ranges over the smell that gives rise to sorrow, ranges over the smell that gives rise to equanimity.

Having savoured a taste with the tongue,
one ranges over the taste that gives rise to joy, ranges over the taste that gives rise to sorrow, ranges over the taste that gives rise to equanimity.

Having felt a touch with the body,
one ranges over the touch that gives rise to joy, ranges over the touch that gives rise to sorrow, ranges over the touch that gives rise to equanimity.

Having cognised a mental state with the mind, one ranges over the mental state that gives rise to joy, ranges over the mental state that gives rise to sorrow, ranges over the mental state that gives rise to equanimity.

Thus there are six ranges for joy, six for sorrow,
six for equanimity.

Monk, when it is said:
'This man has eighteen mental ranges,'
it is said in reference to this.

Monk, when it is said:
'This man has four resolves,'
in reference to what is it said?

To the resolve for wisdom, the resolve for truth,
the resolve for relinquishment, the resolve for calm.

Monk, when it is said
'This man has four resolves,'
it is said in reference to this.

Monk, when it is said:
'He should not be slothful in wisdom,
he should guard the truth,
cultivate relinquishment
and train himself for peace itself,'
in reference to what is it said?

And how, monk, is one not slothful in wisdom?

There are these six elements:
the element of extension,
the liquid element,
the element of radiation,
of motion,
of ākāsa,
of consciousness.

And what, monk, is the element of extension?<sup>10</sup>

The element of extension may be internal, it may be external.

And what, monk, is the internal element of extension?

Whatever is hard, solid, is internal, referable to an individual and derived therefrom,
that is to say:
the hair of the head,
the hair of the body,
nails,
teeth,
skin,
flesh,
sinews,
bones,
marrow of the bones,
kidneys,

heart,
liver,
pleura,
spleen,
lungs,
intestines,
mesentery,
stomach,
excrement,
or whatever other thing is hard, solid, is internal,
referable to an individual or derived therefrom
— this, monk, is called the internal element of extension.

Whatever is the internal element of [288] extension and whatever is the external element of extension, just these are the element of extension.

By means of perfect intuitive wisdom this should be seen as it really is, thus:
This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self.

Having seen this thus as it really is
by means of perfect intuitive wisdom, he disregards the element of extension, he cleanses his mind of the element of extension.

And what, monk, is the liquid element?

The liquid element may be internal,
[241] it may be external.

And what, monk, is the internal liquid element?

Whatever is liquid, fluid, is internal,
referable to an individual
and derived therefrom,
that is to say:

bile,
phlegm,
pus,
blood,
sweat,
fat,
tears,
serum,
saliva,
mucus,
synovial fluid,
urine

or whatever other thing is liquid, fluid, is internal,
referable to an individual
and derived therefrom,
this, monk, is called the internal liquid element.

Whatever is an internal liquid element and whatever is the external liquid element, just these are the liquid element.

By means of perfect intuitive wisdom
this should be seen as it really is, thus:
This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self.

Having seen this thus as it really is
by means of perfect intuitive wisdom, he disregards the liquid element, he cleanses his mind of the liquid element.

And what, monk, is the element of radiation?

The element of radiation may be internal, it may be external.

And what, monk, is the internal element of radiation?

Whatever is heat, warmth, is internal,
referable to an individual
and derived therefrom,
such as that by which one is vitalised and that by which one is consumed, and that by which one is burnt up, and that which one has munched, drunk, eaten and tasted which is properly transformed (in digestion), or whatever other thing is heat, warmth, is internal,
referable to an individual
or derived therefrom,
this, monk, is called the internal element of radiation.

Whatever is an internal element of radiation and whatever is the external element of radiation, just these are the element of radiation.

By means of perfect intuitive wisdom
this should be seen as it really is, thus:
This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self.

Having seen this thus as it really is
by means of perfect intuitive wisdom, he disregards the element of radiation, he cleanses his mind of the element of radiation.

And what, monk, is the element of motion?

The element of motion may be internal, it may be external.

And what, monk, is the internal element of motion?

Whatever is motion, wind, is internal,
referable to an individual
and derived therefrom,
such as winds going upwards, winds going downwards,
winds in the abdomen,
winds in the belly,
winds that shoot across the several limbs, in-breathing,
out-breathing,
or whatever other thing is motion, wind, is internal,
referable to an individual
and derived therefrom,
this, monk, is called the internal element of motion.

Whatever is an internal element of motion and whatever is the external element of motion, just these are the element of motion.

By means of perfect intuitive wisdom
this should be seen as it really is, thus:
This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self.

Having seen this thus as it really is
by means of perfect intuitive wisdom, he disregards the element of motion, he cleanses his mind of the element of motion.

[289] And what, monk, is the element of space?

The element of space may be internal, it may be external.

And what, monk, is the internal [242] element of space?

Whatever is space, spacious, is internal,
referable to an individual
and derived therefrom,
such as the auditory and nasal orifices,
the door of the mouth and that by which one swallows what is munched, drunk, eaten and tasted, and where this remains,
and where it passes out (of the body) lower down, or whatever other thing is space, spacious, is internal,
referable to an individual
and derived therefrom,
this, monk, is called the internal element of space.

Whatever is an internal element of space and whatever is the external element of space, just these are the element of space.

By means of perfect intuitive wisdom
this should be seen as it really is, thus:
This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self.

Having seen this thus as it really is
by means of perfect intuitive wisdom, he disregards the element of space, he cleanses his mind of the element of space.

And when the consciousness that remains is quite pure, quite clean, he knows something by means of that consciousness: he discriminates pleasure and he discriminates pain and he discriminates what is neither painful nor pleasant.

If, monk, because of impingement there arises an experience of pleasure it it is a pleasant feeling.

He, experiencing that pleasant feeling,
comprehends that he is experiencing a pleasant feeling.

On the cessation of the impingement whence comes that experience of pleasure he comprehends:
'The pleasant feeling arisen on account of an impingement experienced as a complementary<sup>11</sup> pleasant experience is stopped, is allayed.'

If, monk, because of impingement there arises an experience of pain it it is a painful feeling.

He, experiencing that painful feeling,
comprehends that he is experiencing a painful feeling.

On the cessation of the impingement
whence comes that experience of pain he comprehends:
'The painful feeling arisen on account of an impingement experienced as a complementary painful experience
is stopped, is allayed.'

If, monk, because of impingement there arises an experience of what is neither painful nor pleasant it is a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant.

He, experiencing that feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant, comprehends that he is experiencing a feeling that is neither painful nor
pleasant.

On the cessation of the impingement whence comes that experience of what is neither painful nor pleasant he comprehends:

'The feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant arisen on account of an impingement experienced as a complementary experience that is neither painful nor
pleasant
is stopped, is allayed.'

Monk, it is like the heat obtained, the light produced
from the contact and friction of two sticks; when the two sticks are separated their complementary heat is stopped, is allayed.

Even so, monk, [290] [243] does a pleasant feeling arise on account of the impingement of an experience of pleasure.

He, experiencing that pleasant feeling,
comprehends that he is experiencing a pleasant feeling.

On the cessation of the impingement
whence comes that experience of pleasure he comprehends:
'The pleasant feeling arisen on account of an impingement experienced as a complementary pleasant experience is stopped, is allayed.'

Even so, monk, does a painful feeling arise on account of the impingement of an experience of pleasure.

He, experiencing that painful feeling,
comprehends that he is experiencing a painful feeling.

On the cessation of the impingement
whence comes that experience of pain he comprehends:
'The painful feeling
arisen on account of an impingement experienced as a complementary painful experience
is stopped, is allayed.'

Even so, monk, does a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant arise on account of the impingement of an experience of what is neither painful nor pleasant.

He, experiencing that feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant, comprehends that he is experiencing a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant.

On the cessation of the impingement whence comes that experience of neither painful nor pleasant feeling he comprehends:

'The feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant arisen on account of an impingement experienced as a complementary experience that is neither painful nor pleasant is stopped, it is allayed.'

And further, the equanimity that remains is quite pure, quite cleansed,
soft and pliable and resplendent.

Monk, it is like a skilled goldsmith or a goldsmith's apprentice preparing a furnace; when he has prepared the furnace he lights the smelting-pot; when he has lit the smelting-pot he takes up the gold with tongs and places it in the smelting-pot;
and then from time to time he blows on it, from time to time he sprinkles water over it, and from time to time he looks at it carefully — that gold becomes clear, pure, cleansed, (the impurities) removed,
free from dross,
soft and pliable and resplendent
so that whatever kind of ornament one requires, a ring or earring or necklace or golden garland, it is suitable for that purpose.

Even so, monk, the equanimity that then remains is quite pure, quite cleansed,
soft and pliable and resplendent.

He comprehends thus:
'If I should focus this equanimity,
purified thus, cleansed thus,
on the plane of infinite ether
and should develop my thought in accordance with that,
then would this equanimity,
supported by this,
nourished by this,
stand firm in me for a very long time.

He comprehends thus:
'If I should focus this equanimity,
purified thus, cleansed thus,
on the plane of infinite consciousness [244] and should develop my thought in accordance with that,
then would this equanimity,
supported by this,
nourished by this,
stand firm in me for a very long time.

He comprehends thus:
'If I should focus this equanimity,
purified thus, cleansed thus,
on the plane of no-thing
and should develop my thought in accordance with that,
then would this equanimity,
supported by this,
nourished by this,
stand firm in me for a very long time.

He comprehends thus:

'If I should focus this equanimity,
purified thus, cleansed thus,
on the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception
and should develop my thought in accordance with that,
then would this equanimity,
supported by this,
nourished by this,
stand firm in me
for a very long time.

He comprehends thus:

'If I should focus this equanimity,
purified thus, cleansed thus,
on the plane of infinite ether
and should develop my thought in accordance with that,
this<sup>12</sup> is constructed.'<sup>13</sup>

He therefore [291] neither constructs nor thinks out<sup>14</sup> for becoming or for de-becoming.<sup>15</sup>

Not constructing, not thinking out for becoming or for de-becoming,
he grasps after nothing in the world;
not grasping, he is not troubled,
being untroubled he himself is individually attained to Nibbāna,
and he comprehends:
'Destroyed is birth, brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.'

He comprehends thus:

'If I should focus this equanimity,
purified thus, cleansed thus,
on the plane of infinite consciousness
and should develop my thought in accordance with that,
this is constructed.'

He therefore neither constructs nor thinks out for becoming or for de-becoming.

Not constructing, not thinking out for becoming or for de-becoming,
he grasps after nothing in the world;
not grasping, he is not troubled,
being untroubled he himself is individually attained to Nibbāna,
and he comprehends:
'Destroyed is birth, brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.'

He comprehends thus:
'If I should focus this equanimity,
purified thus, cleansed thus,
on the plane of no-thing.

He comprehends thus:
'If I should focus this equanimity,
purified thus, cleansed thus,
on the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception
and should develop my thought in accordance with that,
this is constructed.'

He therefore neither constructs nor thinks out for becoming or for de-becoming.

Not constructing, not thinking out for becoming or for de-becoming,
he grasps after nothing in the world;
not grasping, he is not troubled,
being untroubled he himself is individually attained to Nibbāna,
and he comprehends:
'Destroyed is birth, brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so.'

If he experience a pleasant feeling
he comprehends that it is impermanent he comprehends that it is not to be cleaved to he comprehends that it is not an object of enjoyment.

If he experience a painful feeling
he comprehends that it is impermanent
he comprehends that it is not to be cleaved to he comprehends that it is not an object of enjoyment.

If he experience a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
he comprehends that it is impermanent
he comprehends that it is not to be cleaved to he comprehends that it is not an object of enjoyment.

If he experience a pleasant feeling,
then detached from it he experiences it.

If he experience painful feeling
then detached from it he experiences it.

If he experience a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
then detached from it he experiences it.

Experiencing a feeling that is limited by the body,<sup>16</sup> he comprehends that he is experiencing a feeling that is limited by the body.

[245] Experiencing a feeling that is limited by the life-principle he comprehends that he is experiencing a feeling that is limited by the life-principle.

He comprehends that on the breaking up of the body after the life-principle has come to an end all enjoyable experiences here will become cool.<sup>17</sup>

[292] Monk, as an oil-lamp burns on account of the oil and on account of the wick but goes out<sup>18</sup> from lack of fuel if the oil and the wick come to an end and no others are brought, even so, monk,

experiencing a feeling that is limited by the body
he comprehends that he is experiencing a feeling that is limited by the body;
experiencing a feeling that is limited by the life-principle he comprehends that he is experiencing a feeling that is limited by the life-
principle.

He comprehends that on the breaking up of the body after the body has come to an end all enjoyable experiences here will become cool.

He comprehends that
on the breaking up of the body
after the life-principle has come to an end
all enjoyable experiences here will become cool.

Therefore a monk, endowed thus,
is endowed with this highest resolve for wisdom.

For this, monk, is the highest ariyan wisdom, that is to say the knowledge of the complete destruction of anguish.

That freedom of his,
founded on truth,
is unshakable.

For that which is liable to falsity, monk, is falsehood;
that truth which is not liable to falsity is Nibbāna.

Therefore, endowed thus a monk is endowed with this highest resolve for truth.

For this, monk, is the highest Ariyan truth, that is to say Nibbāna that is not liable to falsity.

Verily, his former<sup>19</sup> foolish clingings<sup>20</sup> are ended and done with.

These are got rid of by him,
cut off at the root,
made like a palm-tree stump
that can come to no future growth.

Therefore, endowed thus,
a monk is endowed with this highest resolve for relinquishment.

For this, monk, is the highest Ariyan relinquishment, that is to say the casting away of all clingings.

His former foolish covetousness was passionate desire.

This is got rid of by him,
cut off at the root,
made like a palm-tree stump that can come to no future growth.

His former foolish hostility was malevolence and corruption.

This is got rid of by him,
cut off at the root,
made like a palm-tree stump
that can come to no future growth.

His former foolish ignorance was confusion and corruption.

This is got rid of by him,
cut off at the root,
[246] made like a palm-tree stump
that can come to no future growth.

Therefore, endowed thus,
a monk is endowed with this highest resolve for calm.

For this, monk, is the highest Ariyan calm,
that is to say
the calm in regard to attachment, hatred and confusion.

When it is said, 'One [293] should not be slothful is wisdom,
he should guard the truth,
cultivate relinquishment
and train himself for peace itself,'
it is said in reference to this.

Monk, when it is said,
'Where there is stability,
conceit and boasting do not continue in existence,
and when they do not continue in existence
the sage is said to be at peace,'
in reference to what is it said?

'I am,' monk, this is a supposition.

'This am I' monk, this is a supposition.

'I will be' monk, this is a supposition.

'I will not be' monk, this is a supposition.

'I will be possessed of form' monk, this is a supposition.

'I will be incorporeal' monk, this is a supposition.

'I will be possessed of perception' monk, this is a supposition.

'I will be possessed of neither perception nor non-perception,' this is a supposition.

A supposition, monk, is an ill, a supposition is an imposthume, a supposition is a barb.

Monk, when he has gone beyond all suppositions
the sage is said to be at peace.

But, monk, a sage who is at peace is not born,
does not age,
is not agitated,
does not envy.

As there is nothing by which he can be born, how, monk, not being born could he age?

Not ageing, how could he die?

Not dying, how could he be agitated?

Not being agitated, how could he envy?

When it is said:
'Where there is stability,
conceit and boasting do not continue in existence,
and when they do not continue in existence
the sage is said to be at peace,'
it is said in reference to this.

Do you, monk, remember my analysis in brief<sup>21</sup> of the six elements."

Then the venerable Pukkusāti thought:
"Indeed it is the Teacher that has come to me;
indeed it is the Well-farer that has come to me; indeed it is the Fully Self-Awakened One that has come to me,"
and rising from his seat,

arranging his robe over one shoulder and bowing his head to the Lord's feet,
he spoke thus to the Lord:

"A transgression, revered sir, has overcome me<sup>22</sup> in that foolish, errant and [247] unskilled as I was,
I supposed the Lord could be addressed with the epithet 'friend.'

Revered sir, may the Lord acknowledge my transgression as a transgression for the sake of restraint in the future."

"Indeed, monk, a transgression overcame you in that foolish, errant and unskilled as you were, you supposed I could be addressed with the epithet 'friend.'

But if you, monk, seeing this transgression as a transgression, confess it according to the rule, we acknowledge it for you.
For this is growth, monk, in the discipline for an Ariyan, that whoever, seeing a transgression as a transgression, confesses it according to rule, he comes to restraint in the future."

"Revered sir, may I receive ordination in the Lord's presence?"

"But are you, monk, complete as to bowl and robe?"

"Revered sir, I am not complete as to bowl and robe."

"Monk, Tathāgatas do not ordain anyone not complete as to bowl and robe."

Then the venerable Pukkusāti,
having rejoiced in what the Lord had said,
having given thanks for it,
rising from his seat
greeted the Lord and,

keeping his right side towards him,
departed in order to search for a bowl and robe.

But while he was touring about in search of a bowl and robe, a cow swerved<sup>23</sup> and deprived him of life.

Then a number of monks approached the Lord;
having approached, having greeted the Lord,
they sat down at a respectful distance.
As they were sitting down at a respectful distance,
these monks spoke thus to the Lord:

"That young man of family, Pukkusāti, revered sir, whom the Lord exhorted with an exhortation in brief, has died.<sup>24</sup>
What is his bourn,
what his future state?"

"Clever,<sup>25</sup> monk, was Pukkusāti,
the young man of family;
he followed after dhamma
according to the various parts of dhamma, and he did not annoy me with questionings about dhamma.

Monks, Pukkusāti, the young man of family, by the complete destruction of the five fetters binding to this lower (shore),
is of spontaneous uprising,
one who attains Nibbāna there,
not liable to return from that world."

Discourse on the Analysis of the Elements :
The Tenth

---

<sup>1</sup> Here Bhaggava seems to be the potter's personal name. See M.L.S. ii. 248 (= M. ii. 52).

<sup>2</sup> MA. v. 33 ff. gives a long history of this monk; see D.P.P.N.

<sup>3</sup> ūrunda, which perhaps should be uruddha, giving space for (breathing). MA. v. 47 explains by vivitta, isolated, secluded, and asambādha, not crowded.

<sup>4</sup> āvuso.

<sup>5</sup> As at M. iii. 216. The first three of these headings are also stated and analysed at A. i. 175. but the four Ariyan truths are given there in place of the four resolves.

<sup>6</sup> D. iii. 229.

<sup>7</sup> Perhaps referring to the "man," purisa, of the first heading in this paragraph.

<sup>8</sup> cāga, the giving up of, abandoning or forsaking all the defilements, MA. v. 52; all the clingings, M. iii. 245.

<sup>9</sup> It is, I think a question whether the order of these last two headings should not be reversed to tally with the order of the analysis below which appears to be the more logical sequence. But the commentarial exegesis, MA. v. 51 f. is against this, for it takes the headings as they stand above.

<sup>10</sup> Down to the element of space, see M. i. 421 ff. See also M. i. 185 ff. and M.L.S. i. 231 ff. for notes.

<sup>11</sup> tajja, as at M. i. 190. S. iv. 215, Dhs. 3-6.

<sup>12</sup> "This," etaṃ, appears to refer to "life-span," āyu., so MA. v. 55: "however much this life-span is of 20,000 kappas ... it is not permanent or eternal, it is temporary, liable to deceasing, falling, breaking up and shattering; it is dogged by birth, bestrewn by disease, struck down by death; it is founded on anguish, with no authority, no refuge. ... All these perils are spoken of by the one phrase: 'this is constructed,'" saṅkhatam etaṃ.

<sup>13</sup> saṅkhatam etaṃ. The meaning probably is that, however much one applies equanimity to the various meditative planes and develops thought according to them, still this life-span remains. It is therefore a construction: saṅkhāra (and hence impermanent, cf. M. i. 336, sabbasaṅkhāresu aniccānupassino, translated at M.L.S. i. 400 as: beholding the impermanence of all constructions; and cf. Dhṛ. 277 sabbe saṅkhārā aniccā, impermanent are all the constructions), or it is a construct, saṅkhata; or it is constructed, saṅkhata. The underlying idea is one of activity (see M.L.S. i., Intr., p. xxv), a karmic "effecting" or bringing about, which, in this context above, is a result of the decision the meditator has just taken to focus his equanimity and develop his thought. But, as he immediately perceives, this will only lead to the constructing of new effects in the future. So he stills his mind in order to bring no new constructs into existence. Therefore, following his realisation that saṅkhatam etaṃ, he seeks to go no further with such mental activity as will bear future karmic fruit and n'eva abhisāṅkharoti nābhisañcetaṃ, neither constructs nor thinks out. At M. i. 350 the bhikkhu comprehends of each jhāna, of each brahmavihāra and of each of the first three meditative planes that it is "effected" (or constructed or produced-by past mental activity) and thought out (or planned) and is therefore impermanent (and all that this entails). So that here again it is implied, as above, that the realisation and comprehension of such impermanence is a stepping-stone to further progress on the Way, whereas the lack of realisation is a hindrance or obstacle to such progress.

<sup>14</sup> Now speaking from the height of arahantship.

<sup>15</sup> bhava and vibhava are called growth and decline respectively; they are said to be connected with eternalism and annihilationism, again respectively.

<sup>16</sup> D. i. 46, ii. 128, S. ii. 83, A. ii. 198.

<sup>17</sup> sītībhavissanti. The term sītībhūta, become cool, is often combined with nibbuta, gone out, extinguished. For nibbuta see P.E.D. The fires of rāga

dosa and moha no longer burn in one who is nibbuta sītibhūta; it is in respect of these that a man is extinguished and cooled.

<sup>18</sup> nibkhāyati. Cf. Thīg. 116 padīpass'eva Nibbānaṃ: the going out of the lamp.

<sup>19</sup> Referring to the time when he was a puthujjana, an ordinary average person.

<sup>20</sup> To the khandhā, to the defilements, to the "activities" (abhisāṅkhārā) and to the five strands of sensual pleasure, MA. v. 60.

<sup>21</sup> Bu. here says, MA. v. 60, that the whole teaching of Dhamma by the Buddhas is "in brief"; there is no extended teaching. Even the whole of the Paṭṭhānakathā is in brief. Among the four types of persons (reference appears to be to A. ii. 135, Pug. 41), beginning with the one who could understand Dhamma in a condensed form (ugghāṭitaññū), Pukkusāti was a vipacitaññū (i.e. a "diffuse-learner," to whom Dhamma had to be explained in detail). It was because of this that the Lord spoke the Dhātuvibhaṅgasutta.

<sup>22</sup> The wording is stock, only the transgression, accaya, varies in the different contexts. See P.T.C. under accaya.

<sup>23</sup> bhantaḡāvī, a swerving or staggering cow. MA. v. 62 explains she was rushing after her wandering young calf.

<sup>24</sup> kālam karoti, has done his (karmic) time

<sup>25</sup> Cf. M. ii. 146 for this paragraph.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
4. Vibhaṅga Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
4. The Division on Analysis

141. Discourse on the Analysis of the Truths

Sacca-Vibhaṅga Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Benares in the deer-park
at Isipatana.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"The matchless Wheel of dhamma
set rolling by the Tathāgata,
the perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One

in the deer-park at Isipatana near Benares
cannot be rolled back
by a recluse or brahman
or deva
or Māra
or Brahmā
or by anyone in the world.

That is to say,
it was a proclamation of the four ariyan truths,
a teaching,
laying down,
establishing,
opening up,
analysing,
and making of them plain.

Of what four?

It was a proclamation,
a teaching,
laying down,
establishing,
opening up,
analysing
and making plain
of the ariyan truth of anguish.

It was a proclamation,
a teaching,
laying down,
establishing,
opening up,
analysing

and making plain
of the ariyan truth of the arising of anguish.

It was a proclamation,
a teaching,
laying down,
establishing,
opening up,
analysing
and making plain
of the ariyan truth of the stopping of anguish.

It was a proclamation,
a teaching,
laying down,
establishing,
opening up,
analysing
and making plain
of the ariyan truth of the course
leading to the stopping of anguish.

The matchless Wheel of dhamma} monks,
set rolling by the Tathāgata,
the perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One
in the deer-park at Isipatana
near Benares
cannot be rolled back
by a recluse or brahman
or deva
or Māra
or Brahmā
or by anyone in the world.

That is to say,
it was a proclamation of the four ariyan truths,
a teaching,
laying down,
establishing,
opening up,
analysing,
and making of them plain.

Monks, follow Sāriputta and Moggallāna; monks, associate with Sāriputta and Moggallāna; they are wise monks
who are helpers<sup>1</sup> to Brahma-farers.

Monks, like a mother,
so is Sāriputta;
like a child's foster-mother, so is Moggallāna.

Sāriputta, monks,
trains (one) in the fruit of stream-attainment, Moggallāna in the highest [296] goal.<sup>2</sup> Sāriputta, monks, is able to proclaim,
teach,
lay down,
establish,
open up, analyse
and make plain
the four ariyan truths in full."<sup>3</sup>

Thus spoke the Lord;
and having said this,
the Well-farer rose from his seat
and entered a dwelling-place.

§

Soon after the Lord had departed the venerable Sāriputta addressed the monks who were there,
saying;

"Reverend monks."

"Your reverence,"
these monks answered the venerable Sāriputta in assent.

The venerable Sāriputta spoke thus:

"Your reverences, the matchless Wheel of dhamma
set rolling by the Tathāgata,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One
in the deer-park at Isipatana
near Benares
cannot be rolled back
by a recluse or brahman
or deva
or Māra
or Brahmā
or by anyone in the world.

That is to say,
it was a proclamation of the four ariyan truths,
a teaching,
laying down,
establishing,
opening up,

analysing,
and making of them plain.

Of what four?

It was a proclamation,
a teaching,
laying down,
establishing,
opening up,
analysing
and making plain
of the ariyan truth of anguish.

It was a proclamation,
a teaching,
laying down,
establishing,
opening up,
analysing
and making plain
of the ariyan truth of the arising of anguish.

It was a proclamation,
a teaching,
laying down,
establishing,
opening up,
analysing
and making plain
of the ariyan truth of the stopping of anguish.

It was a proclamation,
a teaching,
laying down,
establishing,

opening up,
analysing
and making plain
of the ariyan truth of the course
leading to the stopping of anguish.

The matchless Wheel of dhamma} monks,
set rolling by the Tathāgata,
the perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One
in the deer-park at Isipatana
near Benares
cannot be rolled back
by a recluse or brahman
or deva
or Māra
or Brahmā
or by anyone in the world.

That is to say,
it was a proclamation of the four ariyan truths,
a teaching,
laying down,
establishing,
opening up,
analysing,
and making of them plain.

§

And what, your reverences, is the ariyan truth of anguish?<sup>4</sup>

Birth is anguish and ageing is anguish
and dying is anguish;
and grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
misery
and despair are anguish.

And not getting what one desires, that too is anguish.

In brief,
the five groups of grasping are anguish.

■

And what, your reverences, is birth?

It is the conception,
the production,
the descent,<sup>5</sup> the rebirth,<sup>6</sup> the coming forth
of various beings
in the various classes of beings,
the appearance of the groups (of grasping),
the acquiring of the sense-bases.

This, your reverences, is called birth.

■

And what, your reverences, is old age?

It is the old age,
decrepitude,
broken teeth,
greying hair,
wrinkly skin,
the dwindling of the life-span, the collapse of the sense-organs of the various beings
in the various classes of beings.

This, your reverences, is called old age.

■

And what, your reverences, is dying?

It is the falling away,
the passing away,
the breaking up,
the disappearance,
the death
and [297] dying,
the action of time,
the breaking up of the groups (of grasping),
the laying down of the body.

This, your reverences, is called dying.

■

And what, your reverences, is grief?

It, your reverences, is the grief,
sorrow,
sorrowfulness,
the inward grief,
the inner pain

of one visited by some kind of calamity or other, smitten by some kind of ill or other.

It is the crying,
the wailing,
the act of crying,
the act of wailing,
the state of crying,
the state of wailing
of one visited by some calamity or other,
smitten by some kind of ill or other.

This, your reverences, is called sorrow.

■

And what, your reverences, is suffering?

It, your reverences, is physical suffering, physical disagreeableness arising from an impingement on the body and experienced as suffering,
as disagreeableness.

This, your reverences, is called suffering.

■

And what, your reverences, is misery?

It, your reverences, is mental suffering,<sup>7</sup> mental disagreeableness arising from an impingement on the mind
and experienced as suffering,
as disagreeableness.

This, your reverences, is called misery.

■

And what, your reverences, is despair?

It, your reverences, is despondency, despair,
the state of despondency, the state of despair
of one visited by some calamity or other,
smitten by some kind of ill or other.

This, your reverences, is called despair.

■

And what, your reverences is meant by
'not getting what one desires,
that too is anguish'?

Your reverences, a wish like this arises in creatures liable to birth:

'O might we be not liable to birth and birth not come to us.'

But this is not to be had for the wishing.

So 'not getting what one desires,
that too is anguish.'

Your reverences, a wish like this arises in creatures liable to ageing:

'O might we be not liable to ageing and ageing not come to us.'

But this is not to be had for the wishing.

So 'not getting what one desires,
that too is anguish.'

Your reverences, a wish like this arises in creatures liable to disease:

'O might we be not liable to disease and disease not come to us.'

But this is not to be had for the wishing.

So 'not getting what one desires,
that too is anguish.'

Your reverences, a wish like this arises in creatures liable to grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
misery
and despair:

'O might we be not liable to grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
misery
and despair
and grief,
sorrow,
suffering,
misery
and despair not come to us.'

But this is not to be had for the wishing.

So 'not getting what one desires,
that too is anguish.'

And what, in brief, your reverences, are the five groups of grasping that are anguish?

These are:

the group of grasping after material shape,
the group of grasping after feeling,
the group of grasping after perception,
the group of grasping after the habitual tendencies,
the group of grasping after consciousness.

Your reverences, these are called in brief the five groups of grasping that are anguish.

[298] Your reverences, this is called the ariyan truth of anguish.

---

And what, your reverences,
is the ariyan truth of the arising of anguish?

Whatever craving is connected with again-becoming, accompanied by delight and attachment, finding delight in this and that, namely the craving for sense-pleasures, the craving for becoming,
the craving for annihilation -
this, your reverences, is called the ariyan truth of the arising of anguish.

---

And what, your reverences,
is the ariyan truth of the stopping of anguish?

Whatever is the stopping, with no attachment remaining,
of that self-same craving, the relinquishment of it, casting aside of it,
release from it,
independence of it,
this, your reverences, is called the ariyan truth of the stopping of anguish.

---

And what, your reverences, is the ariyan truth of the course
leading to the stopping of anguish?

It is this ariyan Eightfold Way itself,
that is to say:
right view,
right aspiration,
right speech,
right action,
right mode of livelihood,
right endeavour,
right mindfulness,
right concentration.

■

And what, your reverences, is right view?

Whatever, your reverences, is knowledge of anguish, knowledge of the arising of anguish, knowledge of the stopping of anguish, knowledge of the course
leading to the stopping of anguish - this, your reverences, is called right view.

■

And what, your reverences, is right aspiration?

Aspiration for renunciation, aspiration for non-malevolence, aspiration for harmlessness -
this, your reverences, is called
right aspiration.

■

And what, your reverences, is right speech?

Refraining from lying speech, refraining from slanderous speech, refraining from harsh speech, refraining from gossip,
this, your reverences, is called
right speech.

■

And what, your reverences, is right action?

Refraining from onslaught on creatures,
refraining from taking what has not been given,

refraining from going wrongly among the sense-pleasures,
this, your reverences, is called
right action.

■

And what, your reverences, is right mode of livelihood?

As to this, your reverences,
a disciple of the ariyans,
getting rid of a wrong mode of livelihood,
makes his living by a right mode of livelihood.

This, your reverences, is called
right mode of livelihood.

■

And what, your reverences, is right endeavour?

As to this, your reverences,
a monk generates desire,
endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives for the non-arising
of evil unskilled states
that have not arisen;

he generates desire,
endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives for the the getting rid of

of evil unskilled states [299] that have arisen;

he generates desire,
endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives for the arising of skilled states that have not arisen

he generates desire,
endeavours,
stirs up energy,
exerts his mind
and strives for the maintenance, preservation,
increase,
maturity,
development
and completion of skilled states that have arisen.

This, your reverences, is called
right endeavour.

■

And what, your reverences, is right mindfulness?

As to this, your reverences,
a monk fares along contemplating the body in the body,
ardent,
clearly conscious (of them),
mindful (of them)
so as to control the covetousness

and dejection
in the world.

He fares along
contemplating the feelings in the feelings,
ardent,
clearly conscious (of them),
mindful (of them)
so as to control the covetousness
and dejection
in the world.

He fares along
contemplating the mind in the mind,
ardent,
clearly conscious (of them),
mindful (of them)
so as to control the covetousness
and dejection
in the world.

He fares along
contemplating the mental states in the mental states,
ardent,
clearly conscious (of them),
mindful (of them)
so as to control the covetousness
and dejection
in the world.

This, your reverences,
is called right mindfulness.

■

And what, your reverences, is right concentration?

As to this, your reverences,
a monk, aloof from the pleasures of the senses,
aloof from unskilled states of mind,
entering into the first meditation
which is accompanied by initial thought
and discursive thought,
is born of aloofness,
and is rapturous and joyful,
abides in it.

And again, your reverences, a monk,
by allaying initial and discursive thought,
his mind subjectively tranquillised
and fixed on one point,
enters on
and abides in
the second meditation
which is devoid of initial and discursive thought,
is born of concentration
and is rapturous and joyful.

And again, your reverences, a monk,
by the fading out of rapture,
dwells with equanimity,
attentive and clearly conscious,
and experiences in his person
that joy of which the ariyans say:
'Joyful lives he who has equanimity and is mindful,'
and he enters on
and abides in
the third meditation.

And again, your reverences, a monk
by getting rid of joy,
by getting rid of anguish,
by the going down of his former pleasures and sorrows,

enters on
and abides in
the fourth meditation
which has neither anguish nor joy,
and which is entirely purified
by equanimity and mindfulness.

This, your reverences, is called
right concentration.

This, your reverences, is called the ariyan truth of the course leading to the stopping of anguish.

Your reverences, the matchless Wheel of dhamma set rolling by the Tathāāgata,
the perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One
in the deer-park at Isipatana
near Benares
cannot be rolled back
by a recluse or brahman
or deva
or Māra
or Brahmā
or by anyone in the world.

That is to say,
it was a proclamation
a teaching,
laying down,
establishing,
opening up,
analysing,
and making plain
of these four ariyan truths."

Thus spoke the venerable Sāriputta.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the venerable Sāriputta had said.

Discourse on the Analysis of the Truths:
The Eleventh

---

<sup>1</sup> anuggāhakā. At S. iii. 5, v. 162 Sāriputta alone is so spoken of; translated at K.S. as "patron." SA. ii. 256 instances two forms of help, anuggaha, help with material things and help with dhamma. At Vin. iv. 325 "should neither help," n'eva anuggaṇheyya, is defined to mean: "should neither herself help (her pupil) with the recitation, interrogation, exhortation and instruction." This therefore must be regarded as help with dhamma. It also appears that when anuggaṇhāti is used in relation to the attitude of a more experienced member of the Order to a less experienced one, it carries a technical or semi-technical sense. See P.T.C. under anuggaṇhāti for further references.

<sup>2</sup> uttamattha, i.e. arahantship. It seems that Sāriputta expends himself on newly ordained monks rather than on those he knows to be on the higher ways.

<sup>3</sup> This is Sāriputta's aspect as dhammasenāpati, Captain or General of dhamma, next to the Buddha in power to roll on the dhamma-wheel.

<sup>4</sup> The remainder of this Discourse is found in the Mahā Satipaṭṭhana Suttanta (D. Sta. 22) from D. ii. 305-313, i.e. to the end of the ariyan truth of the course leading to the stopping of anguish. The first portion of the D.'s Mahā Satipaṭṭhana Suttanta is found in M. Sta. 10, the Satipaṭṭhana Sutta. See M.L.S. i, Intr., p. xiv. Also cf. M. i. 49 f., S. ii. 3.

<sup>5</sup> I.e. into a womb.

<sup>6</sup> nibbatti, not at M. i. 49.

<sup>7</sup> cetasikam dukkham is omitted, probably in error, in Chalmers' text, but occurs at D. ii. 306.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
4. Vibhaṅga Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
4. The Division on Analysis

142. Discourse on the Analysis of Offerings

Dakkhiṇa-Vibhaṅga Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying among the Sakyans in Nigrodha's monastery near Kapilavatthu.

Then Mahā Pajāpatī<sup>1</sup> the Gotamid,<sup>2</sup> bringing a pair of new cloths,<sup>3</sup>
approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
she sat down at a respectful distance.

As she was sitting down at a respectful distance,
Mahā Pajāpatī the Gotamid spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, this pair of new cloths has been cut out by me
and woven by me

specially for the Lord;
revered sir, may the Lord
out of compassion
accept it from me."

When this had been said,
the Lord spoke thus to Mahā Pajāpatī the Gotamid:

"Give it to the Order,<sup>4</sup> Gotami.

If you give it to the Order
I will be honoured
and the Order too."

And a second time Mahā Pajāpatī the Gotamid spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, this pair of new cloths
has been cut out by me
and woven by me
specially for the Lord;
revered sir, may the Lord
out of compassion
accept it from me."

And a second time,
the Lord spoke thus to Mahā Pajāpatī the Gotamid:

"Give it to the Order, Gotami.

If you give it to the Order
I will be honoured
and the Order too."

And a third time<sup>5</sup> Mahā Pajāpatī the Gotamid spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, this pair of new cloths
has been cut out by me

and woven by me
specially for the Lord;
revered sir, may the Lord
out of compassion
accept it from me."

And a third time,
the Lord spoke thus to Mahā Pajāpatī the Gotamid:

"Give it to the Order, Gotami.

If you give it to the Order
I will be honoured
and the Order too."

When this had been said,
the venerable Ānanda, spoke thus to the Lord:

[301] "Revered sir, let the Lord accept the Gotamid Mahā Pajāpatī's new pair of cloths.<sup>6</sup>

Revered sir, Mahā Pajāpatī the Gotamid has been of much service to the Lord.<sup>7</sup>

She is his maternal aunt, the one who brought him up,<sup>8</sup> who looked after him<sup>9</sup> and gave him milk, for when the Lord's own mother passed away she suckled him.<sup>10</sup>

And, revered sir,
the Lord has been of much service to Mahā Pajāpatī the Gotamid.

Revered sir, it is due to the Lord
that Mahā Pajāpatī the Gotamid has gone to the Awakened One for refuge, has gone to dhamma for refuge, has gone to the Order for refuge.

Revered sir, it is due to the Lord,
that Mahā Pajāpatī the Gotamid
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
refrains from taking what has not been given,
refrains from going wrongly among the sense-pleasures,
refrains from lying speech, refrains from occasions of sloth induced by intoxicants.

Revered sir, it is due to the Lord that Mahā Pajāpatī the Gotamid is possessed of unwavering confidence in the Awakened One, is possessed of unwavering confidence in dhamma, is possessed of unwavering confidence in the Order, is possessed of the moral habits pleasing to the ariyans.

Revered sir, it is due to the Lord that Mahā Pajāpatī is not doubtful about anguish,
is not doubtful about the origin of anguish,
is not doubtful about the stopping of anguish, is not doubtful about the course leading to the stopping of anguish.

So, revered sir,
the Lord has been of much service to Mahā Pajāpatī the Gotamid."

"That is so, Ānanda,
that is so, Ānanda.

And if it is due to a person<sup>11</sup> that some (other) person<sup>12</sup> goes to the Awakened One for refuge, to dhamma for refuge, to the Order for refuge,
I say of this person, Ānanda,
that there is no proper requital

in regard to that person,
that is to say as regards greeting,
rising up for,
saluting with joined palms,
doing what is suitable
(to do for him),
and as regards procuring him gifts
of the requisites
of robes,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick.

If it is due to a person
that some (other) person
refrains from onslaught on creatures,
from taking what [302] has not been given,
from going wrongly among sense-pleasures,
from lying speech,
from occasions of sloth induced by intoxicants,
I say of this person, Ānanda,
that there is no proper requital
in regard to that person,
that is to say as regards greeting,
rising up for,
saluting with joined palms,
doing what is suitable
(to do for him),
and as regards procuring him gifts
of the requisites
of robes,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick.

If it is due to a person
that some (other) person
is possessed of unwavering confidence in the Awakened One, is possessed of unwavering confidence in the dhamma is possessed of unwavering confidence in the the Order and of the moral habits pleasing to the ariyans,
I say of this person, Ānanda,
that there is no proper requital
in regard to that person,
that is to say as regards greeting,
rising up for,
saluting with joined palms,
doing what is suitable
(to do for him),
and as regards procuring him gifts
of the requisites
of robes,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick.

If it is due to a person
that some (other) person

is not doubtful about anguish,
is not doubtful about the origin of anguish,
is not doubtful about the stopping of anguish, is not doubtful about the course leading to the stopping of anguish is not doubtful about anguish,
I say of this person, Ānanda,
that there is no proper requital
in regard to that person,
that is to say as regards greeting,
rising up for,
saluting with joined palms,
doing what is suitable

(to do for him),
and as regards procuring him gifts
of the requisites
of robes,
almsfood,
lodgings
and medicines for the sick.

Now, Ānanda, there are these fourteen offerings graded as to individuals.<sup>13</sup>

One gives a gift
to a Tathāgata,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One - this is the first offering graded as to individuals.

One gives a gift to one enlightened for and by himself alone<sup>14</sup> - this is the second offering graded as to individuals.

One gives a gift
to a Tathāgata's disciple who is one perfected -
this is the third offering graded as to individuals.

One gives a gift
to one faring along for the realisation of the fruit of perfection - this is the fourth offering graded as to individuals.

One gives a gift
to a non-returner -
this is the fifth offering offering graded as to individuals.

One gives a gift to one faring along for the realisation of the fruit of non-returning - this is the sixth offering graded as to individuals.

One gives a gift
to a once-returner -
this is the seventh offering graded as to individuals.

One gives a gift to one faring along for the realisation of the fruit of once-returning - this is the eighth offering graded as to individuals.

One gives a gift
to a stream-attainer - this is the ninth offering graded as to individuals.

One gives a gift
to one faring along for the realisation of the fruit of stream-attainment - this is the tenth offering graded as to individuals.

One gives a gift to one who is beyond and without attachment to sense-pleasures<sup>15</sup> - this is the eleventh offering graded as to individuals.

One gives a gift
to an ordinary person of moral habit - this is the twelfth offering graded as to individuals.

One gives a gift
to an ordinary person of poor moral habit - this is the thirteenth offering graded as to individuals.

One gives a gift
to an animal -
this is the fourteenth offering graded as to individuals.

[303] As to this, Ānanda, when a gift has been given

to an animal,
it is expected that the offering (yields) a hundredfold.<sup>16</sup>

when a gift has been given
to an ordinary person of poor moral habit, it is to be expected that the offering (yields) a thousandfold.

When a gift has been given
to an ordinary person of moral habit, it is to be expected that the offering (yields) a hundred thousandfold.

When a gift<sup>17</sup> has been given to one who is beyond and without attachment to sense-pleasures, it is to be expected that the offering (yields) a hundred thousandfold of crores.

When a gift has been given to one faring along for the realisation of the fruit of stream-attainment,<sup>18</sup> it is to be expected that the offering (yields) what is incalculable and immeasurable.

So what can be said of the stream-attainer?

What can be said of the one faring along for the realisation of the fruit of once-returning?

What can be said of the once-returner?

What can be said of one faring along for the realisation of the fruit of nonreturning?

What can be said of the non-returner?

What can be said of one faring along for the realisation of the fruit of perfection?

What can be said of one perfected?

What can be said of a Tathāgata's disciple who is one perfected?

What can be said of one enlightened for and by himself alone?

What can be said of a Tathāgata, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One?

---

And there are these seven kinds of offerings to the Order, Ānanda:

One gives a gift
to both Orders
with the Awakened One at the head<sup>19</sup> - this is the first offering to the Order.<sup>20</sup>

One gives a gift
to both Orders
after the Awakened One has attained final nibbāna<sup>21</sup> - this is the second offering to the Order.

One gives a gift to the Order of monks - this is the third offering to the Order.

One gives a gift to the Order of nuns - this is the fourth offering to the Order.

One gives a gift,
saying,
'May so many monks and nuns be specified for me by the Order' - this is the fifth offering to the Order.

One [304] gives a gift, saying:

'May so many monks be specified for me by the Order' - this is the sixth offering to the Order.

One gives a gift, saying,

'May so many nuns be specified for me by the Order' - this is the seventh offering to the Order.

---

But, Ānanda, in the distant future there will be those of the ariyan clan,<sup>22</sup> the yellow robes around their necks,<sup>23</sup> who will be of bad morality
and evil character;
and a gift will be given to the Order specially for these of bad morality.

But when I, Ānanda, say that an offering to the Order is incalculable
and immeasurable
I by no means say that a gift graded as to individuals is of greater fruit than an offering to the Order.

---

There are these four purifications of offerings,<sup>24</sup> Ānanda.

What four?

There is, Ānanda,
the offering purified by the giver
but not by the recipient.

There is, Ānanda,
the offering purified by the recipient but not by the giver.

There is, Ānanda,
the offering purified
neither by the giver
nor the recipient.

There is, Ānanda,
the offering purified
both by the giver
and the recipient.

---

And what offering, Ānanda, is purified by the giver
but not by the recipient?

As to this, Ānanda,
the giver is of moral habit
and lovely character,
the recipients are of poor morality and of evil character.

It is thus, Ānanda,
that an offering is purified by the giver

but not by the recipient.

■

And what offering, Ānanda, is purified by the recipient
but not by the giver?

As to this, Ānanda,
the giver is of poor morality
and evil character,
the recipients are of moral habit
and lovely character.

It is thus, Ānanda,
that an offering is purified by the recipient but not by the giver.

■

And what offering, Ānanda, is purified neither by the giver
nor the recipient?

As to this, Ānanda,
the giver is of poor morality
and evil character
and the recipients are of poor morality
and evil character.

It is thus, Ānanda,
that an offering is purified neither by the giver nor the recipient.

■

And what offering, Ānanda, is purified both by the giver
and the recipient?

As to this, Ānanda,
the giver is of moral habit
and lovely character
and the recipients are of moral habit
and lovely character.

It is thus, Ānanda,
that an offering is purified both by the giver
and the recipient.

These, Ānanda, are the four purifications in offerings."

Thus spoke the Lord;
the Well-farer having spoken thus,
the Teacher further said:

[305] Whoever, moral in habit, gives to the poor in moral habit
A gift rightfully acquired, the mind well pleased,<sup>25</sup>
Firmly believing in the rich fruit of kamma -
This is an offering purified by the giver.

Whoever, poor in moral habit, gives to those of moral habit
A gift unrightfully acquired, the mind not pleased,
Not believing in the rich fruit of kamma -
This is an offering purified by the recipient.

Whoever, poor in moral habit, gives to the poor in moral habit
A gift unrightfully acquired, the mind not pleased,
Not believing in the rich fruit of kamma -
This is an offering purified by neither.

Whoever, moral in habit, gives to those of moral habit
A gift rightfully acquired, the mind well pleased,

Firmly believing in the rich fruit of kamma -
I assert this gift to be of abundant fruit.

Whoever, without attachment,<sup>26</sup> gives to those without attachment
A gift rightfully acquired, the mind well pleased,
Firmly believing in the rich fruit of kamma -
I assert this gift to be a gift abundant in gain.

Discourse on the Analysis of Offerings:
The Twelfth

Division on Analysis:
The Fourth

---

<sup>1</sup> At A. i. 25 called foremost of nuns of long experience. Her verses are at Thīg. 167-162. The younger sister of Mahāmāyā, Gotama's mother, she attained arahantship soon after her ordination, ThigA. 141. The story of her ordination, with a number of Sakyan ladies, is given at Vin. ii. 253, A. iv. 274.

<sup>2</sup> Her family name.

<sup>3</sup> MA. v. 66 explains she thought that as she had not given Gotama anything, not even cakes or fruit, in the 29 years he had led a household life she would now give him an outer cloak and a robe, but only what was made by hand would satisfy her. But sāmaṃ vāyitaṃ, according to MA. v. 66, does not mean woven by her own hand, but that every day, surrounded by a group of foster-mothers, she went to the weaving place for women artisans and, taking the movable part of her loom, worked there.

<sup>4</sup> As at Miln. 240, though there she was giving cloths for the rains.

<sup>5</sup> She was much disappointed; but Gotama, according to MA. v. 67, was acting out of compassion, for what is given to an Order is of great fruit, and a gift given both to him and the Order will twice arouse the three thoughts connected with giving.

<sup>6</sup> Ānanda knew there was no gift higher than one made to the Teacher.

<sup>7</sup> This description of Mahā Pajāpati (except for the word bahūpakāra, of much service) is also ascribed to Ānanda at Vin. ii. 289.

<sup>8</sup> Making him do things with his hands and feet.

<sup>9</sup> Who, two or three times a day, washed him and gave him to eat and to drink, MA. v. 69.

<sup>10</sup> In preference to her own son, Nanda, whom she gave to foster-mothers.

<sup>11</sup> A teacher, ācariya. The behaviour of pupils and teachers towards one another is given at Vin. i. 44 ff.

<sup>12</sup> A pupil, antevāsika, MA. v. 70.

<sup>13</sup> pāṭipuggalikā dakkhiṇā, the worth and merit of the offerings are reckoned according to the worth and merit of the recipient.

<sup>14</sup> paccekabuddha; he does not teach others.

<sup>15</sup> bāhirake kāmesu vītarāge, of which MA. v. 71 says kammavādikiriyavādin hi lokiyapañcabhiññe, in regard to the five mundane super-knowledges he is a speaker on the deed and on the efficacy of the deed.

<sup>16</sup> A hundred advantages, according to MA. v. 71; cf. A. iii. 42.

<sup>17</sup> From here to "So what can be said of a stream-attainer?" is quoted at MA. i. 187 where this Discourse is called Dakkhiṇāvisuddhisutta.

<sup>18</sup> MA. v. 72 says even a lay-follower gone to the three Refuges is called one faring along for the fruit of stream-attainment.

<sup>19</sup> Or Buddhapamukhe may mean with the Buddha facing them or before' them. For MA. v. 73 says "on one side is the Order of monks, on the other the Order of nuns, and the Teacher is sitting in the middle."

<sup>20</sup> This explains why, if Mahā Pajāpatī gives a gift to the Order, the Lord will be honoured as well as the Order. This is an offering unequalled by any other, and neither the second nor any other reaches this highest offering, MA. v. 73.

<sup>21</sup> parinibbute. Bu. explains that an image is placed on a chair before both Orders, and having given everything first of all to the Teacher, it is then to be given to both Orders.

<sup>22</sup> gotrabhū, see G.S. iv. 247. Defined at Pug. 12, 13.

<sup>23</sup> kāsāvakaṇṭha, as at Dhp. 307 = Iti. 43.

<sup>24</sup> Cf. A. ii. 80.

<sup>25</sup> I.e. with the Teaching. Miln. 258 quotes this verse and mentions this Sutta by name.

<sup>26</sup> MA. v. 77 says this means a non-returner here, for an arahant is wholly without attachment, ekantavītarāga, therefore a gift given by an arahant to an arahant is the chief of gifts. Because of his being without desire or attachment, a deed done by an arahant is neither skilled nor unskilled but remains in the position of its doing.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
5. Saḷāyatana Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
5. The Division of the Sixfold Sense(-field)

143. Discourse on an Exhortation to Anāthapiṇḍika

Anāthapiṇḍik'ovāda Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Now at that time the householder Anāthapiṇḍika was a sick man,
in pain,
grievously ill.

And the householder Anāthapiṇḍika summoned a certain man and said to him:

"Come you, my good man,
approach the Lord;
having approached,

in my name salute the Lord's feet with your head and say to him:

'Revered sir, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika is a sick man,
in pain,
grievously ill;
he salutes the Lord's feet with his head.'

And then approach the venerable Sāriputta;
having approached,
in my name salute the venerable Sāriputta's feet with your head
and say to him:

'Revered sir, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika is a sick man,
in pain,
grievously ill;
he salutes the venerable Sāriputta's feet with his head.'

And then say:

'Indeed, it would be good, revered sir,
if the venerable Sāriputta,
out of compassion,
would approach the dwelling of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika.'

When that man had answered the householder Anāthapiṇḍika in assent,
saying,

"Very well, reverend sir,"<sup>1</sup>
he approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance
that man spoke thus to the Lord:

'Revered sir, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika is a sick man,
in pain,

grievously ill;
he salutes the Lord's feet with his head.'

And he then approached the venerable Sāriputta;
having approached
and greeted the venerable Sāriputta,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance that man spoke thus to the venerable Sāriputta:

"Revered sir, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika is a sick man,
in pain,
grievously ill;
he salutes the venerable Sāriputta's feet with his head and speaks to him thus:

'Indeed, it would be good, revered sir,
if the venerable Sāriputta,
out of compassion,
would approach the dwelling of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika.'

The venerable Sāriputta consented by becoming silent.

Then [310] the venerable Sāriputta clothed himself and,
taking his bowl and robe,
approached the dwelling of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika with the venerable Ānanda as his attendant;
having approached,
he sat down on the appointed seat.

As he was sitting down on the appointed seat the venerable Sāriputta spoke thus to the householder Anāthapiṇḍika:

"I hope that you, householder, are getting better,
I hope you are keeping going,

I hope the painful feelings are lessening,
not increasing,
that a lessening in them is apparent,
not an increase?"

"I am not getting better, revered Sāriputta, I am not keeping going;
my painful feelings are increasing,
not lessening;
an increase in them is apparent,
not a lessening.

Revered Sāriputta<sup>2</sup> as a strong man
might cleave one's head
with a sharp-edged sword,
even so, revered Sāriputta,
do exceedingly loud winds rend my head.

I am not better, revered Sāriputta,
I am not keeping going;
my grievously painful feelings are increasing,
not lessening;
an increase in them is apparent,
not a lessening.

As, revered Sāriputta, a strong man might clamp a turban on one's head
with a tight leather strap,
even so, revered Sāriputta,
do I have very bad headaches.

I am not better, revered Sāriputta,
I am not keeping going;
my grievously painful feelings are increasing,
not lessening;

an increase in them is apparent,
not a lessening.

As, revered Sāriputta,
a skilled cattle-butcher
or his apprentice
might cut through the stomach
with a sharp butcher's knife,
even so, revered Sāriputta,
do very strong winds cut through my stomach.

I am not better, revered Sāriputta,
I am not keeping going;
my grievously painful feelings are increasing,
not lessening;
an increase in them is apparent,
not a lessening.

As, revered Sāriputta,
two strong men,
having taken hold of a weaker man by his limbs,
might set fire to him,
might make him sizzle up over a charcoal pit,
even so, revered Sāriputta,
there is a fierce heat in my body.

I am not better, revered Sāriputta,
I am not keeping going;
my grievously painful feelings are increasing,
not lessening;
an increase in them is apparent,
not a lessening.

"Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after vision and so will have no consciousness dependent on vision.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

"Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after hearing and so will have no consciousness dependent on hearing.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

"Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after smelling and so will have no consciousness dependent on smelling.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

"Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after tasting and so will have no consciousness dependent on tasting.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

"Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after body and so will have no consciousness dependent on body.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

"Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after mind and so will have no consciousness dependent on mind.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

---

"Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after material shapes and so will have no consciousness dependent on material shapes.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

"Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after sounds and so will have no consciousness dependent on sounds.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

"Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after smells and so will have no consciousness dependent on smells.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

"Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after tastes and so will have no consciousness dependent on tastes.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

"Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after touches and so will have no consciousness dependent on touches.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

"Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after mental objects and so will have no consciousness dependent on mental objects.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

---

[311] Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after visual consciousness and so will have no consciousness dependent on visual consciousness.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after auditory consciousness and so will have no consciousness dependent on auditory consciousness.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after olfactory consciousness and so will have no consciousness dependent on olfactory consciousness.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after gustatory consciousness and so will have no consciousness dependent on gustatory consciousness.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after bodily consciousness and so will have no consciousness dependent on bodily consciousness.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after mental consciousness and so will have no consciousness dependent on mental consciousness.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

---

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after visual impact and so will have no consciousness dependent on visual impact.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after auditory impact and so will have no consciousness dependent on auditory impact.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:

(you must think),

'I will not grasp after olfactory impact and so will have no consciousness dependent on olfactory impact.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after gustatory impact and so will have no consciousness dependent on gustatory impact.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after bodily impact and so will have no consciousness dependent on bodily impact.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after mental impact and so will have no consciousness dependent on mental impact.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

---

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after feeling born of visual impact and so will have no consciousness dependent on feeling born of visual impact.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after feeling born of auditory impact and so will have no consciousness dependent on feeling born of auditory impact.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after feeling born of olfactory impact and so will have no consciousness dependent on feeling born of olfactory impact.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after feeling born of gustatory impact and so will have no consciousness dependent on feeling born of gustatory
impact.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after feeling born of bodily impact and so will have no consciousness dependent on feeling born of bodily impact.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after feeling born of mental impact and so will have no consciousness dependent on feeling born of mental
impact.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

---

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after the element of extension and so will have no consciousness dependent on the element of extension.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after the liquid element and so will have no consciousness dependent on the liquid element.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after the element of radiation and so will have no consciousness dependent on the element of radiation.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after the element of motion and so will have no consciousness dependent on the element of motion.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after the element of space and so will have no consciousness dependent on the element of space.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after the element of consciousness and so will have no consciousness dependent on the element of
consciousness.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

---

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after material shape and so will have no consciousness dependent on material shape.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after feeling [312] and so will have no consciousness dependent on feeling.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after perception and so will have no consciousness dependent on perception.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after the habitual tendencies and so will have no consciousness dependent on the habitual tendencies.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after consciousness and so will have no consciousness dependent on consciousness.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

---

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after the plane of infinite ether and so will have no consciousness dependent on the plane of infinite ether.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after the plane of infinite consciousness and so will have no consciousness dependent on the plane of infinite

consciousness.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after the plane of no-thing and so will have no consciousness dependent on the plane of no-thing.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception and so will have no consciousness dependent on the plane of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

---

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after this world and so will have no consciousness dependent on this world.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

■

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after a world beyond and so will have no consciousness dependent on a world beyond.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder.

---

Wherefore you, householder,
must train yourself thus:
(you must think),

'I will not grasp after that which is here seen,
heard,
sensed,
cognised,
sought after,
pondered over with the mind,
and so will have no consciousness dependent on that which is here seen,
heard,
sensed,
cognised,
sought after,
pondered over with the mind.'

This is how you must train yourself, householder."

When this had been said, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika cried and shed tears.

Then the venerable Ānanda spoke thus to the householder Anāthapiṇḍika:

"Householder, are you holding on or are you sinking, householder?"

"I, revered Ānanda, am not holding on, I am sinking."<sup>3</sup>

Although the Teacher and monks who were developing their minds<sup>4</sup> visited [313] me for a long time, I have never yet heard reasoned talk such as this."

"Reasoned talk such as this, householder, does not (usually) occur for householders clad in white."<sup>5</sup>

It is for those that have gone forth, householder, that reasoned talk such as this (usually) occurs."

"Well then, revered Sāriputta, let there occur reasoned talk such as this for householders clad in white.

There are, revered Sāriputta, young men of family with but little dust in their eyes who, not hearing dhamma, are declining, but they could be learners of dhamma"<sup>6</sup>

And when the venerable Sāriputta
and the venerable Ānanda had exhorted the householder Anāthapiṇḍika with this exhortation,
they rose from their seats and departed.

Soon after the venerable Sāriputta and the venerable Ānanda, had departed, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika
at the breaking up of the body after dying arose in the Tusita group (of devas).

And when the night was far spent the young deva<sup>7</sup> Anāthapiṇḍika, having illumined the whole of the Jeta Grove
with his radiant beauty, approached the Lord;<sup>8</sup>
having approached and greeted the Lord,
he stood at a respectful distance.

As he was standing at a respectful distance, the young deva Anāthapiṇḍika addressed the Lord in verses:

"This<sup>9</sup> friendly Jeta Grove frequented by the Order of seers,<sup>10</sup> Dwelt in by the King under dhamma, is the generator of my joy.
[314] Deed,<sup>11</sup> knowledge,<sup>12</sup> and dhamma,<sup>13</sup> the highest moral life<sup>14</sup> -
By these are mortals purified,<sup>15</sup> not by clan nor wealth.
Accordingly the wise man, beholding his own goal,
Seeking dhamma<sup>16</sup> judiciously, is thus purified therein.<sup>17</sup>
As Sāriputta in wisdom, in morality and calm,<sup>18</sup>
So let whatever monk has gone beyond be excellent in these."

Thus spoke the young deva Anāthapiṇḍika.

The Lord was approving.

And the young deva Anāthapiṇḍika thought:

"The Lord approves of me,"
and having greeted the Lord,
then and there he vanished
keeping his right side towards him.

Then the Lord
towards the end of that night
addressed the monks,
saying:

"Monks, when this night was far spent a certain young deva, having illumined the whole of the Jeta Grove
with his radiant beauty,
approached me;
having approached and greeted me,
he stood at a respectful distance.

As he was standing at a respectful distance, this young deva addressed me in verses:

"This friendly Jeta Grove frequented by the Order of seers, Dwelt in by the King under dhamma, is the generator of my joy.
Deed, knowledge, and dhamma, the highest moral life -
By these are mortals purified, not by clan nor wealth.
Accordingly the wise man, beholding his own goal,
Seeking dhamma judiciously, is thus purified therein.
As Sāriputta in wisdom, in morality and calm,
So let whatever monk has gone beyond be excellent in these."

Thus spoke that young deva, monks.

Thinking,
'The Lord approves of me,'
and having greeted me,

then and there he vanished
keeping his right side towards me."

When this had been said,
the venerable Ānanda, spoke thus to the Lord:

"Now, revered sir,
could that have been the young deva Anāthapiṇḍika?

Revered sir, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika had unwavering confidence in the venerable Sāriputta."

[315] "It is good,
it is good, Ānanda.

All that could be obtained by reasoning, Ānanda, has been obtained by you.

Ānanda, that young deva was Anāthapiṇḍika, no other."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the venerable Ānanda rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on an Exhortation to Anāthapiṇḍika:
The First

---

<sup>1</sup> bhante.

<sup>2</sup> As at M. ii. 192-193.

<sup>3</sup> It seems necessary here to omit the na of Chalmers' text. For Anāthapiṇḍika was on the point of death and already failing or sinking. Otherwise one could translate, "I am not holding on (but) I am not sinking." Or as, "No, Ānanda, I am holding on, I am not sinking." But this appears to be against the context and against grammatical usage, for the plain negative answer, our "No," is never expressed by the word na, not.

<sup>4</sup> manobhāvanīyo bhikkhū. Cf. manobhāvanīyo bhikkhu. at A. iii. 317, Vv. 34. 13; and the same expression, in the genitive plural, at A. v. 55, S. iii. 1, which SA. iii. 249-250 explains by mana-vaḍḍhanaka. It is possible that bhikkhū in the above M. passage should read bhikkhu, the reference then being to Sāriputta.

<sup>5</sup> This should not be taken to point to any esoteric element in the giving of the Teaching. Many passages could be adduced to show it was open to aṅgī who wanted to hear it; see especially D. ii. 100 and S. iv. 314-316. But as MA. v. 80 says, talk on giving was (usually) addressed to householders. This is what they wanted to hear, so why should they receive a talk that did not please them? Paṭibhāti is a semi-technical term; it might be translated here as "vouchsafe": a talk such as this is not (usually) vouchsafed (by monks) for householders: because it is not appropriate, since their mental development is not as a rule sufficiently advanced for them to appreciate it.

<sup>6</sup> As at M. i. 168, Vin. i. 5, where these words form part of Brahmā Sahampati's plea to the Buddha to teach dhamma. Brahmā however says that there are beings, satta, with but little dust in their eyes, instead of "young men of family," kulaputtā; but it was of these that Anāthapiṇḍika was thinking.

<sup>7</sup> I think devaputta may sometimes be a young or new deva, one who has just become a deva.

<sup>8</sup> MA. v. 80 says he wanted to speak praise of "my Jeta Grove," the Order of monks, the Tathāgata, the ariyan Way, and Sāriputta.

<sup>9</sup> As at S. i. 33. See notes at K.S. i. 46.

<sup>10</sup> MA. v, 81 paraphrases "seers," isi, by monks, bhikkhu.

<sup>11</sup> "Here kamma is volition (striving) for the Way," maggacetanā, MA. v. 81. On cetanā as kamma see M. i. 301, A. iii. 415.

<sup>12</sup> vijjā is extra-sensory knowledge of the Way, maggapaññā, or it is right understanding and purpose (or thought), MA. v. 81.

<sup>13</sup> The dhamma belonging to concentration, samādhi-pakkhadhamma. It therefore seems as if dhamma here, as sometimes elsewhere, is being used instead of citta or samādhi to represent the middle one of the three branches of the training: sīla, samādhi (or, citta), paññā. Or it means, as recognised at MA. v. 81, (right) endeavour, mindfulness and concentration.

<sup>14</sup> "The life of one established in moral conduct is the highest," Or, sīla is (right) speech, action and mode of livelihood, MA. v. 81.

<sup>15</sup> "Selves are purified by this eightfold Way," according to MA. v. 81 which, in its exegesis on vijjā, dhamma and sīla, has presented the factors of the Way.

<sup>16</sup> Either the dhamma belonging to concentration, or the dhamma of the five khandha on which the teaching of the four truths of anguish centres.

<sup>17</sup> In this ariyan Way, or in these four truths, MA. v. 81.

<sup>18</sup> "is the best," MA. v, 81.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
5. Saḷāyatana Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
5. The Division of the Sixfold Sense(-field)

144. Discourse on an Exhortation to Channa

Chann'ovāda Sutta

---

Thus have I heard:

At one time<sup>1</sup> the Lord was staying near Rājagaha
in the Bamboo Grove,
at the Squirrels' Feeding-place.

Now at that time the venerable Sāriputta and the venerable Cunda, the Great and the venerable Channa were staying on Mount Vulture Peak.

At that time the venerable Channa was a sick man,
in pain,
grievously ill.

And the venerable Sāriputta,
emerging from solitary meditation towards evening,

approached the venerable Cunda the Great;
having approached,
he spoke thus to the venerable Cunda the Great:

"Let us go on, reverend Cunda, and approach the venerable Channa so as to ask about his illness."<sup>2</sup>

"Yes, reverend sir," the venerable Cunda the Great answered the venerable Sāriputta in assent.

Then the venerable Sāriputta
and the venerable Cunda the Great approached the venerable Channa;
having approached,
they exchanged greetings with the venerable Channa;
having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,
they sat down at a respectful distance.

As they were sitting down at a respectful distance,
the venerable Sāriputta spoke thus
to the venerable Channa:

"I hope that you, reverend Channa,
are getting better,
I hope you are keeping going,
I hope the painful feelings are lessening,
not increasing,
that a lessening in them is apparent,
not an increase?"

[316] "I am not getting better, reverend Sāriputta, I am not keeping going;
my grievously painful feelings<sup>3</sup> are increasing,
not lessening,

an increasing in them is apparent,
not a lessening.

I will take a knife (to myself),
I do not desire life."<sup>4</sup>

"Do not let the venerable Channa take a knife (to himself).

The venerable Channa must go on living.

We want the venerable Channa to go on living.

If the venerable Channa has no beneficial foods, I will search for beneficial foods for the venerable Channa.

If the venerable Channa has no beneficial medicines, I will search for beneficial medicines
for the venerable Channa.

If the venerable Channa has no suitable attendant,
I will attend to the venerable Channa.

Do not let the venerable Channa take a knife (to himself).

The venerable Channa must go on living.

We want the venerable Channa to go on living."

"Reverend Sāriputta,
I am not without beneficial foods,
I am not without beneficial medicines, nor am I without a suitable attendant.

Moreover, reverend Sāriputta, for a long time have I waited on<sup>5</sup> the Teacher with satisfaction<sup>6</sup> (to him), not with lack of satisfaction<sup>6</sup> (to him).

For this, reverend Sāriputta, is suitable in a disciple, that he should wait on the Teacher with satisfaction (to him), not with lack of satisfaction (to him).

'Channa the monk will take a knife (to himself) without incurring blame'<sup>7</sup> - remember this thus, reverend Sāriputta."

---

"We would question the venerable Channa on a particular matter if the venerable Channa grants us the opportunity for setting forth the question."<sup>8</sup>

"Ask, reverend Sāriputta; having heard (you)
we will know (what to say)."

[317] "Reverend Channa, do you regard the eye, visual consciousness,
the things cognisable by visual consciousness as
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self'?

■

Do you regard the ear,
auditory consciousness,
the things cognisable by auditory consciousness as
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self'?

■

Do you regard the nose,
olfactory consciousness,
the things cognisable by olfactory consciousness as
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self'?

■

Do you regard the tongue,
gustatory consciousness,
the things cognisable by gustatory consciousness as
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self'?

■

Do you regard the body,
tactile consciousness,
the things cognisable by tactile consciousness as
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self'?

■

Do you regard the mind,
mental consciousness,
the things cognisable by mental consciousness as
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self'?

---

"Reverend Sāriputta, I regard the eye,
visual consciousness,
the things cognisable by visual consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'.

■

I regard the ear,
auditory consciousness,
the things cognisable by auditory consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'.

■

I regard the nose,
olfactory consciousness,
the things cognisable by olfactory consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'.

■

I regard the tongue,
gustatory consciousness,
the things cognisable by gustatory consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'.

■

I regard the body,
tactile consciousness,
the things cognisable by tactile consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'.

■

I regard the mind,
mental consciousness,
the things cognisable by mental consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'.

---

"Reverend Channa, what do you see, what do you understand there is in the eye,
in visual consciousness,
in the things cognisable by visual consciousness as
'This is not mine,

this am I not,
this is not my self'?

■

What do you see,
what do you understand there is in the ear,
auditory consciousness,
the things cognisable by auditory consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'?

■

What do you see,
what do you understand there is in the nose,
olfactory consciousness,
the things cognisable by olfactory consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'?

■

What do you see,
what do you understand there is in the tongue,
gustatory consciousness,
the things cognisable by gustatory consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'?

■

What do you see,
what do you understand there is in the body,

tactile consciousness,
the things cognisable by tactile consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'?

■

What do you see,
what do you understand there is in the mind,
mental consciousness,
the things cognisable by mental consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'?

---

"It is because I see cessation,<sup>8</sup> understand that there is cessation in the eye, reverend Sāriputta,
in visual consciousness,
in the things cognisable by visual consciousness|| that I, reverend Sāriputta, regard
the eye,
visual consciousness,
the things cognisable by visual consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'.

■

It is because I see cessation,
understand that there is cessation in the ear,
auditory consciousness,
the things cognisable by auditory consciousness|| that I regard
the ear,
auditory consciousness,
the things cognisable by auditory consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'.

■

It is because I see cessation,
understand that there is cessation in the nose,
olfactory consciousness,
the things cognisable by olfactory consciousness||
that I regard
the nose,
olfactory consciousness,
the things cognisable by olfactory consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'.

■

It is because I see cessation,
understand that there is cessation in the tongue,
gustatory consciousness,
the things cognisable by gustatory consciousness||
that I regard

the tongue,
gustatory consciousness,
the things cognisable by gustatory consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'.

■

It is because I see cessation,
understand that there is cessation in the body,
tactile consciousness,
the things cognisable by tactile consciousness||
that I regard
the body,
tactile consciousness,
the things cognisable by tactile consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'.

■

It is because I see cessation,
understand that there is cessation in the mind,
mental consciousness,
the things cognisable by mental consciousness||
that I regard
the mind,
mental consciousness,
the things cognisable by mental consciousness as
'This is not mine,
this am I not,
this is not my self'."

---

When this had been said, the venerable Cunda the Great spoke thus to the venerable Channa:<sup>10</sup>

"Wherefore, reverend Channa, this teaching of the Lord should always be attended to:

'For<sup>11</sup> him who clings there is wavering; for him who clings not there is no wavering; if there is no wavering [318] there is impassibility;<sup>12</sup> if there is impassibility there is no yearning;<sup>13</sup> if there is no yearning,<sup>14</sup> there is no coming and going;<sup>15</sup> if there is no coming and going, there is no deceasing and uprising; if there is no deceasing and uprising, there is no "here" itself nor "yonder"
nor "in between the two."
This is itself the end of anguish.'

Then the venerable Sāriputta
and the venerable Cunda the Great, having exhorted the venerable Channa
with this exhortation,
rose from their seats and departed.

And not long after the departure of the venerable Sāriputta
and the venerable Cunda the Great, the venerable Channa took a knife (to himself).<sup>16</sup>

Then the venerable Sāriputta approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance,
the venerable Sāriputta spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, a knife has been taken by the venerable Channa to himself.

What is his bourn,
what his future state?"

"Was it not face to face with you, Sāriputta, that the monk Channa declared (his) blamelessness?"<sup>17</sup>

"There is, revered sir, a village of the Vajjis called Pubbajira."<sup>18</sup>

There are families there who were friends of the venerable Channa, families which sustained<sup>19</sup> him, families to be visited."<sup>20</sup>

"Indeed, Sāriputta,
these families were friends of the monk Channa, families who sustained him, families to be visited.

As far as this, Sāriputta,
I do not say he was to be blamed."<sup>21</sup>

But whoever, [319] Sāriputta, lays down this body
and grasps after another body, of him I say he is to be blamed."<sup>22</sup>

The monk Channa did not do this;<sup>23</sup> the monk Channa took the knife (to himself) without incurring blame."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the venerable Sāriputta
rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on an Exhortation to Channa;
The Second

---

<sup>1</sup> This episode is also recorded at S. iv. 55 ff.

<sup>2</sup> MA. v. 82 says he said this as attending to the sick had been praised by the Lord (Vin. i. 302).

<sup>3</sup> As at M. iii. 259, above, p. 310.

<sup>4</sup> MA. v. 82 says that as he could not endure the deadly pains and thought of taking a knife (with which to stab himself or cut this throat ?), he was an ordinary person, puthujjana.

<sup>5</sup> pariṇṇa, as at M. i. 497 (M.L.S. ii. 176).

<sup>6</sup> manāpena ... no amanāpena. According to the Comys. (e.g. A A. iii. 287, SA i. 78) derived from appeti, to flow into, or appāyati, to make full, to satisfy.

<sup>7</sup> anupavajjam ... sattham āharissati, lit. he will take an irreproachable, unblamed knife, i.e. in the karmic sense. According to MA. v. 82 his deed would be anupapattika, non-rebirthing, appaṭisandhika, not re-linking (as to consciousness). SA. ii. 371 reads anupavattika, not rolling on (in renewed births).

<sup>8</sup> As at M. iii. 15.

<sup>9</sup> nirodha, explained at MA. v. 82 = SA. ii. 372 as khayavayam, destruction and waning.

<sup>10</sup> SA. ii. 372 says that Sāriputta, knowing Channa to be at the puthujjana stage, was silent and neither said "You are an average person" nor "You are cankerless," Cunda spoke so as to test Channa.

<sup>11</sup> This passage recurs at Ud. 81, UdA. 398, Netti, 65; cf. also S. ii. 67.

<sup>12</sup> Of body and mind, and in respect of the obstructions, MA. v. 83.

<sup>13</sup> nati, as at M. i. 115. MA. v. 83, SA. ii. 372 say taṇhā.

<sup>14</sup> I.e. for becoming, MA. v. 82 = SA. ii. 372.

<sup>15</sup> āgaligati, some vv. ll. giving agatigati. The Comys. says "what is called 'coming,' agati, because of re-linking, what is called 'going,' gati, because of decease, these are not." Cf. āgati gati cuti upapatti at D. i. 162, etc.

<sup>16</sup> He cut his windpipe, but at that moment fell into the fear of dying. Knowing he was a puthujjana, he hastily applied insight and, mastering the saṃkhārā, attained arahantship and final nibbāna. See K.S. iv. 33, n. 1.

<sup>17</sup> anupavajjatā.

<sup>18</sup> S. iv. 50 reads Pubbavijjhana, v.l. Pubbavicira.

<sup>19</sup> suhajjakulāni. Suhajja would appear to be from Skrt. suhyati, to satisfy, gladden; rejoice; sustain, support.

<sup>20</sup> upavajjakulāni. Comys. explain as families to be approached or visited, upasamkamitabbakulāni. According to C.P.D., s.v. anupavajja, it was Sāriputta who mistook upavajja for upasamkamitabba. He wondered whether, MA. v. 83, as Channa had these lay supporters he would have attained final nibbāna in the Lord's teaching. The Lord however said there was no gregariousness (which was not allowed to monks) between Channa and these families. Therefore there was no blame.

21 sa-upavajja.

22 sa-upavajja.

23 taṃ Channassa bhikkhuno n'atthi, lit. "this was not (there was not this) for the monk Channa."

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
5. Saḷāyatana Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
5. The Division of the Sixfold Sense(-field)

145. Discourse on an Exhortation to Puṇṇa

Puṇṇ'ovāda Sutta

---

Thus have I heard:

At one time<sup>1</sup> the Lord was once staying near Sāvattihī,
in the Jeta Grove,
in Anāthapiṇḍika's, monastery.

Then the venerable Puṇṇa,<sup>2</sup> emerging from solitary meditation towards evening,
approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
he sat down at a respectful distance.

As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the venerable Puṇṇa spoke thus to the Lord:

"It would be good, revered sir, if the Lord would exhort me with an exhortation in brief so that I,

having heard dhamma from the Lord,
might abide alone,
aloof,
diligent,
ardent,
self-resolute."

"Well then, Puṇṇa, listen,
attend carefully
and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
the venerable Puṇṇa answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"There are, Puṇṇa,
material shapes cognisable by the eye,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

If a monk delights in these,<sup>3</sup>
welcomes them
and persists in cleaving to them, then, because he delights in them,
welcomes them
and persists in cleaving to them,
delight uprises in him.

I say, [320] Puṇṇa,
that from the uprising of delight
is the uprising of anguish.

■

"There are, Puṇṇa,
sounds cognisable by the ear,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

If a monk delights in these,
welcomes them
and persists in cleaving to them,
then, because he delights in them,
welcomes them
and persists in cleaving to them,
delight uprises in him.

I say, Puṇṇa,
that from the uprising of delight
is the uprising of anguish.

■

"There are, Puṇṇa,
smells cognisable by the nose,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

If a monk delights in these,
welcomes them
and persists in cleaving to them,
then, because he delights in them,
welcomes them
and persists in cleaving to them,
delight uprises in him.

I say, Puṇṇa,
that from the uprising of delight
is the uprising of anguish.

■

"There are, Puṇṇa,
tastes cognisable by the tongue,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

If a monk delights in these,
welcomes them
and persists in cleaving to them,
then, because he delights in them,
welcomes them
and persists in cleaving to them,
delight uprises in him.

I say, Puṇṇa,
that from the uprising of delight
is the uprising of anguish.

■

"There are, Puṇṇa,
touches cognisable by the body,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

If a monk delights in these,
welcomes them
and persists in cleaving to them,
then, because he delights in them,
welcomes them
and persists in cleaving to them,
delight uprises in him.

I say, Puṇṇa,
that from the uprising of delight
is the uprising of anguish.

■

"There are, Puṇṇa,
mental states cognisable by the mind,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

If a monk delights in these,
welcomes them
and persists in cleaving to them,
then, because he delights in them,

welcomes them
and persists in cleaving to them,
delight uprises in him.

I say, Puṇṇa,
that from the uprising of delight
is the uprising of anguish.

---

"There are, Puṇṇa,
material shapes cognisable by the eye,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

If a monk does not delight in these,
does not welcome them
or persists in cleaving to them,
then, because he does not delight in them,
welcomes them
or persists in cleaving to them,
delight is stopped in him.

I say, Puṇṇa,
that from the stopping of delight
is the stopping of anguish.

■

"There are, Puṇṇa,
sounds cognisable by the ear,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

If a monk does not delight in these,
does not welcome them
or persists in cleaving to them,
then, because he does not delight in them,
welcomes them
or persists in cleaving to them,
delight is stopped in him.

I say, Puṇṇa,
that from the stopping of delight
is the stopping of anguish.

■

"There are, Puṇṇa,
smells cognisable by the nose,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

If a monk does not delight in these,
does not welcome them
or persists in cleaving to them,
then, because he does not delight in them,

welcomes them
or persists in cleaving to them,
delight is stopped in him.

I say, Puṇṇa,
that from the stopping of delight
is the stopping of anguish.

■

"There are, Puṇṇa,
tastes cognisable by the tongue,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

If a monk does not delight in these,
does not welcome them
or persists in cleaving to them,
then, because he does not delight in them,
welcomes them
or persists in cleaving to them,
delight is stopped in him.

I say, Puṇṇa,
that from the stopping of delight
is the stopping of anguish.

■

"There are, Puṇṇa,
touches cognisable by the body,
agreeable,
pleasant,

liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

If a monk does not delight in these,
does not welcome them
or persists in cleaving to them,
then, because he does not delight in them,
welcomes them
or persists in cleaving to them,
delight is stopped in him.

I say, Puṇṇa,
that from the stopping of delight
is the stopping of anguish.

■

"There are, Puṇṇa,
mental states cognisable by the mind,
agreeable,
pleasant,
liked,
enticing,
connected with sensual pleasures,
alluring.

If a monk does not delight in these,
does not welcome them
or persists in cleaving to them,
then, because he does not delight in them,
welcomes them
or persists in cleaving to them,
delight is stopped in him.

I say, Puṇṇa,
that from the stopping of delight
is the stopping of anguish.

---

And in what district will you stay, Puṇṇa, now that you have been exhorted by me with this exhortation in brief?"

"There is a district called Sunāparanta.<sup>4</sup>

I will stay there, revered sir, now that I have been exhorted by the Lord
with this exhortation in brief."

"Puṇṇa, the people of Sunāparanta are fierce, the people of Sunāparanta are rough.

If the people of Sunāparanta revile<sup>5</sup> and abuse you, Puṇṇa, how will it be for you there, Puṇṇa?"

"If the people of Sunāparanta revile and abuse me, revered sir, it will be thus for me there:

I will say,

'Goodly indeed are these people of Sunāparanta, indeed very goodly are these people of Sunāparanta in that they do not strike me a blow with their hands.'

It will be thus for me here, Lord, it will be thus for me here, Well-farer."

■

"But if the people of Sunāparanta do strike you a blow with their hands, Puṇṇa, how will it be for you there, Puṇṇa?"

"If the people of Sunāparanta strike me a blow with their hands, revered sir, it will be thus for me there:

I will say,

'Goodly indeed are these people of Sunāparanta, indeed very goodly are these people [321] of Sunāparanta in that they do not strike me a blow with clods of earth.'

It will be thus for me here, Lord,
it will be thus for me here, Well-farer."

■

"But if the people of Sunāparanta do strike you a blow with clods of earth, Puṇṇa, how will it be for you there, Puṇṇa?"

"If the people of Sunāparanta strike me a blow with clods of earth, revered sir,
it will be thus for me there:

I will say,

'Goodly indeed are these people of Sunāparanta, indeed very goodly are these people of Sunāparanta in that they do not strike me a blow with a stick.'<sup>6</sup>

It will be thus for me here, Lord,
it will be thus for me here, Well-farer."

■

"But if the people of Sunāparanta do strike you a blow with a stick, Puṇṇa, how will it be for you there, Puṇṇa?"

"If the people of Sunāparanta strike me a blow with a stick, revered sir,
it will be thus for me there:

I will say,

'Goodly indeed are these people of Sunāparanta, indeed very goodly are these people of Sunāparanta in that they do not strike me a blow with a knife.'

It will be thus for me here, Lord,
it will be thus for me here, Well-farer."

■

"But if the people of Sunāparanta do strike you a blow with a knife, Puṇṇa, how will it be for you there, Puṇṇa?"

"If the people of Sunāparanta strike me a blow with a knife, revered sir,
it will be thus for me there:

I will say,

'Goodly indeed are these people of Sunāparanta, indeed very goodly are these people of Sunāparanta

in that they do not deprive me of life with a sharp knife.'

It will be thus for me here, Lord,
it will be thus for me here, Well-farer."

■

"But if the people of Sunāparanta do deprive you of life with a sharp knife, Puṇṇa,
how will it be for you there, Puṇṇa?"

"If the people of Sunāparanta deprive me of life with a sharp knife, revered sir,
it will be thus for me there:

I will say,

'There are disciples of the Lord who, disgusted by the body and the life-principle and ashamed of them, look about for a knife
(with which to kill themselves).<sup>7</sup> I have come upon this very knife without having looked about for it.'

It will be thus for me here, Lord,
it will be thus for me here, Well-farer."

"It is good, Puṇṇa,
it is good.

You will be able to live in the district among the people of Sunāparanta possessed as you are of this taming and calm.<sup>8</sup>

You, Punna, now do that for which you deem the time is right."

Then the venerable Puṇṇa,
having rejoiced in what the Lord had said
and having given thanks for it, rose from his seat
and greeted the Lord
keeping his right side towards him, packed away his lodging
and, taking his bowl and robe, set out on tour for the Sunāparanta district.

Walking on tour,
he gradually arrived at the Sunāparanta district.

While he was there
the venerable Puṇṇa stayed in the district among the people of Sunāparanta.

And [322] during the same rainy season the venerable Puṇṇa established as many as five hundred lay-devotees, as many as five hundred female lay-devotees, and he realised the three knowledges.

Then after a time
the venerable Puṇṇa attained final nibbāna.<sup>9</sup>

A number of monks approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
they sat down at a respectful distance.

As they were sitting down at a respectful distance,
these monks spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, that young man of family<sup>10</sup> named Puṇṇa who was exhorted by the Lord with an exhortation in brief, has died.

What is his bourn,
what his future state?"

"Clever, monks, was Puṇṇa
the young man of family;
he followed after dhamma
according to the various parts of dhamma;
and he did not annoy me
with questionings about dhamma.

Puṇṇa the young man of family has gained final nibbāna, monks."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on an Exhortation to Puṇṇa:
The Third

---

<sup>1</sup> As at S. iv. 60 ff., Divy. 37-39.

<sup>2</sup> Verses at Thag. 70. See ThagA. i. 167-169 and MA. v. 85-92.

<sup>3</sup> That is, in both the eye and material shapes.

<sup>4</sup> MA. v. 85 says he was a dweller in Sunāparanta, and there were four places there where he stayed. Two, however, were not suitable: the monastery in Samuddagiri was surrounded by magnetic rocks so it was impossible to pace up and down; and at Mātulagiri a huge flock of birds made a noise day and night.

<sup>5</sup> Or, "curse." See B.D. ii. 171, n. 3, also p. 269; also B.D. iii. 344 (Vin. iv. 309) where "revile" and "abuse" are defined much as they are at MA. v. 85.

<sup>6</sup> MA. v. 85 says a four-handed stick or a club of twigs.

<sup>7</sup> satthahāraka, or an assassin. But see Pārājika III (Vin. iii. 73) to which MA. v. 85 refers.

<sup>8</sup> damupasama. MA. v. 86 says that in this Sta. dama is khanti, forbearance or patience, and upasmma has the same meaning.

<sup>9</sup> MA. v. 92 says he attained final nibbāna in the element of nibbāna that has no substrate for rebirth remaining. The people revered his body for a week and then, having collected sweet scented sticks, they cremated it, took away the remains and built a cetiya.

<sup>10</sup> I do not know why Punnā is here referred to as kulapvltu. It is perhaps to show he died young.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
5. Saḷāyatana Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
5. The Division of the Sixfold Sense(-field)

146. Discourse on an Exhortation from Nandaka

Nandak'ovāda Sutta

---

Thus have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Then Mahāpajāpatī the Gotamid with as many as five hundred nuns
approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
she stood at a respectful distance.
As she was standing at a respectful distance,
Mahāpajāpatī the Gotamid spoke thus to the Lord:

"Revered sir, [323] let the Lord exhort the nuns; revered sir, let the Lord instruct the nuns; revered sir, let the Lord make a talk on Dhamma for the nuns."

Now at that time the monks who were elders used to exhort the nuns in turn;

but the venerable Nandaka<sup>1</sup> did not want to exhort the nuns in (his) turn.<sup>2</sup>
So the Lord addressed the venerable Ānanda, saying:

"Ānanda, whose turn is it today to exhort the nuns by turn?"

"It is Nandaka's turn, revered sir, to exhort the nuns by turn;
but this venerable Nandaka, revered sir, does not want to exhort the nuns in (his) turn."

Then the Lord addressed the venerable Nandaka, saying:

"Exhort the nuns, Nandaka; instruct the nuns, Nandaka;
do you, brahman,<sup>3</sup> make a talk on Dhamma for the nuns."

"Yes, revered sir," [271] answered the venerable Nandaka in assent to the Lord.

He dressed in the early morning
and, taking his bowl and robe,
entered Sāvattthī for almsfood.
When he had walked for almsfood in Sāvattthī,
on returning from the alms-gathering after the meal he approached the King's Monastery<sup>4</sup> without a companion.<sup>5</sup>

Those nuns saw the venerable Nandaka coming in the distance, and on seeing him they made ready a seat
and set out water for (washing) the feet.

The venerable Nandaka sat down on the seat made ready and as he was sitting down he washed his feet.

And when those nuns had greeted the venerable Nandaka
they sat down at a respectful distance.

The venerable Nandaka spoke thus to those nuns
as they were sitting down at a respectful distance:

"Sisters, there will be a talk by way of putting questions.

Those who understand (each question) should say:

'We understand';

those who do not understand should say:

'We do not understand.'

[324] But if anyone has any doubt or perplexity

I should be questioned about it thus:

'How is this, revered sir?

What is the meaning of that?'"

"So far, revered sir, we are pleased and satisfied with the master Nandaka in that the master Nandaka invites us."

"What do you think about this, sisters?
Is the eye permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent, anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, sisters?
Is the ear permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, sisters?
Is the nose permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, sisters?
Is the tongue permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, sisters?
Is the body permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, sisters?
Is the mind permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to [272]regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

Already, revered sir, by means of perfect intuitive wisdom
it has been well seen by us as it really is that "These six internal sense-fields are impermanent."

"It is good, sisters, it is good.

For it is thus, sisters,
that by means of perfect intuitive wisdom this is seen by an Ariyan disciple
as it really is.

What do you think about this, sisters?
Are material shapes permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,

this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Are sounds permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Are smells permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Are tastes permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Are touches permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Are mental states permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

Already, revered sir, by means of perfect intuitive wisdom it has been well seen by us as it really is that
'These six external sense-fields are impermanent.'"

"It is good, sisters, it is good.

For it is thus, sisters,
that by means of perfect intuitive wisdom
this is seen by an Ariyan disciple as it really is.

What do you think about this, sisters?
Is visual consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Is auditory consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Is olfactory consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Is gustatory consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Is tactile consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,

'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Is mental consciousness permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

[325] "Is it right to regard that which is impermanent, anguish and liable to alterations as

'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self'?"

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

Already, revered sir, by means of perfect intuitive wisdom
it has been well seen by us as it really is that

"These six classes of consciousness are impermanent."

"It is good, sisters, it is good.

For it is thus, sisters,
that by means of perfect intuitive wisdom
this is seen by an Ariyan disciple as it really is.

It is, sisters, like the oil for lighting an oil-lamp
which is impermanent and liable to alteration,
and like the wick which is impermanent and liable to alteration, and like the flame which is impermanent and liable to alteration,

and like the light which is impermanent and liable to alteration.

If anyone, sisters, were to speak thus:

'The oil for lighting this oil-lamp is impermanent and liable to alteration, and the wick is impermanent and liable to alteration,
and the flame is impermanent and liable to alteration,
but that which is the light
— that is permanent, lasting, eternal, not liable to alteration,' speaking thus sisters,
would he be speaking rightly?"

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

It is, revered sir, that if the oil for lighting this oil-lamp be impermanent and liable to alteration, and if the wick be impermanent and liable to alteration,
and if the flame be impermanent and liable to alteration, all the more is the light impermanent and liable to alteration."

"Even so, sisters,
if anyone should speak thus:
'These six internal sense-fields are impermanent and liable to alteration, but whatever pleasure or pain or neither pain nor pleasure is experience as a result of these six internal sense-field
— that is permanent, lasting, eternal,
not liable to alteration,' speaking this, sisters,
would he be speaking rightly?"

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

As a result of this or that condition, revered sir,
these or those feelings arise.

[274] From the stopping of this or that condition these or those feelings are stopped."

"It is good, sisters, it is good.

For it is thus, sisters,
that by means of perfect intuitive wisdom
this is seen by an Ariyan disciple as it really is.

It is, sisters, like the roots of a great, stable and pithy tree which are impermanent and liable to alteration,
like the trunk
which is impermanent and liable to alteration
the branches and foliage
which are impermanent and liable to alteration,
and like the shade
which is impermanent and liable to alteration.

If anyone, sisters, were to speak thus: 'The roots of this great, stable and pithy tree
are impermanent and liable to alteration, the trunk of this great, stable and pithy tree
are impermanent and liable to alteration, the branches and foliage of this great, stable and pithy tree
are impermanent and liable to [326] alteration, but that which is its shade
— that is permanent, lasting, eternal,
not liable to alteration,
speaking thus, sisters,
would he be speaking rightly?'

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

It is, revered sir, that if the roots of this great, stable and pithy tree
are impermanent and liable to alteration,
the trunk of this great, stable and pithy tree
are impermanent and liable to alteration, the foliage and branches of this great, stable and pithy tree
are impermanent and liable to alteration, all the more is the shade impermanent and liable to alteration."

"Even so, sisters,
if anyone should speak thus:
'These six external sense-fields
are impermanent and liable to alteration,
but whatever pleasure or pain
or neither pain nor pleasure is experience as a result of these six external sense-fields
— that is permanent, lasting, eternal,
not liable to alteration,'
speaking thus, sisters,
would he be speaking rightly?"

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

As a result of this or that condition, revered sir,
these or those feeling arise.
From the stopping of this or that condition
these or those feelings are stopped."

"It is good, sisters, it is good.

For it is thus, sisters,
that by means of perfect intuitive wisdom
this is seen by an Ariyan disciple as it really is.

It is, sisters, as if a clever cattle-butcher or cattle-butcher's apprentice,

having killed a cow,
should dissect the cow with a butcher's sharp knife without spoiling the flesh within,
without spoiling the outer hide,
and with the butcher's sharp knife
should cut,
should cut around,
should cut all around
whatever tendons, sinews and ligaments there are there within;
[275] and having cut,
cut around,
cut all around
and removed the outer hide and,
having clothed that cow in that self-same hide again,
should then speak thus:
'This cow is conjoined with this hide as before.'

Speaking thus, sisters, would he be speaking rightly?"

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

Although, revered sir, that clever cattle-butcher
or cattle-butcher's apprentice,
having killed a cow
should dissect the cow with a butcher's sharp knife
without spoiling the flesh within,
without spoiling the outer hide,
and with the butcher's sharp knife
should cut,
should cut around,
should cut all around
whatever tendons, sinews and ligaments there are there within;
and having cut,
cut around,

cut all around
and removed the outer hide and,
having clothed that cow in that self-same hide again,
should then speak thus:
'This cow is conjoined with this hide as before.'
yet that cow is not conjoined with that hide."

"I have made this simile for you, sisters,
so as to illustrate the meaning.

This is the meaning here:

'The flesh within,' sisters,
is a synonym for the six internal sense-fields.

'The outer hide,' sisters,
is a synonym for the six external sense-fields.

'The tendons, sinews and ligaments within,' sisters,
is a synonym for delight and attachment.

'The butcher's sharp knife,' sisters,
is a synonym for the Ariyan intuitive wisdom,
the Ariyan intuitive wisdom by which [327] one cuts, cuts around
and cuts all around
the inner defilement's
the inner fetters
and the inner bonds.

There are, sisters, these seven links in awakening<sup>6</sup> from the development and making much of which a monk,
by the destruction of the cankers, having here and now realized
by his own super-knowledge
the freedom of mind
and the freedom through intuitive wisdom

that are cankerless,
entering on them abides therein.

What are the seven?

Herein, sisters, a monk develops the link in awakening that is mindfulness
and is dependent on aloofness,
dependant on detachment,
dependant on cessation,
ending in abandoning;

he develops the link in awakening that is investigation into things
and is dependent on aloofness,
dependant on detachment,
dependant on cessation,
ending in abandoning;

he develops the link in awakening
that is energy
and is dependent on aloofness,
dependant on detachment,
dependant on cessation,
ending in abandoning;

he develops the link in awakening
that is rapture
and is dependent on aloofness,
dependant on detachment,
dependant on cessation,
ending in abandoning;

he develops the link in awakening
that is impassability
and is dependent on aloofness,
dependant on detachment,

dependant on cessation,
ending in abandoning;

he develops the link in awakening
that is concentration
and is dependent on aloofness,
dependant on detachment,
dependant on cessation,
ending in abandoning;

he develops the link in awakening
that is equanimity
and is dependent on aloofness,
dependent on detachment,
dependent on cessation,
ending in abandoning.

These, sisters, are the seven links in awakening
from the development and making much of which a monk,
by the destruction of the cankers, having here and now realized
by his own super-knowledge
the freedom of mind
and the freedom through intuitive wisdom
that are cankerless,
entering on them abides therein.

[276] Then the venerable Nandaka, having exhorted the nuns with this exhortation,
dismissed them, saying:

"Go, sisters, it is time."

Then these nuns,
having rejoiced in what the venerable Nandaka had said
and having given thanks,
rose from their seats,

greeted the venerable Nandaka
keeping their right sides towards him,
and approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
they stood at a respectful distance.

The Lord spoke thus to these nuns
as they were standing at a respectful distance:

"Go, nuns, it is time."

Then these nuns,
having greeted the Lord,
departed keeping their right sides towards him.

Not long after these nuns had departed
the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks, as on an Observance day,
a fourteenth,
there is neither doubt nor perplexity among the populace as to whether the moon is not full<sup>7</sup> or whether the moon is full,
for the moon is then not full,
even so, monks,
although these nuns were delighted with Nandaka's teaching on Dhamma, their aspirations were not fulfilled."

Then the Lord addressed the venerable Nandaka, saying:

"Well [328] then, Nandaka, you may exhort these nuns with this same exhortation again tomorrow."

"Yes, revered sir,"
the venerable Nandaka answered the Lord in assent.

Then the venerable Nandaka dressed in the early morning towards the end of that night and,
taking his bowl and robe,
entered Sāvattthī for almsfood.
When he had walked for almsfood in Sāvattthī, on returning from the alms-gathering
after the meal
he approached the King's Monastery without a companion.

Those nuns saw the venerable Nandaka coming in the distance,
and on seeing him they made ready a seat
and set out water for (washing) the feet.

The venerable Nandaka sat down on the seat made ready
and as he was sitting down he washed his feet.

And when those nuns had greeted the venerable Nandaka
they sat down at a respectful distance.

The venerable Nandaka spoke thus to those nuns
as they were sitting down at a respectful distance:

"Sisters, there will be a talk by way of putting questions.

Those who understand (each question) should say:

'We understand';

those who do not understand should say:

'We do not understand.'

But if anyone has any doubt or perplexity

I should be questioned about it thus:

'How is this, revered sir?

What is the meaning of that?'"

"So far, revered sir,

we are pleased and satisfied with the master Nandaka
in that the master Nandaka invites us."

"What do you think about this, sisters?
Is the eye permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, sisters?
Is the ear permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, sisters?
Is the nose permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, sisters?
Is the tongue permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, sisters?
Is the body permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent, anguish and liable to alteration as, 'This is mine, this am I, this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

"What do you think about this, sisters? Is the mind permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent, anguish and liable to alteration as, 'This is mine, this am I, this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What is the reason for this?

Already, revered sir, by means of perfect intuitive wisdom it has been well seen by us as it really is that "These six internal sense-fields are impermanent."

"It is good, sisters, it is good."

For it is thus, sisters,
that by means of perfect intuitive wisdom
this is seen by an Ariyan disciple
as it really is.

What do you think about this, sisters?
Are material shapes permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Are sounds permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,

this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Are smells permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Are tastes permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Are touches permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Are mental states permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What is the reason for this?

Already, revered sir, by means of perfect intuitive wisdom
it has been well seen by us

as it really is that

"These six external sense-fields are impermanent."

"It is good, sisters, it is good.

For it is thus, sisters,
that by means of perfect intuitive wisdom
this is seen by an Ariyan disciple as it really is.

What do you think about this, sisters?
Is visual consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Is auditory consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Is olfactory consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Is gustatory consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Is tactile consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish
or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"It is right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish and liable to alteration as,
'This is mine,
this am I,
this is my self.'?"

"No, revered sir."

What do you think about this, sisters?
Is mental consciousness permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent, anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"Is it right to regard that which is impermanent, anguish and liable to alterations as
'This is mine,

this am I,
this is my self'?"

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

Already, revered sir, by means of perfect intuitive wisdom
it has been well seen by us as it really is that
'These six classes of consciousness are impermanent.'

"It is good, sisters, it is good.

For it is thus, sisters,
that by means of perfect intuitive wisdom
this is seen by an Ariyan disciple as it really is.

It is, sisters, like the oil for lighting an oil-lamp
which is impermanent and liable to alteration,
and like the wick which is impermanent and liable to alteration,
and like the flame which is impermanent and liable to alteration,
and like the light which is impermanent and liable to alteration.

If anyone, sisters, were to speak thus:
'The oil for lighting this oil-lamp is impermanent and liable to alteration,
and the wick is impermanent and liable to alteration,
and the flame is impermanent and liable to alteration,
but that which is the light
— that is permanent, lasting, eternal, not liable to alteration,'
speaking thus sisters,
would he be speaking rightly?"

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

It is, revered sir, that if the oil for lighting this oil-lamp be impermanent and liable to alteration,
and if the wick be impermanent and liable to alteration,
and if the flame be impermanent and liable to alteration,
all the more is the light impermanent and liable to alteration."

"Even so, sisters,
if anyone should speak thus:
'These six internal sense-fields are impermanent and liable to alteration, but whatever pleasure or pain
or neither pain nor pleasure
is experience as a result of these six internal sense-field
— that is permanent, lasting, eternal,
not liable to alteration,'
speaking this, sisters,
would he be speaking rightly?'"

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

As a result of this or that condition, revered sir,
these or those feelings arise.

[274] From the stopping of this or that condition
these or those feelings are stopped."

"It is good, sisters, it is good.

For it is thus, sisters,
that by means of perfect intuitive wisdom
this is seen by an Ariyan disciple as it really is.

It is, sisters, like the roots of a great, stable and pithy tree which are impermanent and liable to alteration,
like the trunk
which is impermanent and liable to alteration

the branches and foliage
which are impermanent and liable to alteration,
and like the shade
which is impermanent and liable to alteration.

If anyone, sisters, were to speak thus: 'The roots of this great, stable and pithy tree
are impermanent and liable to alteration,
the trunk of this great, stable and pithy tree
are impermanent and liable to alteration, the branches and foliage of this great, stable and pithy tree
are impermanent and liable to alteration,
but that which is its shade
— that is permanent, lasting, eternal,
not liable to alteration,
speaking thus, sisters,
would he be speaking rightly?'

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

It is, revered sir, that if the roots of this great, stable and pithy tree
are impermanent and liable to alteration,
the trunk of this great, stable and pithy tree
are impermanent and liable to alteration, the foliage and branches of this great, stable and pithy tree
are impermanent and liable to alteration,
all the more is the shade impermanent and liable to alteration."

"Even so, sisters,
if anyone should speak thus:
'These six external sense-fields
are impermanent and liable to alteration,
but whatever pleasure or pain
or neither pain nor pleasure

is experience as a result of these six external sense-fields
— that is permanent, lasting, eternal,
not liable to alteration,'
speaking thus, sisters,
would he be speaking rightly?"

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

As a result of this or that condition, revered sir,
these or those feeling arise.
From the stopping of this or that condition
these or those feelings are stopped."

"It is good, sisters, it is good.

For it is thus, sisters,
that by means of perfect intuitive wisdom
this is seen by an Ariyan disciple as it really is.

It is, sisters, as if a clever cattle-butcher
or cattle-butcher's apprentice,
having killed a cow,
should dissect the cow with a butcher's sharp knife
without spoiling the flesh within,
without spoiling the outer hide,
and with the butcher's sharp knife
should cut,
should cut around,
should cut all around
whatever tendons, sinews and ligaments there are there within;
and having cut,
cut around,
cut all around
and removed the outer hide and,
having clothed that cow in that self-same hide again,

should then speak thus:

'This cow is conjoined with this hide as before.'

Speaking thus, sisters, would he be speaking rightly?"

"No, revered sir.

What is the reason for this?

Although, revered sir, that clever cattle-butcher
or cattle-butcher's apprentice,
having killed a cow
should dissect the cow with a butcher's sharp knife
without spoiling the flesh within,
without spoiling the outer hide,
and with the butcher's sharp knife
should cut,
should cut around,
should cut all around
whatever tendons, sinews and ligaments there are there within;
and having cut,
cut around,
cut all around
and removed the outer hide and,
having clothed that cow in that self-same hide again,
should then speak thus:
'This cow is conjoined with this hide as before.'
yet that cow is not conjoined with that hide."

"I have made this simile for you, sisters,
so as to illustrate the meaning.

This is the meaning here:

'The flesh within,' sisters,
is a synonym for the six internal sense-fields.

'The outer hide,' sisters,
is a synonym for the six external sense-fields.

'The tendons, sinews and ligaments within,' sisters,
is a synonym for delight and attachment.

'The butcher's sharp knife,' sisters,
is a synonym for the Ariyan intuitive wisdom,
the Ariyan intuitive wisdom by which one cuts,
cuts around
and cuts all around
the inner defilement's
the inner fetters
and the inner bonds.

There are, sisters, these seven links in awakening
from the development and making much of which a monk,
by the destruction of the cankers, having here and now realized
by his own super-knowledge
the freedom of mind
and the freedom through intuitive wisdom
that are cankerless,
entering on them abides therein.

What are the seven?

Herein, sisters, a monk develops the link in awakening
that is mindfulness
and is dependent on aloofness,
dependant on detachment,
dependant on cessation,
ending in abandoning;

he develops the link in awakening
that is investigation into things
and is dependent on aloofness,

dependant on detachment,
dependant on cessation,
ending in abandoning;

he develops the link in awakening
that is energy
and is dependent on aloofness,
dependant on detachment,
dependant on cessation,
ending in abandoning;

he develops the link in awakening
that is rapture
and is dependent on aloofness,
dependant on detachment,
dependant on cessation,
ending in abandoning;

he develops the link in awakening
that is impassability
and is dependent on aloofness,
dependant on detachment,
dependant on cessation,
ending in abandoning;

he develops the link in awakening
that is concentration
and is dependent on aloofness,
dependant on detachment,
dependant on cessation,
ending in abandoning;

he develops the link in awakening
that is equanimity
and is dependent on aloofness,
dependent on detachment,

dependent on cessation,
ending in abandoning.

These, sisters, are the seven links in awakening
from the development and making much of which a monk,
by the destruction of the cankers, having here and now realized
by his own super-knowledge
the freedom of mind
and the freedom through intuitive wisdom
that are cankerless,
entering on them abides therein.

Then the venerable Nandaka,
having exhorted the nuns with this exhortation,
dismissed them, saying:

"Go, sisters, it is time."

Then these nuns,
having rejoiced in what the venerable Nandaka had said
and having given thanks,
rose from their seats,
greeted the venerable Nandaka
keeping their right sides towards him,
and approached the Lord;
having approached and greeted the Lord,
they stood at a respectful distance.

The Lord spoke thus to these nuns
as they were standing at a respectful distance:

"Go, nuns, it is time."

Then these nuns,
having greeted the Lord,
departed keeping their right sides towards him.

Not long after these nuns had departed
the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks, as on an Observance day,
a fifteenth,
there is neither doubt nor perplexity among the populace as to whether the moon is not full or whether the moon is full,
for the moon is then quite full, even so, monks, these nuns were delighted with Nandaka's teaching on Dhamma
and their aspirations were fulfilled.

She who is the last nun<sup>8</sup> of these five hundred nuns is a stream-attainer, not liable to the Downfall;
she is assured, bound for self-awakening."

Thus spoke the Lord. Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

---

<sup>1</sup> At A. i. 25 he is called foremost of those who exhort nuns. Verses at Thag. 279-282. MA. v. 93-94 says that in a former life he had been head of 500 slaves and Mahāpajāpatī of 500 women slaves, and they were husband and wife. In this life the women were born as her companions and went forth with her.

<sup>2</sup> This was because in a previous birth he had been a king and they his concubines. He feared that anyone with recollection of former "habitations" would know this, and accuse him of wanting to see his former companions again.

<sup>3</sup> A term of high regard. The Buddha knew that only Nandaka could liberate the nuns.

<sup>4</sup>Rājakārāma, built by Pasenadi to the south of the city, corresponding to the Thūpārāma, (at Anurādhapura), MA. v. 96. See Jā. ii. 15 and D.P.P.N.

<sup>5</sup>attadutiya, with oneself for companion, i.e. alone; see C.P.D.

<sup>6</sup>As at M. iii. 88. They are spoken of here according to MA. v. 96-97 because wisdom alone, without the seven links in awakening, is unable to cut off the defilements.

<sup>7</sup>ūno chando, i.e... one day less than full; the fifteenth being the day of the full moon.

<sup>8</sup>The last of all in so far as excellent qualities, guṇa, are concerned is a stream-attainer; the others are once-returners, non-returners and those whose cankers are destroyed, MA. v. 97.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
5. Saḷāyatana Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
5. The Division of the Sixfold Sense(-field)

147. Discourse on an Exhortation to Rāhula

Cūḷa Rāhul'ovāda Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time<sup>1</sup> the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

Then as the Lord was in solitary meditation a reasoning arose in his mind thus:

"Mature now in Rāhula are the things<sup>2</sup> that bring freedom to [329] maturity.<sup>3</sup> Suppose I were to train Rahula further in the destruction of the cankers?"

And having dressed in the early morning the Lord, taking his bowl and robe, entered Sāvattḥī for almsfood.

When he had walked in Sāvattḥī for almsfood,
on returning from the alms-gathering after the meal he addressed the venerable Rāhula, saying:

"Take your piece of cloth for sitting on,<sup>4</sup> Rāhula; we will go to the Blind Men's Grove<sup>5</sup>
for the day-sojourn."

"Yes, revered sir,"
answered the venerable Rāhula in assent to the Lord and, taking his piece of cloth for sitting on, he followed closely after the Lord.

Now at that time
various thousands of devas were following the Lord,
thinking:

"Today the Lord will train the venerable Rāhula further in the destruction of the cankers."

Then the Lord plunged into the Blind Men's Grove and sat down on a seat made ready
at the root of a tree.

And the venerable Rāhula,
having greeted the Lord,
sat down at a respectful distance.

The Lord spoke thus to the venerable Rahula
as he was sitting down at a respectful distance:

"What do you think about this, Rāhula?

Is the eye permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

'This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?'"

"No, revered sir."

■

Are material shapes permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

'This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?'"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is visual consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

'This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?'"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is impact on the eye permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

'This is mine,
that am I,

this is my self'?"

"No, revered sir."

---

Is the ear permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self'?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Are sounds permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is auditory consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is impact on the ear permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

---

Is the nose permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Are smells permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

'This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?'"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is olfactory consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

'This is mine,
that am I,

this is my self'?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is impact on the nose permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

'This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self'?"

"No, revered sir."

---

Is the tongue permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Are tastes permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is gustatory consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is impact on the tongue permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

---

Is the body permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

'This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?'"

"No, revered sir."

■

Are tactile objects permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

'This is mine,
that am I,

this is my self'?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is bodily consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

'This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self'?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is impact on the body permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,

liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

---

Is the mind permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is are mental states permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is mental consciousness permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is impact on the mind permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

§

"What do you think about this, Rāhula?

Is that which arises as feeling,
perception,
the habitual tendencies,
consciousness
because of impact on the eye permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

'This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?'"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is that which arises as feeling,
perception,
the habitual tendencies,
consciousness
because of impact on the ear permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

'This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?'"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is that which arises as feeling,
perception,
the habitual tendencies,
consciousness
because of impact on the nose permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is that which arises as feeling,
perception,
the habitual tendencies,
consciousness
because of impact on the tongue permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is that which arises as feeling,
perception,
the habitual tendencies,
consciousness
because of impact on the body permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

"But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

■

Is that which arises as feeling,
perception,
the habitual tendencies,
consciousness
because of impact on the mind permanent or impermanent?

"Impermanent, revered sir."

"But is what is impermanent,
anguish or happiness?"

"Anguish, revered sir."

[330] "But is it right to regard that which is impermanent,
anguish,
liable to alteration as,

"This is mine,
that am I,
this is my self?"

"No, revered sir."

§

Seeing thus, Rāhula,
the instructed disciple of the ariyans
turns away from the eye,
he turns away from material shapes,
he turns away from visual consciousness,
he turns away from impact on the eye;
and likewise he turns away from that which arises because of impact on the eye

as feeling,
perception,
the habitual tendencies,
consciousness.

■

He turns away from the ear,
he turns away from sounds;
he turns away from auditory consciousness,
he turns away from impact on the ear;
and likewise he turns away from that which arises because of impact on the ear
as feeling,
perception,
the habitual tendencies,
consciousness.

■

He turns away from the nose,
he turns away from smells;
he turns away from olfactory consciousness,
he turns away from impact on the nose;
and likewise he turns away from that which arises because of impact on the nose
as feeling,
perception,
the habitual tendencies,
consciousness.

■

He turns away from the tongue,
he turns away from tastes;
he turns away from gustatory consciousness,
he turns away from impact on the tongue;

and likewise he turns away from that which arises because of impact on the tongue
as feeling,
perception,
the habitual tendencies,
consciousness.

■

He turns away from the body,
he turns away from touches;
he turns away from tactile consciousness,
he turns away from impact on the body;
and likewise he turns away from that which arises because of impact on the body
as feeling,
perception,
the habitual tendencies,
consciousness.

■

He turns away from the mind,
he turns away from mental states,
he turns away from mental consciousness,
he turns away from impact on the mind;
and likewise he turns away from that which arises because of impact on the mind
as feeling,
perception,
the habitual tendencies,
consciousness.

§

In turning away he is dispassionate;
by dispassion he is freed;
in freedom is the knowledge that he is freed,
and he comprehends:

Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so."

Thus spoke the Lord.

The venerable Rāhula rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

While this exposition was being given the venerable Rāhula's mind was freed from the cankers without grasping.

And to those various thousands of devas there arose the dustless, stainless vision of dhamma<sup>6</sup> that,

'whatever is liable to uprising
all that is liable to stopping.'

Lesser Discourse on an Exhortation to Rāhula:
The Fifth

---

<sup>1</sup> This Discourse also occurs at S. iv. 105-107.

<sup>2</sup> dhamma. Fifteen of them, i.e. the five indriyas, beginning with saddha, are each purified in three ways; or five faculties of perception, MA. v. 98.

<sup>3</sup> vimutti-paripācāniyā. Mentioned at MA. iii. 126. These two sentences are quoted at DA. 60. The text should at least have a hyphen between vimutti and paripācāniyā.

<sup>4</sup> nisīdana, defined at Vin. iii. 232; see B.D. ii. 87, n. 2.

<sup>5</sup> Andhavana. See B.D. ii. 36, n. 3.

<sup>6</sup> MA. v. 99 states that in the Exhortation to Upāli and the Dīghanakha Sutta this means the first Way; in the Brahmāyu Sutta the three fruits; but here the four Ways and the four fruits are to be understood, for some of these devas were stream-attainers, some once-returners, non-returners and those whose cankers were destroyed.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
5. Saḷāyatana Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
5. The Division of the Sixfold Sense(-field)

148. Discourse on the Six Sixes

Cha-Chakka Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"I will teach you dhamma, monks, lovely in the beginning,
lovely in the middle,
lovely at the ending.

With the spirit and the letter
I will proclaim to you the Brahma-faring, utterly complete,
quite purified,
that is to say the Six Sixes.

Listen to it,
attend carefully
and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Six internal sense-fields are to be understood,
six external sense-fields are to be understood,
six classes of consciousness are to be understood,
six classes of sensory impingement are to be understood,
six classes of feeling are to be understood,
six classes of craving are to be understood.

---

When it is said,
'Six internal sense-fields are to be understood'
in reference to what is it said?

It is in reference to the sense-field of eye,
the sense-field of ear,
the sense-field of nose,
the sense-field of tongue,
the sense-field of body,
the sense-field of mind.

When it is said,
'Six internal sense-fields are to be understood'
it is said in reference to this.

This is the first Six.

---

When it is said,
'Six external sense-fields are to be understood,'
in reference to what is it said?

It is in reference to the sense-field of material shapes, the sense-field of sounds,
the sense-field of smells,
the sense-field of tastes, the sense-field of touches,
the sense-field of mental states.

When it is said,
'Six external sense-fields are to be understood,'
it is said in reference to this.

This is the second Six.

---

When it is said,
'Six classes of consciousness are to be understood,'
in reference to what is it said?

It is in reference to the visual consciousness that arises
because of eye and material shapes;

the auditory consciousness that arises
because of ear and sounds;

the [332] olfactory consciousness that arises
because of nose and smells;

the gustatory consciousness that arises
because of tongue and tastes;

the bodily consciousness that arises
because of body and touches;

the mental consciousness that arises
because of mind and mental states.

When it is said,
'Six classes of consciousness are to be understood,'
it is said in reference to this.

This is the third Six.

---

When it is said,
'Six classes of (sense-)impingement are to be understood,'
in reference to what is it said?

It is in reference to the visual consciousness that arises
because of eye and material shapes -

the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;<sup>1</sup>

the auditory consciousness that arises
because of ear and sounds -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;

the olfactory consciousness that arises
because of nose and smells -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;

the gustatory consciousness that arises
because of tongue and tastes -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;

the bodily consciousness that arises
because of body and touches -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;

the mental consciousness that arises
because of mind and mental states -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement.

When it is said,
'Six classes of sensory impingement are to be understood,'
it is said in reference to this.

This is the fourth Six.

---

When it is said,
'Six classes of feeling are to be understood,'
in reference to what is it said?

It is in reference to the visual consciousness that arises
because of eye and material shapes -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
conditioned by sensory impingement is feeling;

the auditory consciousness that arises
because of ear and sounds -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
conditioned by sensory impingement is feeling;

the olfactory consciousness that arises
because of nose and smells -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
conditioned by sensory impingement is feeling;

the gustatory consciousness that arises
because of tongue and tastes -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
conditioned by sensory impingement is feeling;

the bodily consciousness that arises
because of body and touches -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
conditioned by sensory impingement is feeling;

the mental consciousness that arises
because of mind and mental states -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
conditioned by sensory impingement is feeling;

When it is said,
'Six classes of feeling are to be understood,'
it is said in reference to this.

This is the fifth Six.

---

When it is said,
'Six classes of craving are to be understood,'
in reference to what is it said?

It is in reference to the visual consciousness that arises
because of eye and material shapes -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement,
conditioned by sensory impingement is feeling,
conditioned by feeling is craving;

the [333] auditory consciousness that arises
because of ear and sounds -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement,
conditioned by sensory impingement is feeling,
conditioned by feeling is craving;

the olfactory consciousness that arises
because of nose and smells -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement,
conditioned by sensory impingement is feeling,
conditioned by feeling is craving;

the gustatory consciousness that arises
because of tongue and tastes -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement,
conditioned by sensory impingement is feeling,
conditioned by feeling is craving;

the bodily consciousness that arises
because of body and touches -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement,

conditioned by sensory impingement is feeling,
conditioned by feeling is craving;

the mental consciousness that arises
because of mind and mental states -
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement,
conditioned by sensory impingement is feeling,
conditioned by feeling is craving.

When it is said,
'Six classes of craving are to be understood,'
it is said in reference to this.

This is the sixth Six.

§

If anyone should say,

'Eye is self,'

that is not fitting.<sup>2</sup>

For the arising of the eye is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'<sup>3</sup>

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Eye is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way eye is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Material shape is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of material shape is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Material shape is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way material shape is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Visual consciousness is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of visual consciousness is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Visual consciousness is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way visual consciousness is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Impact on the eye is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of impact on the eye is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Impact on the eye is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way impact on the eye is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Feeling is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of feeling is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Feeling is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way eye is not-self,
material shapes are not-self,
visual consciousness is not-self,
impact on the eye is not-self,
feeling is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Craving is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of craving is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Craving is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way eye is not-self,
material shapes are not-self,
visual consciousness is not-self,
impact on the eye is not-self,
feeling is not-self,
craving is not-self.

---

If anyone should say,

'Ear is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of the ear is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Ear is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way ear is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Sound is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of sound is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Sound is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way material shape is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Auditory consciousness is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of auditory consciousness is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Auditory consciousness is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way auditory consciousness is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Impact on the ear is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of impact on the ear is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Impact on the ear is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way impact on the ear is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Feeling is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of feeling is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Feeling is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way ear is not-self,
sounds are not-self,
auditory consciousness is not-self,
impact on the ear is not-self,
feeling is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Craving is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of craving is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Craving is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way ear is not-self,
sounds are not-self,
auditory consciousness is not-self,
impact on the ear is not-self,
feeling is not-self,
craving is not-self.

---

If anyone should say,

'Nose is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of the nose is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Nose is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way nose is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Smells are self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of smells are to be seen and their decaying.

Since their arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Smells are self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way smells are not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Olfactory consciousness is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of olfactory consciousness is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Olfactory consciousness is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way olfactory consciousness is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Impact on the nose is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of impact on the nose is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Impact on the nose is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way impact on the nose is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Feeling is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of feeling is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Feeling is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way nose is not-self,
smells are not-self,
olfactory consciousness is not-self,
impact on the nose is not-self,
feeling is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Craving is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of craving is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Craving is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way nose is not-self,
smells are not-self,
olfactory consciousness is not-self,
impact on the nose is not-self,
feeling is not-self,
craving is not-self.

---

If anyone should say,

'Tongue is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of the tongue is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Tongue is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way tongue is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Tastes are self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of tastes are to be seen
and their decaying.

Since their arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Tastes are self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way tastes are not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Gustatory consciousness is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of gustatory consciousness is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Gustatory consciousness is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way gustatory consciousness is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Impact on the tongue is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of impact on the tongue is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Impact on the tongue is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way impact on the tongue is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Feeling is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of feeling is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Feeling is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way tongue is not-self,
tastes are not-self,
gustatory consciousness is not-self,
impact on the tongue is not-self,
feeling is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Craving is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of craving is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Craving is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way tongue is not-self,
tastes are not-self,
gustatory consciousness is not-self,
impact on the tongue is not-self,
feeling is not-self,
craving is not-self.

---

If anyone should say,

'Body is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of the body is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Body is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way body is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Touches are self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of touches are to be seen
and their decaying.

Since their arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Touches are self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way touches are not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Tactile consciousness is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of tactile consciousness is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Tactile consciousness is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way tactile consciousness is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Impact on the body is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of impact on the body is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Impact on the body is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way impact on the body is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Feeling is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of feeling is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Feeling is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way body is not-self,
touches are not-self,
tactile consciousness is not-self,
impact on the body is not-self,
feeling is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Craving is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of craving is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Craving is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way body is not-self,
touches are not-self,
tactile consciousness is not-self,
impact on the body is not-self,
feeling is not-self,
craving is not-self.

---

If anyone should say,

'Mind is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of the mind is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Mind is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way mind is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Mental states are self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of mental states is to be seen
and their decaying.

Since their arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Mental states are self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way mental states are not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Mental consciousness is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of mental consciousness is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Mental consciousness is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way mental consciousness is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Impact on the mind is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of impact on the mind is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Impact on the mind is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way impact on the mind is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Feeling is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of feeling is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Feeling is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way mind is not-self,
mental states are not-self,
[334] mental consciousness is not-self,
impact on the mind is not-self,
feeling is not-self.

■

If anyone should say,

'Craving is self,'

that is not fitting.

For the arising of craving is to be seen
and its decaying.

Since its arising and decaying are to be seen
one would thus be brought to the stage of saying:

'Self arises in me
and passes away.'

Therefore if anyone should say,

'Craving is self,'

that is not fitting;
in this way mind is not-self,
mental states are not-self,
mental consciousness is not-self,
impact on the mind is not-self,
feeling is not-self,
craving is not-self.

§

But this, monks, is the course leading to the arising of 'own body':

One says with regard to eye:

'This is mine',

'This am I',

'This is my self.'

One says with regard to material shapes:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

One says with regard to visual consciousness:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

One says with regard to impact on the eye:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

■

One says with regard to ear:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

One says with regard to sounds:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

One says with regard to auditory consciousness:

'This is mine',
'This am I',

'This is my self.'

One says with regard to impact on the ear:

'This is mine',

'This am I',

'This is my self.'

■

One says with regard to nose:

'This is mine',

'This am I',

'This is my self.'

One says with regard to smells:

'This is mine',

'This am I',

'This is my self.'

One says with regard to olfactory consciousness:

'This is mine',

'This am I',

'This is my self.'

One says with regard to impact on the nose:

'This is mine',

'This am I',

'This is my self.'

■

One says with regard to tongue:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

One says with regard to tastes:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

One says with regard to gustatory consciousness:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

One says with regard to impact on the tongue:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

■

One says with regard to body:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

One says with regard to tactile objects:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

One says with regard to tactile consciousness:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

One says with regard to impact on the body:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

■

One says with regard to mind:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

One says with regard to mental states:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

One says with regard to mental consciousness:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

One says with regard to impact on the mind:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

■

One says with regard to feeling:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

■

One says with regard to craving:

'This is mine',
'This am I',
'This is my self.'

---

And this, monks, is the course leading to the stopping of 'own body':

One says with regard to eye:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to material shapes:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to visual consciousness:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',

'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to impact on the eye:

'This is not mine',

'This am I not',

'This is not my self.'

■

One says with regard to ear:

'This is not mine',

'This am I not',

'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to sounds:

'This is not mine',

'This am I not',

'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to auditory consciousness:

'This is not mine',

'This am I not',

'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to impact on the ear:

'This is not mine',

'This am I not',

'This is not my self.'

■

One says with regard to nose:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to smells:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to olfactory consciousness:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to impact on the nose:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

■

One says with regard to tongue:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to tastes:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to gustatory consciousness:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to impact on the tongue:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

■

One says with regard to body:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to tactile objects:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to tactile consciousness:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to impact on the body:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

■

One says with regard to mind:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to mental states:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to mental consciousness:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

One says with regard to impact on the mind:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

■

One says with regard to feeling:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',
'This is not my self.'

■

One says with regard to craving:

'This is not mine',
'This am I not',

'This is not my self.'

---

Monks, visual consciousness arises
because of eye and material shapes,
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
an experience arises
conditioned by sensory impingement that is pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant.

He, being impinged on
by a pleasant feeling,
delights,
rejoices
and persists in cleaving to it; a tendency to attachment is latent in him.<sup>4</sup>

Being impinged on
by a painful feeling,
he grieves,
mourns,
laments,
beats his breast
and falls into disillusion;
a tendency to repugnance is latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant, he does not comprehend the origin
nor the going down

nor the satisfaction
nor the peril
of that feeling
nor the escape from it
as it really is;
a tendency to ignorance is latent in him.

That he, monks,
not getting rid of
the tendency to attachment to a pleasant feeling,
not driving out
the tendency to repugnance for a painful feeling,
not rooting out
the tendency to ignorance concerning a feeling that is neither painful nor
pleasant,
not getting rid of ignorance,
not making knowledge arise,
should here and now be an end-maker of anguish -
this situation does not exist.

■

Monks, auditory consciousness arises
because of ear and sounds,
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
an experience arises
conditioned by sensory impingement
that is pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant.

He, being impinged on
by a pleasant feeling,
delights,
rejoices

and persists in cleaving to it;
a tendency to attachment is latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a painful feeling,
he grieves,
mourns,
laments,
beats his breast
and falls into disillusion;
a tendency to repugnance is latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
he does not comprehend the origin
nor the going down
nor the satisfaction
nor the peril
of that feeling
nor the escape from it
as it really is;
a tendency to ignorance is latent in him.

That he, monks,
not getting rid of
the tendency to attachment to a pleasant feeling,
not driving out
the tendency to repugnance for a painful feeling,
not rooting out
the tendency to ignorance concerning a feeling that is neither painful nor
pleasant,
not getting rid of ignorance,
not making knowledge arise,
should here and now be an end-maker of anguish -
this situation does not exist.

■

Monks, olfactory consciousness arises
because of nose and smells,
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
an experience arises
conditioned by sensory impingement
that is pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant.

He, being impinged on
by a pleasant feeling,
delights,
rejoices
and persists in cleaving to it;
a tendency to attachment is latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a painful feeling,
he grieves,
mourns,
laments,
beats his breast
and falls into disillusion;
a tendency to repugnance is latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
he does not comprehend the origin
nor the going down
nor the satisfaction
nor the peril
of that feeling
nor the escape from it

as it really is;
a tendency to ignorance is latent in him.

That he, monks,
not getting rid of
the tendency to attachment to a pleasant feeling,
not driving out
the tendency to repugnance for a painful feeling,
not rooting out
the tendency to ignorance concerning a feeling that is neither painful nor
pleasant,
not getting rid of ignorance,
not making knowledge arise,
should here and now be an end-maker of anguish -
this situation does not exist.

■

Monks, gustatory consciousness arises
because of tongue and tastes,
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
an experience arises
conditioned by sensory impingement
that is pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant.

He, being impinged on
by a pleasant feeling,
delights,
rejoices
and persists in cleaving to it;
a tendency to attachment is latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a painful feeling,

he grieves,
mourns,
laments,
beats his breast
and falls into disillusion;
a tendency to repugnance is latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
he does not comprehend the origin
nor the going down
nor the satisfaction
nor the peril
of that feeling
nor the escape from it
as it really is;
a tendency to ignorance is latent in him.

That he, monks,
not getting rid of
the tendency to attachment to a pleasant feeling,
not driving out
the tendency to repugnance for a painful feeling,
not rooting out
the tendency to ignorance concerning a feeling that is neither painful nor
pleasant,
not getting rid of ignorance,
not making knowledge arise,
should here and now be an end-maker of anguish -
this situation does not exist.

■

Monks, tactile consciousness arises
because of body and touches,
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;

an experience arises
conditioned by sensory impingement
that is pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant.

He, being impinged on
by a pleasant feeling,
delights,
rejoices
and persists in cleaving to it;
a tendency to attachment is latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a painful feeling,
he grieves,
mourns,
laments,
beats his breast
and falls into disillusion;
a tendency to repugnance is latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
he does not comprehend the origin
nor the going down
nor the satisfaction
nor the peril
of that feeling
nor the escape from it
as it really is;
a tendency to ignorance is latent in him.

That he, monks,
not getting rid of
the tendency to attachment to a pleasant feeling,

not driving out
the tendency to repugnance for a painful feeling,
not rooting out
the tendency to ignorance concerning a feeling that is neither painful nor
pleasant,
not getting rid of ignorance,
not making knowledge arise,
should here and now be an end-maker of anguish -
this situation does not exist.

■

Monks, mental consciousness arises
because of mind and mental states,
[335] the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
an experience arises
conditioned by sensory impingement
that is pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant.

He, being impinged on
by a pleasant feeling,
delights,
rejoices
and persists in cleaving to it;
a tendency to attachment is latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a painful feeling,
he grieves,
mourns,
laments,
beats his breast
and falls into disillusion;
a tendency to repugnance is latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
he does not comprehend the origin
nor the going down
nor the satisfaction
nor the peril
of that feeling
nor the escape from it
as it really is;
a tendency to ignorance is latent in him.

That he, monks,
not getting rid of
the tendency to attachment to a pleasant feeling,
not driving out
the tendency to repugnance for a painful feeling,
not rooting out
the tendency to ignorance concerning a feeling that is neither painful nor
pleasant,
not getting rid of ignorance,
not making knowledge arise,
should here and now be an end-maker of anguish -
this situation does not exist.

---

Monks, visual consciousness arises
because of eye and material shapes,
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
an experience arises
conditioned by sensory impingement
that is pleasant

or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant.

He, being impinged on
by a pleasant feeling,
does not delight,
rejoice
or persist in cleaving to it;
a tendency to attachment is not latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a painful feeling,
he does not grieve,
mourn,
lament,
beat his breast
or fall into disillusion;
a tendency to repugnance is not latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
he comprehends the origin
and the going down
and the satisfaction
and the peril
of that feeling
and the escape
as it really is,
a tendency to ignorance is not latent in him.

That he, monks,
by getting rid of
any tendency to attachment to a pleasant feeling,
by driving out
any tendency to repugnance for a painful feeling,
by rooting out

any tendency to ignorance concerning a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant, by getting rid of ignorance,
by making knowledge arise,
should here and now
be an end-maker of anguish -
this situation exists.

■

Monks, auditory consciousness arises
because of ear and sounds,
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
an experience arises
conditioned by sensory impingement
that is pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant.

He, being impinged on
by a pleasant feeling,
does not delight,
rejoice
or persist in cleaving to it;
a tendency to attachment is not latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a painful feeling,
he does not grieve,
mourn,
lament,
beat his breast
or fall into disillusion;
a tendency to repugnance is not latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
he comprehends the origin
and the going down
and the satisfaction
and the peril
of that feeling
and the escape
as it really is,
a tendency to ignorance is not latent in him.

That he, monks,
by getting rid of
any tendency to attachment to a pleasant feeling,
by driving out
any tendency to repugnance for a painful feeling,
by rooting out any tendency to ignorance concerning a feeling that is neither painful nor
pleasant,
by getting rid of ignorance,
by making knowledge arise,
should here and now
be an end-maker of anguish -
this situation exists.

■

Monks, olfactory consciousness arises
because of nose and smells,
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
an experience arises
conditioned by sensory impingement
that is pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant.

He, being impinged on
by a pleasant feeling,
does not delight,
rejoice
or persist in cleaving to it;
a tendency to attachment is not latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a painful feeling,
he does not grieve,
mourn,
lament,
beat his breast
or fall into disillusion;
a tendency to repugnance is not latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
he comprehends the origin
and the going down
and the satisfaction
and the peril
of that feeling
and the escape
as it really is,
a tendency to ignorance is not latent in him.

That he, monks,
by getting rid of
any tendency to attachment to a pleasant feeling,
by driving out
any tendency to repugnance for a painful feeling,
by rooting out
any tendency to ignorance concerning a feeling that is neither painful nor
pleasant,
by getting rid of ignorance,

by making knowledge arise,
should here and now
be an end-maker of anguish -
this situation exists.

■

Monks, gustatory consciousness arises
because of tongue and tastes,
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
an experience arises
conditioned by sensory impingement
that is pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant.

He, being impinged on
by a pleasant feeling,
does not delight,
rejoice
or persist in cleaving to it;
a tendency to attachment is not latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a painful feeling,
he does not grieve,
mourn,
lament,
beat his breast
or fall into disillusion;
a tendency to repugnance is not latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
he comprehends the origin
and the going down

and the satisfaction
and the peril
of that feeling
and the escape
as it really is,
a tendency to ignorance is not latent in him.

That he, monks,
by getting rid of
any tendency to attachment to a pleasant feeling,
by driving out
any tendency to repugnance for a painful feeling,
by rooting out
any tendency to ignorance concerning a feeling that is neither painful nor
pleasant,
by getting rid of ignorance,
by making knowledge arise,
should here and now
be an end-maker of anguish -
this situation exists.

■

Monks, tactile consciousness arises
because of body and touches,
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
an experience arises
conditioned by sensory impingement
that is pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant.

He, being impinged on
by a pleasant feeling,
does not delight,
rejoice

or persist in cleaving to it;
a tendency to attachment is not latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a painful feeling,
he does not grieve,
mourn,
lament,
beat his breast
or fall into disillusion;
a tendency to repugnance is not latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
he comprehends the origin
and the going down
and the satisfaction
and the peril
of that feeling
and the escape
as it really is,
a tendency to ignorance is not latent in him.

That he, monks,
by getting rid of
any tendency to attachment to a pleasant feeling,
by driving out
any tendency to repugnance for a painful feeling,
by rooting out
any tendency to ignorance concerning a feeling that is neither painful nor
pleasant,
by getting rid of ignorance,
by making knowledge arise,
should here and now
be an end-maker of anguish -
this situation exists.

■

Monks, mental consciousness arises
because of mind and mental states,
the meeting of the three is sensory impingement;
an experience arises
conditioned by sensory impingement
that is pleasant
or painful
or neither painful nor pleasant.

He, being impinged on
by a pleasant feeling,
does not delight,
rejoice
or persist in cleaving to it;
a tendency to attachment is not latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a painful feeling,
he does not grieve,
mourn,
lament,
beat his breast
or fall into disillusion;
a tendency to repugnance is not latent in him.

Being impinged on
by a feeling that is neither painful nor pleasant,
he comprehends the origin
and the going down
and the satisfaction
and the peril
of that feeling
and the escape

as it really is,
a tendency to ignorance is not latent in him.

That he, monks,
by getting rid of
any tendency to attachment to a pleasant feeling,
by driving out
any tendency to repugnance for a painful feeling,
by rooting out
any tendency to ignorance concerning a feeling that is neither painful nor
pleasant,
by getting rid of ignorance,
by making knowledge arise,
should here and now
be an end-maker of anguish -
this situation exists.

§

Seeing thus, monks,
the instructed disciple of the ariyans
turns away from the eye,
he turns away from material shapes,
he turns away from visual consciousness,
he turns away from impact on the eye;
he turns away from feeling,
he turns away from craving.

■

He turns away from the ear,
he turns away from sounds;
he turns away from auditory consciousness,

he turns away from impact on the ear;
he turns away from feeling,
he turns away from craving.

■

He turns away from the nose,
he turns away from smells;
he turns away from olfactory consciousness,
he turns away from impact on the nose;
he turns away from feeling,
he turns away from craving.

■

He turns away from the tongue,
he turns away from tastes;
he turns away from gustatory consciousness,
he turns away from impact on the tongue;
he turns away from feeling,
he turns away from craving.

■

He turns away from the body,
he turns away from touches;
he turns away from tactile consciousness,
he turns away from impact on the body;
he turns away from feeling,
he turns away from craving.

■

He turns away from the mind,
he turns away from mental states,
he turns away from mental consciousness,
he turns away from impact on the mind;

he turns away from feeling,
he turns away from craving.

§

In turning away he is dispassionate;
by dispassion he is freed;
in freedom is the knowledge that he is freed,
and he comprehends:

Destroyed is birth,
brought to a close the Brahma-faring,
done is what was to be done,
there is no more of being such or so."

[336] Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

And while this exposition was being given the minds of as many as sixty monks were freed from the cankers without grasping.<sup>5</sup>

Discourse on the Six Sixes;
The Sixth

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. M. 1. 111.

<sup>2</sup> na uppajjati, glossed as na yujjati at MA. v. 100.

<sup>3</sup> veti, glossed as vigacchati nirujjhati at MA. v. 100.

<sup>4</sup> For attachment, repugnance and ignorance, cf. M. i. 303 f.

<sup>5</sup> MA. v. 101 says that besides the sixty monks who became arahants when the Buddha first gave this Discourse, on each occasion of its preaching by Sāriputta or Moggallāna or eighty of the great Elders a like number attained arahantship. Later, each time Maliyadeva, an Elder (see Mhvs. p. 262) preached it at sixty different places in Ceylon, sixty monks attained arahantship. Once, after it had been preached by Tipiṭaka-Cūḷanaga, a thousand monks did so.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
5. Saḷāyatana Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
5. The Division of the Sixfold Sense(-field)

149. Discourse Pertaining to the Great Sixfold (Sense-) Field

Mahā Saḷāyatānika Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time the Lord was staying near Sāvattḥī
in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery.

While he was there the Lord addressed the monks, saying:

"Monks."

"Revered One," these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"I will teach you, monks,
the great sixfold (sense-)field.

Listen to it,
attend carefully
and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
these monks answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"Monks, (anyone) not knowing,
not seeing
eye as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
material shapes as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
visual consciousness as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
impact on the eye as it really is,

and not knowing,
not seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the eye,
is attached to the eye,
is attached to material shapes, is attached to [337] visual consciousness, is attached to impact on the eye;
and as for that experience,

whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the eye -
to that too is he attached.

While he,
observing the satisfaction,
is attached,
bound
and infatuated,
the five groups of grasping go on to future accumulation.<sup>2</sup>

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
increases in him.

And his physical anxieties increase,
and mental anxieties increase,
and physical torments increase,
and mental torments increase,
and physical fevers increase,
and mental fevers increase.

He experiences anguish of body and anguish of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) not knowing,
not seeing
ear as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
sounds as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
auditory consciousness as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
impact on the ear as it really is,

and not knowing,
not seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the ear,
is attached to the ear,
is attached to sounds,
is attached to auditory consciousness, is attached to impact on the ear;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the ear -
to that too is he attached.

While he,
observing the satisfaction,
is attached,
bound
and infatuated,

the five groups of grasping
go on to future accumulation.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
increases in him.

And his physical anxieties increase,
and mental anxieties increase,
and physical torments increase,
and mental torments increase,
and physical fevers increase,
and mental fevers increase.

He experiences anguish of body
and anguish of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) not knowing,
not seeing
nose as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
smells as they really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
olfactory consciousness as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
impact on the nose as it really is,

and not knowing,
not seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the nose,
is attached to the nose,
is attached to smells,
is attached to olfactory consciousness, is attached to impact on the nose;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the nose -
to that too is he attached.

While he,
observing the satisfaction,
is attached,
bound
and infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future accumulation.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
increases in him.

And his physical anxieties increase,
and mental anxieties increase,
and physical torments increase,

and mental torments increase,
and physical fevers increase,
and mental fevers increase.

He experiences anguish of body
and anguish of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) not knowing,
not seeing
tongue as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
tastes as they really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
gustatory consciousness as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
impact on the tongue as it really is,

and not knowing,
not seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the tongue,
is attached to the tongue, is attached to tastes,
is attached to gustatory consciousness, is attached to impact on the tongue;
and as for that experience,

whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the tongue -
to that too is he attached.

While he,
observing the satisfaction,
is attached,
bound
and infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future accumulation.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
increases in him.

And his physical anxieties increase,
and mental anxieties increase,
and physical torments increase,
and mental torments increase,
and physical fevers increase,
and mental fevers increase.

He experiences anguish of body
and anguish of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) not knowing,
not seeing
body as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
touches as they really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
tactile consciousness as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
impact on the body as it really is,

and not knowing,
not seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the body,
is attached to the body,
is attached to touches, is attached to tactile consciousness, is attached to impact on the body;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the body -
to that too is he attached.

While he,
observing the satisfaction,
is attached,
bound
and infatuated,

the five groups of grasping
go on to future accumulation.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
increases in him.

And his physical anxieties increase,
and mental anxieties increase,
and physical torments increase,
and mental torments increase,
and physical fevers increase,
and mental fevers increase.

He experiences anguish of body
and anguish of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) not knowing,
not seeing
mind as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing Mental states as they really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
mental consciousness as it really is,

not knowing,
not seeing
impact on the mind as it really is,

and not knowing,
not seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the mind,
is attached to the mind, is attached to mental states, is attached to mental consciousness, is attached to impact on the mind;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the mind -
to that too is he attached.

While he,
observing the satisfaction,
is attached,
bound
and infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future accumulation.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
increases in him.

And his physical anxieties increase,
and mental anxieties increase,
and physical torments increase,

and mental torments increase,
and physical fevers increase,
and mental fevers increase.

He experiences anguish of body
and anguish of mind.

---

"Monks, (anyone) knowing,
seeing
eye as it really is,

knowing,
seeing material shapes as they really is,

knowing,
seeing visual consciousness as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
impact on the eye as it really is,

and knowing,
seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the eye,
is not attached to the eye,
is not attached to material shapes,

is not attached to visual consciousness,
is not attached to impact on the eye;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the eye - neither to that is he attached.

While he,
observing the peril,
is not attached,
bound
or infatuated,
the five groups of grasping go on to future diminution.<sup>3</sup>

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
decreases in him.

And his physical anxieties decrease,
and mental anxieties decrease,
and physical torments decrease,
and mental torments decrease,
and physical fevers decrease,
and mental fevers decrease.

He experiences happiness of body and happiness of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) knowing,
seeing
ear as it really is,

knowing,
seeing sounds as they really is,

knowing,
seeing auditory consciousness as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
impact on the ear as it really is,

and knowing,
seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the ear,
is not attached to the ear,
is not attached to sounds,
is not attached to auditory consciousness,
is not attached to impact on the ear;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the ear -
neither to that is he attached.

While he,
observing the peril,

is not attached,
bound
or infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future diminution.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
decreases in him.

And his physical anxieties decrease,
and mental anxieties decrease,
and physical torments decrease,
and mental torments decrease,
and physical fevers decrease,
and mental fevers decrease.

He experiences happiness of body
and happiness of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) knowing,
seeing
nose as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
smells as they really is,

knowing,
seeing
olfactory consciousness as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
impact on the nose as it really is,

and knowing,
seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the nose,
is not attached to the nose,
is not attached to smells,
is not attached to olfactory consciousness,
is not attached to impact on the nose;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the nose - neither to that is he attached.

While he,
observing the peril,
is not attached,
bound
or infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future diminution.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
decreases in him.

And his physical anxieties decrease,
and mental anxieties decrease,
and physical torments decrease,
and mental torments decrease,
and physical fevers decrease,
and mental fevers decrease.

He experiences happiness of body
and happiness of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) knowing,
seeing
tongue as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
tastes as they really is,

knowing,
seeing gustatory consciousness as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
impact on the tongue as it really is,

and knowing,
seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the tongue,
is not attached to the tongue,
is not attached to tastes,

is not attached to gustatory consciousness,
is not attached to impact on the tongue;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the tongue -
neither to that is he attached.

While he,
observing the peril,
is not attached,
bound
or infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future diminution.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
decreases in him.

And his physical anxieties decrease,
and mental anxieties decrease,
and physical torments decrease,
and mental torments decrease,
and physical fevers decrease,
and mental fevers decrease.

He experiences happiness of body
and happiness of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) knowing,
seeing
body as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
touches as they really is,

knowing,
seeing
tactile consciousness as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
impact on the body as it really is,

and knowing,
seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the body,
is not attached to the body,
is not attached to touches,
is not attached to tactile consciousness,
is not attached to impact on the body;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the body - neither to that is he attached.

While he,
observing the peril,

is not attached,
bound
or infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future diminution.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
decreases in him.

And his physical anxieties decrease,
and mental anxieties decrease,
and physical torments decrease,
and mental torments decrease,
and physical fevers decrease,
and mental fevers decrease.

He experiences happiness of body
and happiness of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) knowing,
seeing
mind as it really is,

knowing,
seeing Mental states as they really is,

knowing,
seeing mental consciousness as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
impact on the mind as it really is,

and knowing,
seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the mind,
is not attached to the mind,
is not attached to mental states,
is not attached to mental consciousness,
is not attached to impact on the mind;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the mind -
neither to that is he attached.

While he,
observing the peril,
is not attached,
bound
or infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future diminution.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
decreases in him.

And his physical anxieties decrease,
and mental anxieties decrease,
and physical torments decrease,
and mental torments decrease,
and physical fevers decrease,
and mental fevers decrease.

He experiences happiness of body
and happiness of mind.

---

Whatever is the view
of what really is,
that is for him right view;<sup>4</sup>

[338] whatever is aspiration
for what really is,
that is for him right aspiration;

whatever is endeavour
for what really is,
that is for him right endeavour;

whatever is mindfulness
of what really is,
that is for him right mindfulness;

whatever is concentration
on what really is,
that is for him right concentration.

And his past acts of body,
acts of speech

and mode of livelihood
have been well purified.

So does this ariyan eightfold Way go on to development and fulfilment for him.

■

While this ariyan eightfold Way
is being developed by him
thus the four arousings of mindfulness
also go on to development and fulfilment,

and the four right efforts
also go on to development and fulfilment,

and the four bases of psychic power
also go on to development and fulfilment,

and the five controlling faculties
also go on to development and fulfilment,

and the five powers
also go on to development and fulfilment,

and the seven links in awakening
also go on to development and fulfilment,

■

And in him these two things occur simultaneously:<sup>5</sup> calm and insight.

■

By superknowledge he understands those things
that should be understood by superknowledge;

by superknowledge he gets rid of those things that should be got rid of by superknowledge;

by superknowledge he develops those things that should be developed by superknowledge;

by superknowledge he realises those things that should be realised by superknowledge.

■

And what, monks, are the things that should be understood by
superknowledge?

The five groups of grasping
is the answer to this,
that is to say,
grasping after material shape,
grasping after feeling,
grasping after perception,
grasping after the habitual tendencies, grasping after consciousness -
these are the things that should be understood by superknowledge.

■

And what are the things, monks, that should be got rid of by
superknowledge?

Ignorance
and the craving for becomings - these are the things that should be got rid of by superknowledge.

■

And what are the things, monks,
that should be developed by superknowledge?

Calm and insight -
these are the things that should be developed by superknowledge.

■

And what, monks, are the things that should be realised by superknowledge?

Knowledge and freedom - these are the things that should be realised by superknowledge.

§

And (anyone), monks, knowing,
seeing
eye as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
material shapes as they really is,

knowing,
seeing visual consciousness as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
impact on the eye as it really is,

and knowing,
seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,

painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the eye,
is not attached to the eye,
is not attached to material shapes,
is not attached to visual consciousness,
is not attached to impact on the eye;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the eye - neither to that is he attached.

While he,
observing the peril,
is not attached,
bound
or infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future diminution.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
decreases in him.

And his physical anxieties decrease,
and mental anxieties decrease,
and physical torments decrease,
and mental torments decrease,
and physical fevers decrease,
and mental fevers decrease.

He experiences happiness of body
and happiness of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) knowing,
seeing
ear as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
sounds as they really is,

knowing,
seeing auditory consciousness as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
impact on the ear as it really is,

and knowing,
seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the ear,
is not attached to the ear,
is not attached to sounds,
is not attached to auditory consciousness,
is not attached to impact on the ear;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,

that arises conditioned by impact on the ear -
neither to that is he attached.

While he,
observing the peril,
is not attached,
bound
or infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future diminution.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
decreases in him.

And his physical anxieties decrease,
and mental anxieties decrease,
and physical torments decrease,
and mental torments decrease,
and physical fevers decrease,
and mental fevers decrease.

He experiences happiness of body
and happiness of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) knowing,
seeing
nose as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
smells as they really is,

knowing,
seeing
olfactory consciousness as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
impact on the nose as it really is,

and knowing,
seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the nose,
is not attached to the nose,
is not attached to smells,
is not attached to olfactory consciousness,
is not attached to impact on the nose;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the nose - neither to that is he attached.

While he,
observing the peril,
is not attached,
bound
or infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future diminution.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,

accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
decreases in him.

And his physical anxieties decrease,
and mental anxieties decrease,
and physical torments decrease,
and mental torments decrease,
and physical fevers decrease,
and mental fevers decrease.

He experiences happiness of body
and happiness of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) knowing,
seeing
tongue as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
tastes as they really is,

knowing,
seeing gustatory consciousness as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
impact on the tongue as it really is,

and knowing,
seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,

painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the tongue,
is not attached to the tongue,
is not attached to tastes,
is not attached to gustatory consciousness,
is not attached to impact on the tongue;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the tongue -
neither to that is he attached.

While he,
observing the peril,
is not attached,
bound
or infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future diminution.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
decreases in him.

And his physical anxieties decrease,
and mental anxieties decrease,
and physical torments decrease,
and mental torments decrease,
and physical fevers decrease,
and mental fevers decrease.

He experiences happiness of body
and happiness of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) knowing,
seeing
body as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
touches as they really is,

knowing,
seeing
tactile consciousness as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
impact on the body as it really is,

and knowing,
seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the body,
is not attached to the body,
is not attached to touches,
is not attached to tactile consciousness,
is not attached to impact on the body;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,

that arises conditioned by impact on the body - neither to that is he attached.

While he,
observing the peril,
is not attached,
bound
or infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future diminution.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,
accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
decreases in him.

And his physical anxieties decrease,
and mental anxieties decrease,
and physical torments decrease,
and mental torments decrease,
and physical fevers decrease,
and mental fevers decrease.

He experiences happiness of body
and happiness of mind.

■

"Monks, (anyone) knowing,
seeing
mind as it really is,

knowing,
seeing Mental states as they really is,

knowing,
seeing mental consciousness as it really is,

knowing,
seeing
impact on the mind as it really is,

and knowing,
seeing
as it really is the experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the mind,
is not attached to the mind,
is not attached to mental [339] states,
is not attached to mental consciousness,
is not attached to impact on the mind;
and as for that experience,
whether pleasant,
painful
or neither painful nor pleasant,
that arises conditioned by impact on the mind -
neither to that is he attached.

While he,
observing the peril,
is not attached,
bound
or infatuated,
the five groups of grasping
go on to future diminution.

And his craving,
which is connected with again-becoming,

accompanied by attachment
and delight,
finding its pleasure here and there,
decreases in him.

And his physical anxieties decrease,
and mental anxieties decrease,
and physical torments decrease,
and mental torments decrease,
and physical fevers decrease,
and mental fevers decrease.

He experiences happiness of body
and happiness of mind.

---

Whatever is the view
of what really is,
that is for him right view;

whatever is aspiration
for what really is,
that is for him right aspiration;

whatever is endeavour
for what really is,
that is for him right endeavour;

whatever is mindfulness
of what really is,
that is for him right mindfulness;

whatever is concentration
on what really is,
that is for him right concentration.

And his past acts of body,
acts of speech
and mode of livelihood
have been well purified.

So does this ariyan eightfold Way
go on to development and fulfilment for him.

■

While this ariyan eightfold Way
is being developed by him
thus the four arousings of mindfulness
also go on to development and fulfilment,

and the four right efforts
also go on to development and fulfilment,

and the four bases of psychic power
also go on to development and fulfilment,

and the five controlling faculties
also go on to development and fulfilment,

and the five powers
also go on to development and fulfilment,

and the seven links in awakening
also go on to development and fulfilment,

■

And in him these two things occur simultaneously: calm and insight.

■

By superknowledge he understands those things
that should be understood by superknowledge;

by superknowledge he gets rid of those things
that should be got rid of by superknowledge;

by superknowledge he develops those things
that should be developed by superknowledge;

by superknowledge he realises those things that should be realised by superknowledge.

■

And what, monks, are the things that should be understood by
superknowledge?

The five groups of grasping
is the answer to this,
that is to say,
grasping after material shape,
grasping after feeling,
grasping after perception,
grasping after the habitual tendencies,
grasping after consciousness -
these are the things that should be understood by superknowledge.

■

And what are the things, monks, that should be got rid of by
superknowledge?

Ignorance

and the craving for becomings -

these are the things that should be got rid of by superknowledge.

■

And what are the things, monks,

that should be developed by superknowledge?

Calm and insight -

these are the things that should be developed by superknowledge.

■

And what, monks, are the things that should be realised by superknowledge?

Knowledge and freedom -

these are the things that should be realised by superknowledge.

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, these monks rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse pertaining to the Great Sixfold (Sense-)Field:

The Seventh

---

<sup>1</sup> Some MSS. read Salāyatana-Vibhaṅga Sutta, Discourse on the Analysis of the Sixfold Sense-field, but this is the title of M. Sta. No. 137; there is no Cūḷa-Sutta of this name, and mahā with salāyatānika, as found in the first paragraph above, appears to refer to the subject-matter rather than to the Discourse itself, as in Sta. No. 130.

<sup>2</sup> upacaya, piling up, conservation - karmic in nature.

<sup>3</sup> apacaya, falling away.

<sup>4</sup> MA. v. 101 says that the sophist, viṭaṇḍavādin, taking his stand on this Discourse, holds that the transcendental Way is fivefold.

<sup>5</sup> yuganandhā ti ekakkhaṇikayugannadhā, MA. v. 104.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
5. Saḷāyatana Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
5. The Division of the Sixfold Sense(-field)

150. Discourse to the People of Nagaravinda

Nagara-Vindeyya Sutta

---

THUS HAVE I HEARD:

At one time, the Lord,
walking on tour among the Kosalans
together with a large Order of monks, arrived at the brahman village of the Kosalans called Nagaravinda.

The brahman householders of Nagaravinda heard it said that

"Indeed, the recluse Gotama,
gone forth from the Sakyan clan,
and walking on tour among the Kosalans
together with a large Order of monks, has arrived at the brahman village of the Kosalans called Nagaravinda.

A lovely reputation concerning the recluse Gotama has gone abroad thus:

'He is indeed Lord,
perfected one,
fully Self-Awakened One,
endowed with knowledge and (right) conduct,
Well-farer,
knower of the worlds,
the matchless charioteer of men to be tamed,
teacher of devas and mankind,
the Awakened One,
the Lord.

Having realised through his own super-knowledge,
he makes known this world
together with devas
including the Māras and the Brahmās;
creatures
together with recluses and brahmans,
with devas and mankind.

He teaches dhamma
that is lovely at the beginning,
lovely in the middle
and lovely at the ending;
he explains with the spirit and the letter
the Brahma-faring
completely fulfilled
and wholly purified.

Good indeed is the sight
of perfected ones such as this."

Then the brahman householders of Nagaravinda
approached the Lord;
having approached him,
some exchanged greetings with the Lord
and having conversed in a friendly and courteous way,

they sat down at a respectful distance;
some, having saluted the Lord with joined palms,
sat down at a respectful distance;
some, having informed [340] the Lord of their names and clans,
sat down at a respectful distance;
some, becoming silent,
sat down at a respectful distance.

The Lord spoke thus to the brahman householders of Nagaravinda
as they were sitting down at a respectful distance:

"If, householders,
wanderers belonging to other sects
should question you thus:

'Householders,
what kind of recluses and brahmans should not be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
or honoured?'

you, householders,
being questioned thus,
could answer thus:

'Those recluses and brahmans
who are not devoid of attachment,
not devoid of aversion,
not devoid of confusion
in regard to material shapes cognisable by the eye,
whose minds are not inwardly tranquillised,
who fare along now evenly, now unevenly<sup>1</sup>
in body,

speech
and thought -
recluses and brahmans such as these
are not to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
or honoured.

What is the reason for this?

It is that while<sup>2</sup> we,
who are not devoid of attachment,
not devoid of aversion,
not devoid of confusion
in regard to material shapes cognisable by the eye,
our minds not inwardly tranquillised,
fare along now evenly,
now unevenly in body,
speech
and thought,
it is yet not seen by them
that this even-faring of ours
is the higher.

Therefore these worthy recluses and brahmans
are not to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
or honoured.

■

'Those recluses and brahmans
who are not devoid of attachment,
not devoid of aversion,
not devoid of confusion

in regard to sounds cognisable by the ear,
whose minds are not inwardly tranquillised,
who fare along now evenly,
now unevenly
in body,
speech
and thought -
recluses and brahmans such as these
are not to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
or honoured.

What is the reason for this?

It is that while we,
who are not devoid of attachment,
not devoid of aversion,
not devoid of confusion
in regard to sounds cognisable by the ear,
our minds not inwardly tranquillised,
fare along now evenly,
now unevenly in body,
speech
and thought,
it is yet not seen by them
that this even-faring of ours
is the higher.

Therefore these worthy recluses and brahmans
are not to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
or honoured.

■

'Those recluses and brahmans
who are not devoid of attachment,
not devoid of aversion,
not devoid of confusion
in regard to smells cognisable by the nose,
whose minds are not inwardly tranquillised,
who fare along now evenly,
now unevenly
in body,
speech
and thought -
recluses and brahmans such as these
are not to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
or honoured.

What is the reason for this?

It is that while we,
who are not devoid of attachment,
not devoid of aversion,
not devoid of confusion
in regard to smells cognisable by the nose,
our minds not inwardly tranquillised,
fare along now evenly,
now unevenly in body,
speech
and thought,
it is yet not seen by them
that this even-faring of ours
is the higher.

Therefore these worthy recluses and brahmans
are not to be revered,
reverenced,

esteemed
or honoured.

■

'Those recluses and brahmans
who are not devoid of attachment,
not devoid of aversion,
not devoid of confusion
in regard to tastes cognisable by the tongue,
whose minds are not inwardly tranquillised,
who fare along now evenly,
now unevenly
in body,
speech
and thought -
recluses and brahmans such as these
are not to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
or honoured.

What is the reason for this?

It is that while we,
who are not devoid of attachment,
not devoid of aversion,
not devoid of confusion
in regard to tastes cognisable by the tongue,
our minds not inwardly tranquillised,
fare along now evenly,
now unevenly in body,
speech
and thought,
it is yet not seen by them

that this even-faring of ours
is the higher.

Therefore these worthy recluses and brahmans
are not to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
or honoured.

■

'Those recluses and brahmans
who are not devoid of attachment,
not devoid of aversion,
not devoid of confusion
in regard to touches cognisable by the body,
whose minds are not inwardly tranquillised,
who fare along now evenly,
now unevenly
in body,
speech
and thought -
recluses and brahmans such as these
are not to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
or honoured.

What is the reason for this?

It is that while we,
who are not devoid of attachment,
not devoid of aversion,
not devoid of confusion
in regard to touches cognisable by the body,
our minds not inwardly tranquillised,

fare along now evenly,
now unevenly in body,
speech
and thought,
it is yet not seen by them
that this even-faring of ours
is the higher.

Therefore these worthy recluses and brahmans
are not to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
or honoured.

■

'Those recluses and brahmans
who are not devoid of attachment,
not devoid of aversion,
not devoid of confusion
in regard to mental states cognisable by the mind,
whose minds are not inwardly tranquillised,
who fare along now evenly,
now unevenly
in body,
speech
and thought -
recluses and brahmans such as these
are not to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
or honoured.

What is the reason for this?

It is that while we,
who are not devoid of attachment,
not devoid of aversion,
not devoid of confusion
in regard to mental states cognisable by the mind,
our minds not inwardly tranquillised,
fare along now evenly,
now unevenly in body,
speech
and thought,
it is yet not seen by them
that this even-faring of ours
is the higher.

Therefore these worthy recluses and brahmans
are not to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
or honoured.

■

If you, householders, are questioned thus,
you could answer those wanderers belonging to other sects thus.

But if, householders,
wanderers belonging to other sects
should question you thus:

'Householders,
what kind of recluses and [341] brahmans should be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
and honoured?'

you, householders,
being questioned thus,

could answer thus:

'Those recluses and brahmans
who are devoid of attachment,
aversion
and confusion
in regard to material shapes cognisable by the eye,
whose minds are inwardly tranquillised, who fare the even-faring<sup>3</sup>
in body,
speech
and thought -
recluses and brahmans such as these
are to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
and honoured.

What is the reason for this?

It is that while we,
who are not devoid of attachment,
aversion
and confusion
in regard to material shapes cognisable by the eye,
our minds not inwardly tranquillised,
fare along now evenly,
now unevenly
in body,
speech
and thought,
it is yet seen by them
that this even-faring of ours
is the higher.

Therefore these worthy recluses and brahmans
are to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
and honoured.

■

'Those recluses and brahmans
who are devoid of attachment,
aversion
and confusion
in regard to sounds cognisable by the ear,
whose minds are inwardly tranquillised,
who fare the even-faring
in body,
speech
and thought -
recluses and brahmans such as these
are to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
and honoured.

What is the reason for this?

It is that while we,
who are not devoid of attachment,
aversion
and confusion
in regard to sounds cognisable by the ear,
our minds not inwardly tranquillised,
fare along now evenly,
now unevenly
in body,
speech

and thought,
it is yet seen by them
that this even-faring of ours
is the higher.

Therefore these worthy recluses and brahmans
are to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
and honoured.

■

'Those recluses and brahmans
who are devoid of attachment,
aversion
and confusion
in regard to smells cognisable by the nose,
whose minds are inwardly tranquillised,
who fare the even-faring
in body,
speech
and thought -
recluses and brahmans such as these
are to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
and honoured.

What is the reason for this?

It is that while we,
who are not devoid of attachment,
aversion
and confusion
in regard to smells cognisable by the nose,

our minds not inwardly tranquillised,
fare along now evenly,
now unevenly
in body,
speech
and thought,
it is yet seen by them
that this even-faring of ours
is the higher.

Therefore these worthy recluses and brahmans
are to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
and honoured.

■

'Those recluses and brahmans
who are devoid of attachment,
aversion
and confusion
in regard to tastes cognisable by the tongue,
whose minds are inwardly tranquillised,
who fare the even-faring
in body,
speech
and thought -
recluses and brahmans such as these
are to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
and honoured.

What is the reason for this?

It is that while we,
who are not devoid of attachment,
aversion
and confusion
in regard to tastes cognisable by the tongue,
our minds not inwardly tranquillised,
fare along now evenly,
now unevenly
in body,
speech
and thought,
it is yet seen by them
that this even-faring of ours
is the higher.

Therefore these worthy recluses and brahmans
are to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
and honoured.

■

'Those recluses and brahmans
who are devoid of attachment,
aversion
and confusion
in regard to touches cognisable by the body,
whose minds are inwardly tranquillised,
who fare the even-faring
in body,
speech
and thought -
recluses and brahmans such as these
are to be revered,
reverenced,

esteemed
and honoured.

What is the reason for this?

It is that while we,
who are not devoid of attachment,
aversion
and confusion
in regard to touches cognisable by the body,
our minds not inwardly tranquillised,
fare along now evenly,
now unevenly
in body,
speech
and thought,
it is yet seen by them
that this even-faring of ours
is the higher.

Therefore these worthy recluses and brahmans
are to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
and honoured.

■

'Those recluses and brahmans
who are devoid of attachment,
aversion
and confusion
in regard to mental states cognisable by the mind,
whose minds are inwardly tranquillised,
who fare the even-faring
in body,

speech
and thought -
recluses and brahmans such as these
are to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
and honoured.

What is the reason for this?

It is that while we,
who are not devoid of attachment,
aversion
and confusion
in regard to mental states cognisable by the mind,
our minds not inwardly tranquillised,
fare along now evenly,
now unevenly
in body,
speech
and thought,
it is yet seen by them
that this even-faring of ours
is the higher.

Therefore these worthy recluses and brahmans
are to be revered,
reverenced,
esteemed
and honoured.

■

If you, householders, are questioned thus,
you could answer those wanderers belonging to other sects thus.

If, householders, wanderers belonging to other sects should question you thus:

'But what grounds do the venerable ones<sup>4</sup> have, what is the authority by which you, venerable ones, should speak thus:

Certainly, those venerable ones are either devoid of attachment or are practising for the driving out of attachment, they are either devoid of aversion or are practising for the driving [342] out of aversion; they are either devoid of confusion or are practising for the driving out of confusion.'

If you are questioned thus, householders, you could answer these wanderers belonging to other sects thus:

'Those venerable ones frequent remote lodgings in lonely forest glades.

But there are not there material shapes cognisable by the eye, sounds cognisable by the ear, smells cognisable by the nose, tastes cognisable by the tongue, touches cognisable by the body<sup>5</sup> such as having been seen, heard, smelt, tasted or touched over and over again, could delight them.

These, your reverences, are the grounds, this is the authority
by which we, venerable ones, speak thus:

Certainly, those venerable ones are either devoid of attachment or are practising for the driving out of attachment, they are either devoid of aversion or are practising for the driving out of aversion; they are either devoid of confusion or are practising for the driving out of confusion.'

If you, householders, are questioned thus,
you could answer those wanderers belonging to other sects thus."

When this had been said, the brahman householders of Nagaravinda
spoke thus to the Lord:

"It is excellent, good Gotama,
it is excellent, good Gotama.

It is as if, good Gotama,
one might set upright what had been upset,
or might disclose what was covered,
or point out the way
to one who had gone astray,
or might bring an oil-lamp into the darkness
so that those with vision might see material shapes -
even so is dhamma made clear
in many a figure by the good Gotama.

We are going to the revered Gotama for refuge,
and to dhamma
and to the Order of monks.

May the revered Gotama accept us
as a lay-follower,
going for refuge from this day forth
for as long as life lasts."

Discourse to the People of Nagaravinda:
The Eighth

---

<sup>1</sup> samavisama; MA. v. 105 says that at times they fare along evenly, at times unevenly.

<sup>2</sup> pi hi, though.

<sup>3</sup> samacariyam caranti.

<sup>4</sup> ke pan'āyasmantānaṃ ākāra, lit.: What are the venerable ones' grounds? Here too, in the same sentence, the wanderers appear to address the householders as āyasmanto, although this form is both nom. and voc. pl. The householders, on the other hand, appear to address the wanderers both as āvuso, "your reverences" (a few lines lower down) and as āyasmanto. The question: What grounds do the venerable ones have ... by which you, venerable ones, should speak thus; yena tumhe āyasmanto evaṃ vadetha, is balanced by the answer: These, your reverences, are the grounds ... by which we, venerable ones, speak thus, yena mayam āyasmanto evaṃ vadema.

<sup>5</sup> MA. v. 105 says the five strands of sense-pleasures as such are not meant here, but women; and it quotes A. i. 1, "I behold no other single thing that more obsesses a man's mind than a woman."

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
5. Saḷāyatana Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
5. The Division of the Sixfold Sense(-field)

151. Discourse on Complete Purity for Alms-Gathering

Piṇḍapāta-Pārisuddhi Sutta

---

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Rājagaha
in the Bamboo Grove
at the squirrels' feeding place.

Then the venerable Sāriputta,
emerging from solitary meditation towards [343] evening, approached the Lord; having approached and greeted the Lord, he sat down at a respectful distance.

The Lord spoke thus to the venerable Sāriputta
as he was sitting down at a respectful distance:

2. "Your faculties are very bright, Sāriputta, your complexion very pure,

very clear.

In which abiding are you, Sāriputta, now abiding in the fullness thereof?"

"Abiding in (the concept of) emptiness do I, revered sir, now abide in the fullness thereof."<sup>1</sup>

"It is good, Sāriputta,
it is good.

You, Sāriputta, are now indeed abiding in fullness in the abiding of great men.<sup>2</sup>

For this is the abiding of great men, Sāriputta, that is to say (the concept of) emptiness.

3. Wherefore, Sāriputta, if a monk should desire:

'May I now abide in fullness in the abiding in (the concept of) emptiness,' that monk should consider thus, Sāriputta:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to material shapes
cognisable by the eye?

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to material shapes
cognisable by the eye' -

that monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort to get rid of these evil unskilled states themselves.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to material shapes
cognisable by the eye' -

that monk, Sāriputta, with rapture and joy can forsake<sup>3</sup> these,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

4. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to sounds
cognisable by the ear?'

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to sounds
cognisable by the ear' -

that monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort
to get rid of these evil unskilled states themselves.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment

or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to sounds
cognisable by the ear' -

that monk, Sāriputta, with rapture and joy
can forsake these,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

5. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to smells
cognisable by the nose?'

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion

or sensory reaction
in regard to smells
cognisable by the nose' -

that monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort
to get rid of these evil unskilled states themselves.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to smells
cognisable by the nose' -

that monk, Sāriputta, with rapture and joy
can forsake these,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

6. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind

desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to tastes
cognisable by the tongue?'

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to tastes
cognisable by the tongue' -

that monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort
to get rid of these evil unskilled states themselves.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to tastes
cognisable by the tongue' -

that monk, Sāriputta, with rapture and joy
can forsake these,

training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

7. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to touches
cognisable by the body?'

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to touches
cognisable by the body' -

that monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort
to get rid of these evil unskilled states themselves.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to touches
cognisable by the body' -

that monk, Sāriputta, with rapture and joy
can forsake these,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

8. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to mental states
cognisable by the mind?'

[344] If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to mental states
cognisable by the mind' -

that monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort
to get rid of these evil unskilled states themselves.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'On the road by which I entered the village for almsfood
or in the part in which I walked for almsfood
or on the road by which I left the village
after (walking for) almsfood -
did I have there in my mind
desire or attachment
or aversion or confusion
or sensory reaction
in regard to mental states
cognisable by the mind' -

that monk, Sāriputta, with rapture and joy
can forsake these,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

9. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'Are the five strands of sense-pleasures got rid of by me?

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'The five strands of sense-pleasures have not been got rid of by me,' he should make an effort to get rid of them.

But if while considering he knows:

'The five strands of sense-pleasures have been got rid of by me,'

Then, Sāriputta, that monk with rapture and joy

can forsake them,

training himself day and night

in states that are skilled.

---

10. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'Are the five hindrances got rid of by me?

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'The five hindrances have not been got rid of by me,'

he should make an effort to get rid of them.

But if while considering he knows:

'The five hindrances have been got rid of by me,'

Then, Sāriputta, that monk with rapture and joy
can forsake them,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

11. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'Do I fully understand the five groups of grasping?

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'I do not fully understand the five groups of grasping,'

that monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort to understand them fully.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows:

'I fully understand the five groups of grasping.'

Then, Sāriputta, that monk with rapture and joy
can forsake them,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

12. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'Are the four applications of mindfulness developed by me?

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'The four applications of mindfulness are not fully understood by me.'

That monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort to understand them fully.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows:

'The four applications of mindfulness are fully understood by me.'

Then, Sāriputta, that monk with rapture and joy
can forsake them,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

13. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'Are the four right efforts developed by me?'

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'The four right efforts are not fully developed by me.'

That monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort to develop them fully.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows:

'The four right efforts are fully developed by me.'

Then, Sāriputta, that monk with rapture and joy
can forsake them,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

14. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'Are the four bases of psychic power developed by me?

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'The four bases of psychic power are not fully developed by me.'

That monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort to develop them fully.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows:

'The four bases of psychic power are fully developed by me.'

Then, Sāriputta, that monk with rapture and joy
can forsake them,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

15. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'Are the five controlling faculties developed by me?

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'The five controlling faculties are not fully developed by me.'

That monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort to develop them fully.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows:

'The five controlling faculties are fully developed by me.'

Then, Sāriputta, that monk with rapture and joy
can forsake them,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

16. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'Are the five powers developed by me?'

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'The five powers are not fully developed by me.'

That monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort to develop them fully.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows:

'The five powers are fully developed by me.'

Then, Sāriputta, that monk with rapture and joy
can forsake them,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

17. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'Are the seven links in awakening developed by me?

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'The seven links in awakening are not fully developed by me.'

That monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort to develop them fully.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows:

'The seven links in awakening are fully developed by me.'

Then, Sāriputta, that monk with rapture and joy

can forsake them,

training himself day and night

in states that are skilled.

---

18. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'Is the ariyan eightfold way developed by me?

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'The ariyan eightfold way is not fully developed by me.'

That monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort to develop it fully.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows:

'The ariyan eightfold Way is fully developed by me.'

Then, Sāriputta, that monk with rapture and joy
can forsake them,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

19. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'Are calm and insight developed by me?

If, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows thus:

'Calm and insight are not fully developed by me.'

That monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort to develop them fully.

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows:

'Calm and insight are fully developed by me.'

Then, Sāriputta, that monk with rapture and joy
can forsake them,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

20. And again, Sāriputta, a monk should consider thus:

'Are knowledge and freedom realised by me?

But if, Sāriputta, a monk while considering knows:

'Knowledge and freedom are not realised [345] by me,' that monk, Sāriputta, should make an effort to realise knowledge and freedom.

But if, Sāriputta, that monk while considering knows:

'Knowledge and freedom are realised by me' - that monk, Sāriputta, with rapture and joy

can forsake them,
training himself day and night
in states that are skilled.

---

21. Sāriputta, all those recluses and brahmans in the distant past who completely purified themselves for alms-gathering did so only after having reflected over and over again in these ways.

And, Sāriputta, all those recluses and brahmans in the distant future who will completely purify themselves for alms-gathering will do so only after having reflected over and over again in these ways.

And, Sāriputta, all those recluses and brahmans who at present completely purify themselves for alms-gathering do so only after having reflected over and over again in these ways.

Wherefore, Sāriputta, this is how you must train yourself:

'I will completely purify myself for alms-gathering after having reflected over and over again.'

This is how you, Sāriputta, must train yourself."

Thus spoke the Lord.

Delighted, the venerable Sāriputta rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on Complete Purity for Alms-gathering:
The Ninth

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Vin. ii. 304, and M. iii. 104.

<sup>2</sup> This is the abiding of Buddhas, individual Buddhas, Tathāgatas and great disciples, MA. v. 106.

<sup>3</sup> Vihālabbam, from vijahati; but G.S. iii. 220 (A. iii. 307) translates it in parallel passage as though derived from viharati.

---

Majjhima Nikāya
III. Upari Paṇṇāsa
5. Saḷāyatana Vagga

The Middle Length Sayings
III. The Final Fifty Discourses
5. The Division of the Sixfold Sense(-field)

152. Discourse on the Development of the Sense Organs<sup>1</sup>

Indriya-Bhāvanā Sutta

---

[346] [298]

THUS have I heard:

At one time the Lord was staying near Kajaṅgalā in the Mukhelu Grove.<sup>2</sup>

Then the brahman youth Uttara, a pupil of Pārāsariya,<sup>3</sup>
approached the Lord;
having approached [347] him,
he exchanged greetings with the Lord, and when he had conversed in a friendly and courteous way
he sat down at a respectful distance.

The Lord spoke thus
to the brahman youth Uttara,

a pupil of Pārāsariya,
as he was sitting down
at a respectful distance:

"Uttara, does Pārāsariya the brahman teach the development of the sense-organs
to his disciples?"

"Good Gotama, the brahman Pārāsariya teaches the development of the sense-organs
to his disciples."

"But in what way, Uttara, does Pārāsariya the brahman teach the development of the sense-organs
to his disciples?"

"As to this, good Gotama,
one should not see material shapes with the eye, one should not hear sounds with the ear.
It is thus, good Gotama, that the brahman Pārāsariya teaches the development of the sense-organs
to his disciples."

"This being so, Uttara, then according to what Pārāsariya the brahman says a blind man must have his sense-organ developed, a deaf man must have his sense-organ developed.
For a blind man, Uttara, does not see material shape with his eye, nor does a deaf man hear a sound with his ear."

When this had been said,
the brahman youth Uttara,
a pupil of Pārāsariya,
sat silent, ashamed,

his shoulders drooped,
his face downcast,
brooding,
speechless.

Then the Lord,
knowing that Uttara,
a pupil of Pārāsariya,
was sitting silent, ashamed,
his shoulders drooped,
his face downcast,
brooding,
speechless,
addressed the venerable Ānanda, saying:

"Ānanda, the brahman Pārāsariya teaches his disciples the development of the sense-organs in one way;<sup>4</sup> but in the discipline for an ariyan
the incomparable development of the sense-organs is otherwise."<sup>4a</sup>

"It is the right time for this, Lord,
it is the right time for this, Well-farer, that the Lord [299] should teach the incomparable development of the sense-organs (as it is) in the discipline for an ariyan.
When the monks have heard the Lord,
they will remember."

"Well than, Ānanda, listen, attend carefully and I will speak."

"Yes, revered sir,"
the venerable Ānanda answered the Lord in assent.

The Lord spoke thus:

"And what, Ānanda,
is the incomparable development of the sense-organs in the discipline for an ariyan?

As to this, Ānanda,
when a monk has seen a material shape with the eye
there arises what is liked,
there arises what is disliked, there arises what is both [348] liked and disliked.<sup>5</sup>

He comprehends thus:
'This that is liked is arising in me,
this that is disliked is arising,
this that is both liked and disliked is arising,
and this that arises
is because it is constructed, is gross.
(But) this is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say equanimity.'

So whether what is arising in him
is liked, disliked or both liked and disliked,
it is (all the same) stopped in him, and equanimity remains.<sup>6</sup>

Ānanda, it is as if a man with vision, having opened his eyes should close them,
or having closed them
should open them.
Even so, Ānanda,
such is the speed,
such the swiftness,
such the ease
with which anything that has arisen,
whether it is liked, disliked or both liked and disliked,

is (all the same) stopped in him,
and equanimity remains.

In the discipline for an ariyan, Ānanda,
this is called
the incomparable development of the sense-organs
in regard to material shapes
cognisable by the eye.

And again, Ānanda,
when a monk has heard a sound with the ear
there arises what is liked,
there arises what is disliked,
there arises what is both liked and disliked.

He comprehends thus:
'This that is liked is arising in me,
this that is disliked is arising,
this that is both liked and disliked is arising,
and this that arises
is because it is constructed, is gross.
(But) this is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say equanimity.'

So whether what is arising in him
is liked, disliked or both liked and disliked,
it is (all the same) stopped in him,
and equanimity remains.

Ānanda, as a strong man can snap his fingers with ease.
Even so, Ānanda,
such is the speed,
such the swiftness,
such the ease

with which anything that has arisen,
whether it is liked, disliked or both liked and disliked,
is (all the same) stopped in him,
and equanimity remains.

In the discipline for an ariyan, Ānanda,
this is called
the incomparable development of the sense-organs
in regard to sounds
cognisable by the ear.

And again, Ānanda, when a monk has smelt a smell with the nose
there arises what is liked,
there arises what is disliked,
there arises what is both liked and disliked.

He comprehends thus:
'This that is liked is arising in me,
this that is disliked is arising,
this that is both liked and disliked is arising,
and this that arises
is because it is constructed, is gross.
(But) this is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say equanimity.'

So whether what is arising in him
is liked, disliked or both liked and disliked,
it is (all the same) stopped in him,
and equanimity remains.

As, [300] Ānanda, the rain-drops slide off a lotus-leaf that is slightly on the slant and do not remain.
Even so, Ānanda,
such is the speed,

such the swiftness,
such the ease
with which anything that has arisen,
whether it is liked, disliked or both liked and disliked,
is (all the same) stopped in him,
and equanimity remains.

In the discipline for an ariyan, Ānanda,
this is called
the incomparable development of the sense-organs
in regard to smells
cognisable by the nose.

And again, Ānanda, when a monk has tasted a flavour with the tongue
there arises what is liked,
there arises what is disliked,
there arises what is both liked and disliked.

He comprehends thus:
'This that is liked is arising in me,
this that is disliked is arising,
this that is both liked and disliked is arising,
and this that arises
is because it is constructed, is gross.
(But) this is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say equanimity.'

So whether what is arising in him
is liked, disliked or both liked and disliked,
it is (all the same) stopped in him,
and equanimity remains.

As, Ānanda, when a fleck of mucus has collected on the tip of his tongue a strong man can easily spit it out.

Even so, Ānanda,
such is the speed,
such the swiftness,
such the ease
with which anything that has arisen,
whether it is liked, disliked or both liked and disliked,
is (all the same) stopped in him,
and equanimity remains.

In the discipline for an ariyan, Ānanda,
this [349] is called
the incomparable development of the sense-organs in regard to flavours
cognisable by the tongue.

And again, Ānanda, when a monk has felt a touch with the body
there arises what is liked,
there arises what is disliked,
there arises what is both liked and disliked.

He comprehends thus:
'This that is liked is arising in me,
this that is disliked is arising,
this that is both liked and disliked is arising,
and this that arises
is because it is constructed, is gross.
(But) this is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say equanimity.'

So whether what is arising in him
is liked, disliked or both liked and disliked,
it is (all the same) stopped in him,
and equanimity remains.

As, Ānanda, a strong man can stretch out his bent arm or can bend back his outstretched arm.
Even so, Ānanda,
such is the speed,
such the swiftness,
such the ease
with which anything that has arisen,
whether it is liked, disliked or both liked and disliked,
is (all the same) stopped in him,
and equanimity remains.

In the discipline for an ariyan, Ānanda,
this is called
the incomparable development of the sense-organs
in regard to touches
cognisable by the body.

And again, Ānanda, when a monk has cognised a mental state with the mind
there arises what is liked,
there arises what is disliked,
there arises what is both liked and disliked.

He comprehends thus:
'This that is liked is arising in me,
this that is disliked is arising,
this that is both liked and disliked is arising,
and this that arises
is because it is constructed, is gross.
(But) this is the real,
this the excellent,
that is to say equanimity.'

So whether what is arising in him
is liked, disliked or both liked and disliked,

it is (all the same) stopped in him,
and equanimity remains.

It is, Ānanda, as if a man might let two or three drops of water fall into a red-hot iron vessel daily.
Slow, Ānanda,
would be the falling
of the drops of water, yet quickly
would they be destroyed and consumed.
Even so, Ānanda,
such is the speed,
such the swiftness,
such the ease
with which anything that has arisen,
whether it is liked, disliked or both liked and disliked,
is (all the same) stopped in him,
and equanimity remains.

In the discipline for an ariyan, Ānanda,
this is called
the incomparable development of the sense-organs
in regard to mental states
cognisable by the mind.

Even so, Ānanda, is the incomparable development of the sense-organs in the discipline for an ariyan.

And what, Ānanda,
is a learner's course?

As to this, Ānanda,
when a monk has seen a material shape with the eye
there arises what is liked,

there arises what is disliked,
there arises what is both liked and disliked.

Because there has arisen
what is liked,
because there has arisen
what is disliked,
because there has arisen
what is both liked and disliked,
he is troubled about it,
ashamed of it,
loathes it.

[301] When he has heard a sound with the ear, smelt a smell
with the nose,
tasted a flavour
with the tongue,
felt a touch with the body, cognised a mental state with the mind
there arises what is liked,
there arises what is disliked,
there arises what is both liked and disliked.

Because there has arisen
what is liked,
because there has arisen
what is disliked,
because there has arisen
what is both liked and disliked,
he is troubled about it,
ashamed of it,
loathes it.

Just so, Ānanda,
is a learner's course.

And what, Ānanda,
is the ariyan whose sense-organs are developed?

As to this, Ānanda,
when a monk has seen a material shape with the eye
there [350] arises what is liked,
there arises what is disliked,
there arises what is both liked and disliked;
when a monk has heard a sound with the ear
there arises what is liked,
there arises what is disliked,
there arises what is both liked and disliked;
when a monk has smelt a smell with the nose
there arises what is liked,
there arises what is disliked,
there arises what is both liked and disliked;
when a monk has tasted a flavour with the tongue
there arises what is liked,
there arises what is disliked,
there arises what is both liked and disliked;
when a monk has felt a touch with the body
there arises what is liked,
there arises what is disliked,
there arises what is both liked and disliked; when a monk has cognised a mental state with the mind
there arises what is liked,
there arises what is disliked,
there arises what is both liked and disliked.

If he desire thus:

'May I abide

not perceiving impurity in impurity,'<sup>7</sup>

he abides there
not perceiving impurity.

If he desire:
'May I abide perceiving impurity in purity,'
he abides there
perceiving impurity.

If he desire:
'May I abide not perceiving impurity in impurity and in purity,' he abides there
not perceiving impurity.

If he desire:
'May I abide perceiving impurity in purity and impurity,' he abides there
perceiving impurity.

If he desire:
'May I, having avoided both impurity and purity, [302] abide in equanimity,
mindful and clearly conscious,'
he abides there
in equanimity,
mindful and clearly conscious.

Even so, Ānanda,
is the ariyan whose sense-organs are developed.

Thus, Ānanda,
there has been taught by me
the incomparable development of the sense-organs (as it is) in the discipline for an ariyan, there has been taught a learner's course, there has been taught the ariyan whose sense-organs are developed.

Whatever, Ānanda, is to be done out of compassion by a teacher seeking the welfare of his disciples and compassionate for them, that has been done by me for you.

These, Ānanda, are the roots of trees,
these are empty places.
Meditate, Ānanda,
do not be slothful,
do not be remorseful later.
This is our instruction for you."

Thus spoke the Lord.
Delighted, the venerable Ānanda
rejoiced in what the Lord had said.

Discourse on the Development of the Sense-organs:
The Tenth

Division of the Sixfold (Sense- )field:
The Fifth

TOLD ARE THE FINAL FIFTY

---

<sup>1</sup> One of the chief difficulties in this Discourse is the translation of the terms indriya and bhāvanā. The term indriya might be rendered "controlling faculties," as it appears to mean at Vin. i. 294 and which is apparently the only other canonical passage where the compound indriyabhāvanā occurs as such, although there is also a M. context (iii. 81) where we find pañcannaṃ indriyānaṃ bhāvanānuyogaṃ, the practice of the development

(or, mind-development) of the five controlling faculties: of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom. Since, in these two passages, the indriyas are associated at least with some (Vin. i. 294), if not all (M. iii. 81 f.) of the seven groups of the bodhipakkhiyadhammā (things helpful to enlightenment), it may be assumed that in such contexts indriya means controlling faculty. But on the other hand, indriya can also mean sense-organ, and I believe that, from the internal evidence of this Discourse, it has this meaning here. One may usefully cf. S. v. 73 f. which is partially concerned with indriyasamvara, control of the sense-organs of eye, etc., for this is a passage that states that whether the material shapes that a monk sees are liked or disliked, he remains unmoved (or, stands firm, ṭhita) in body and mind, his mind inwardly well established, susanṭhita, and freed. And this is presumably tantamount to the "equanimity remains," upekhā saṅghāti, of our M. Sta.

Bhāvanā, the second part of the compound, means developing or producing, with a strong secondary implication that such developing is done by the mind, and is therefore a mind-development such as gives the ariyan control over the sense-data he perceives so that, if he wish, he may abide not perceiving their impurity, etc., but with equanimity in regard to their impingement on him. He therefore trains his sense-organs not to respond in wrong ways to sensory stimuli, and develops such control over them that he will remain unaffected by them and indifferent as to whether he likes them, dislikes them or neither dislikes nor likes. That the impingement of sense-data is inevitable while a man is still alive is nowhere denied in the Pall canon; but response to them, even noticing them may be stopped in deep meditation where all is stilled.

<sup>2</sup> The Grove was full of trees of this name. Variant readings are: Mukhe'uvana, Muñcelu-, Suve'u-, and Ve'uvana.

<sup>3</sup> On the possible identity with Pārāpariya (verses at Thag. 72ff.) see Pss. Breath. p. 295, note; and DPPN., s.v. Indriyabhāvana Sutta and Pārāpariya Thera.

<sup>4</sup>[4a] aññathā ... aññathā.

<sup>5</sup> manāpāmanāpaṃ.

<sup>6</sup> upekhā saṅghāti.

<sup>7</sup> At Pts. ii. 212 this and the following are called ariyā iddhi. The explanations that are given there are found also at MA. v. 108.

---